Crucial to the Justice Department's argument is the contention that the government did not act voluntarily to stop the NSA program. "This is not an instance of 'voluntary cessation' of allegedly unlawful activity," the government lawyers wrote. "The government has not ceased surveillance -- instead, the facts and legal authorities have changed."

But Ann Beeson, the ACLU's associate legal director, said that argument is "not plausible." She added that previous court rulings made it clear that the government cannot escape a legal judgment merely by voluntarily halting its illegal activity.

"The FISA court didn't reach out on its own to do something; the government asked it to do something," Beeson said. "And absent a ruling, they are free to return to their illegal conduct again."

The new lines of argument in the ACLU case come less than a week before a hearing scheduled for next Wednesday in Cincinnati where both sides are set to offer oral arguments.

Most of the details of the new spying arrangement are considered classified by the Bush administration, including a set of orders issued by a FISA judge on Jan. 10 that authorizes the eavesdropping. As a result, the precise outlines of and legal justifications for the monitoring remain unclear.

The government signaled in its filing that it would oppose a public release of the orders, saying that "the longstanding practice is that FISA Court orders remain classified and not subject to public dissemination." Senate Judiciary Committee leaders have asked to see copies of the orders but have, so far, been rebuffed.

Secrecy Is At Issue In Suits Opposing Domestic Spying (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

The Bush administration has employed extraordinary secrecy in defending the National Security Agency's highly classified domestic surveillance program from civil lawsuits. Plaintiffs and judges' clerks cannot see its secret filings. Judges have to make appointments to review them and are not allowed to keep copies.

Judges have even been instructed to use computers provided by the Justice Department to compose their decisions.

But now the procedures have started to meet resistance. At a private meeting with the lawyers in one of the cases this month, the judges who will hear the first appeal next week expressed uneasiness about the procedures, said a lawyer who attended, Ann Beeson of the American Civil Liberties Union.

Lawyers suing the government and some legal scholars say the procedures threaten the separation of powers, the adversary system and the lawyer-client privilege.

Justice Department officials say the circumstances of the cases, involving a highly classified program, require extraordinary measures. The officials say they have used similar procedures in other cases involving classified materials.

In ordinary civil suits, the parties' submissions are sent to their adversaries and are available to the public in open court files. But in several cases challenging the eavesdropping, Justice Department lawyers have been submitting legal papers not by filing them in court but by placing them in a room at the department. They have filed papers, in other words, with themselves.

At the meeting this month, judges on the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit asked how the procedures might affect the integrity of the files and the appellate records.

"The documents reviewed by the court have not been altered and will not be altered," Ms. Kennedy wrote, and they "will be preserved securely as part of the record of this case."

Some cases challenging the program, which monitored international communications of people in the United States without court approval, have also involved atypical maneuvering. Soon after one suit challenging the program was filed last year in Oregon, Justice Department lawyers threatened to seize an exhibit from the court file.

DOJ_NMG_0122170

This month, in the same case, the department sought to inspect and delete files from the computers on which lawyers for the plaintiffs had prepared their legal filings.

The tactics, said a lawyer in the Oregon case, Jon B. Eisenberg, prompted him to conduct unusual research.

"Sometime during all of this," Mr. Eisenberg said, "I went on Amazon and ordered a copy of Kafka's 'The Trial,' because I needed a refresher course in bizarre legal procedures."

A federal district judge in the case, Garr M. King, invoked another book after a government lawyer refused to disclose whether he had a certain security clearance, saying information about the clearance was itself classified.

"Frankly, your response," Judge King said, "is kind of an Alice in Wonderland response."

Questions about the secret filings may figure in the first appellate argument in the challenges, before the Sixth Circuit, in Cincinnati, on Wednesday. The three judges who will hear the appeal met with lawyers for the Justice Department and the American Civil Liberties Union on Jan. 8 in a judge's chambers in Memphis.

"The court raised questions about the procedures the government had used to file classified submissions in the case and the propriety and integrity of those procedures," said Ms. Beeson, associate legal director of the A.C.L.U., which represents the plaintiffs in the appeal.

"They were also concerned about the independence of the judiciary," given that "the Justice Department retains custody and total control over the court filings." Ms. Beeson said.

Nancy S. Marder, a law professor at the Chicago-Kent College of Law and an authority on secrecy in litigation, said the tactics were really extreme and deeply, deeply troubling.

"These are the basics that we take for granted in our court system," Professor Marder said. "You have two parties. You exchange documents. The documents you've seen don't disappear."

A spokesman for the Justice Department, Dean Boyd, said employees involved in storing the classified documents were independent of the litigators and provided "neutral assistance" to courts in handling sensitive information. The documents, Mr. Boyd said, are "stored securely and without alteration."

The appellate argument in Cincinnati will almost certainly also concern the effects of the administration announcement last week that it would submit the program to a secret court, ending its eavesdropping without warrants.

In a brief filed on Thursday, the government said the move made the case against the program moot.

Ms. Beeson of the A.C.L.U. said the government was wrong.

At least one case, the one in Oregon, is probably not moot. It goes beyond the other cases in seeking damages from the government, because the plaintiffs say they have seen proof that they were wiretapped without a warrant.

In August 2004, the Treasury Department's Office of Foreign Assets Control, which was investigating an Oregon charity, al-Haramain Islamic Foundation, inadvertently provided a copy of a classified document to a foundation lawyer, Lynne Bernabei.

That document indicated, according to court filings, that the government monitored communications between officers of the charity and two of its lawyers without a warrant in spring 2004.

"If I gave you this document today and you put it on the front page of The New York Times, it would not threaten national security," Mr. Eisenberg, a lawyer for the foundation, said. "There is only one thing about it that's explosive, and that's the fact that our clients were wiretapped."

Ms. Bernabei circulated the document to two directors of the charity, at least one of them in Saudi Arabia, and to three other lawyers. She discussed them with two more lawyers. A reporter for The Washington Post, David B. Ottaway, also reviewed the document.

The full significance of the document was apparently not clear to any recipient, more than a year before The New York Times disclosed the existence of the N.S.A. program in December 2005.

The F.B.I. learned of the disclosure almost immediately in August 2004, Judge King said at a court hearing last year, but made no effort to retrieve copies of the document for about six weeks.

When it did, everyone it asked apparently returned all copies of the document. In a statement reported in The Post in March, for instance, Mr. Ottaway said he the F.B.I. had told him that the document had "highly sensitive national security information."

"I returned it after consulting with Washington Post editors and lawyers, and concluding that it was not relevant to what I was working on at the time," Mr. Ottaway said.

In a sworn statement in June, a lawyer who had the document, Asim Ghafoor, said the bureau took custody of his laptop computer "in order that the document might be 'scrubbed' from it."

The computer was returned weeks later.

In February 2006, the charity and the two lawyers who say they were wiretapped sued to stop the program, requesting financial damages. They attached a copy of the classified document, filing it under seal. They have not said how they came to have a copy.

Three weeks later, the lawyers for the foundation received a call from two Justice Department lawyers. The classified document "had not been properly secured," the lawyers said, according to a letter from the plaintiffs' lawyers to the judge.

As Mr. Eisenberg recalled it, the government lawyers said, "The F.B.I. is on its way to the courthouse to take possession of the document from the judge."

But Judge King, at a hurriedly convened hearing, would not yield it, and asked, "What if I say I will not deliver it to the F.B.I.?"

A Justice Department lawyer, Anthony J. Coppolino, gave a measured response, saying: "Your Honor, we obviously don't want to have any kind of a confrontation with you. But it has to be secured in a proper fashion."

In the meantime, copies of the document appear to have been sent abroad, and the government concedes that it has made no efforts to contact people overseas who it suspects have them.

"It's probably gone many, many places," Judge King said of the document at the August hearing. "Who is it secret from?"

He added, "The document must be completely removed from the case, and plaintiffs are not allowed to rely on it to prove their claims."

Judge King wondered aloud about the implications of that position, saying, "There is nothing in the law that requires them to purge their memory."

Mr. Eisenberg, in an interview, said that was precisely the government position. "They claim they own the portions of our brains that remember anything," he said.

In a decision in September, Judge King ruled that the plaintiffs were not entitled to review the document again but could rely on their recollections of it. In October, they filed a motion for summary judgment, a routine step in many civil litigations. In a sealed filing, they described the classified document.

Government lawyers sent Judge King a letter saying the plaintiffs had "mishandled information contained in the classified document" by, among other actions, preparing filings on their own computers.

In a telephone conference on Nov. 1, Judge King appeared unpersuaded. "My problem with your statement," he told Mr. Tannenbaum, "is that you assume you are absolutely correct in everything you are stating, and I am not sure that you are."

Mr. Boyd of the Justice Department said the government "continues to explore with counsel ways in which the classified information may be properly protected without any intrusion on the attorney-client privilege."

Terrorism Jury Suffering 'Mental Fatigue,' Cuts Work Hours (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, January 26, 2007

CHICAGO - Jurors in the trial of two men charged with furnishing money and fresh recruits to Hamas terrorists announced Thursday that they are getting tired and are cutting their work hours.

"We have taken very few breaks," the jurors said in a note to U.S. District Judge Amy J. St. Eve who is presiding at the trial, described when the indictment was made public as a step in the war on terrorism.

Jurors said in the note that they are suffering from "mental fatigue."

Former Chicago grocer Muhammad Salah, 53, and Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, a former assistant business professor at Washington's Howard University, are charged with racketeering conspiracy and other offenses.

They are accused among other things of funneling thousands of dollars through American bank accounts to Hamas terrorists on the West Bank and the Gaza strip seeking to topple the government of Israel.

Both men say any money they furnished was destined for such purposes as clinics and day-care centers. Hamas is blamed for a number of murders, bombings and kidnappings. But the group also operates various charities and holds a 60 percent majority in the Palestinian legislative council.

Jurors heard three months of testimony in the case and have deliberated on the evidence for nine days.

In their note, they told St. Eve that they had been working diligently to reach a verdict. But they went home Thursday without reaching one.

Instead, they said that they would work a half day on Friday and from now on start work at 9 a.m. and normally quit for the day at 4 p.m.

When lunch was delivered to the jury room around noon on Thursday, the laughter and chatter that came through the open door was relaxed and friendly sounding.

The Miami Herald, January 26, 2007

The best thing to do when you make a mistake is to admit the error, apologize for the harm it caused, make amends if possible -- and then move on. Somebody should explain this to Bush administration officials who are stubbornly refusing to acknowledge error or responsibility for the wrongful detention and subsequent torture of Canadian citizen Maher Arar.

Mr. Arar is the Syrian-born Canadian who was detained by U.S. authorities as a terrorism suspect in 2002 when he was changing planes in New York after a vacation in Tunisia. He was deported to Syria without a hearing or judicial review. There, he was imprisoned for a year in a tiny cell and routinely tortured.

All of this is now known because of findings by a Canadian Commission of Inquiry and an independent investigation by a former McGill University law dean. The commission cleared Mr. Arar of any terrorism ties. The independent investigation documented the torture he suffered in Syria.

Despite the findings, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff say that Mr. Arar's name will remain on the terrorism watch list. Why? Messrs. Chertoff and Gonzales claim to have secret information to justify his inclusion on the list. This is profoundly disturbing -- not to mention unconscionable, morally repugnant, legally suspect and just plain wrong.

No self-respecting democracy that adheres to the rule of law would allow itself to be party to torture and injustice on the basis of secret information. "This practice is abhorrent and stains America's reputation as a defender and protector of human rights," said Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., who is chair of the Senate Judiciary Committee. Sen. Leahy is right. The United States owes Mr. Arar an apology and compensation for the harm he has suffered. That is the least we can do.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI Reaches Out To Local Muslims (KINGDM)

By Aaron Royster, Miner Staff Writer

Dr. Farid Farooqi, the imam of Masjid-E-Ibrahim, welcomed the head of all FBI operations in Arizona, John E. Lewis, to help open communication between the two groups.

"We highly appreciate their efforts," Farooqi said. "Now the distance (between communication) is reduced."

Farooqi said he felt the night went well. He invited Lewis and two accompanying agents to share a meal with Muslim community members.

The evening began with Farooqi providing an explanation of Islam and the beliefs of its members. He said the Islamic faith is based upon a total submission to God and establishing a means of peace on earth.

"Islam is the religion of peace," Farooqi said. "Muslims are the people of peace."

Lewis followed Farooqi, explaining the FBI to the more than 20 community leaders present to help dispel misconceptions about his organization.

Lewis and Farooqi had met at the Phoenix FBI office in December, which led to the visit by Lewis.

Lewis explained the different focuses of the FBI: counter-terrorism, counter-intelligence, cyber-crime, public corruption, violent crimes, white-collar crimes, organized crime and drug trafficking.

He said counter-terrorism is the current No. 1 priority of the FBI, but white-collar crime was the No. 1 priority before 9/11.

Lewis said that he is here to serve the community, but didn't gloss over the actions of the FBI.

"It is a rare event for us to be on the street conducting an investigation between us and a private citizen that would be a positive experience," Lewis said. "We're not in business, unfortunately, to deliver good news to you."

Individuals in attendance expressed concerns over the name checklist, profiling at airports and at the borders, and a general poor attitude from law enforcement during all interactions they had. Lewis offered few solutions or answers to the tough questions presented to him, but was attentive and expressed concern to the community leaders.

Lewis added he has received complaints in the past from citizens who felt scared or mistreated following interactions with his office. But with that stark reality, he presented some hope for the future.

"The only way that we're going to correct the way we are today is ... time," Lewis said. "We got to push forward in time and get past this."

Lewis said he felt when he started over 30 years ago with the FBI that the open forum and discussion with community members wouldn't have happened. He said that one purpose of the outreach to the community by the FBI is to make it easier for community members to get involved with the FBI.

"We cannot do our job effectively if we believe we can do it alone," Lewis said.

Is The Gulf Coast Not Part Of Our Union? (USAT)

USA Today, January 26, 2007

President Bush's State of the Union address Tuesday included few surprises. He opened up with domestic policy and was predictably myopic about our quagmire in Iraq, seemingly immune to the pressure coming from both parties to get out of the ill-advised war. The president gets points for talking about immigration policy and for putting new ideas for health care reform on the table. But how dare he talk of the State of the Union without mentioning the Gulf Coast, and especially New Orleans. Has our president decided that one of our nation's greatest devastations does not merit a mention?

To be sure, the federal government has set aside billions of dollars for the region's recovery. But 15 months after Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast and the levees broke in New Orleans, tens of thousands of people still are displaced.

Some people are desperately trying to get home, but Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco's "Road Home" program has been paved with good intentions and poor delivery — just a fraction of the thousands who have applied for relief have received it. Habitable housing is being torn down to make way for "mixed-use" housing, and no provisions have been made for the poor who used to live in those projects. Children are being turned away from schools because there are too few to accommodate them. Citizens want to "stop the violence," but the social infrastructure to deter crime is essentially nonexistent.

Granted, all of the challenges in New Orleans and along the Gulf Coast can't be solved by federal government action alone. But a more sensitive president might at least acknowledge the slow pace of recovery and pledge to do whatever he can to help its citizens. A more sensitive president might acknowledge the pain that people still feel, but then again, this is a president whose mother observed that the Houston Astrodome, where people fled, was "working very well for them."

After the levees broke, wealthy New Orleaneans openly said that the city's footprint needed to shrink and that it should look different demographically, geographically and politically. At least one member of Congress said Katrina had done what public policy could not do. And Loyola Law School professor Bill Quigley, who is litigating on behalf of New Orleans' poor, has said recovery policies have been so biased that "you might as well put up a sign that says, 'Poor people, do not enter.' "

How could President Bush say that the state of our union is "good" when New Orleans has not yet recovered? If we can attempt to rebuild Baghdad but not New Orleans, what does that say about this country? And if Bush can spend so much of his address talking about Iraq, while Katrina recovery doesn't merit a mention, what does this say about his priorities?

No Words For The Gulf (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

More infuriating than anything George W. Bush said in his State of the Union address was what he didn't say. Congress and the nation heard nothing, zilch, nada, not a single, solitary word about New Orleans, the Gulf Coast and the devastation that remains from the worst natural disaster in United States history.

A disaster that happened on his watch. How nice that the White House has been able to move beyond the trauma of September 2005 -- wind and water, death and destruction, poverty and race, "Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job." Too bad the people of New Orleans, St. Bernard Parish, Pass Christian, Biloxi and the rest of the coast will never have the luxury of forgetting.

They can't forget that, days after Hurricane Katrina made its tragic landfall, President Bush stood in New Orleans's historic Jackson Square, while most of the city still lay beneath brackish floodwaters, and said that nature's trials "remind us that we're tied together in this life, in this nation -- and that the despair of any touches us all."

Must have been a very light touch.

That night, Bush promised that "we will do what it takes, we will stay as long as it takes, to help citizens rebuild their communities." He vowed that "this great city will rise again." Then, as usual, he acted as if saying something were enough to make it true.

Bush said there was "no way to imagine America without New Orleans." No imagination is needed -- the New Orleans that we knew before the flood no longer exists. The remnant of a city that survives between the Mississippi River and Lake Pontchartrain has less than half the population of the New Orleans we used to know. Vast neighborhoods are full of houses abandoned to mold and decay.

Hundreds of thousands of residents still have no way to come home -- or no homes to return to. Vicious hoodlums have returned, however, and are preying on the diehards who never left and the pioneers who are doing their best to help the city rebuild. Yes, Brad Pitt and Angelina Jolie have just bought a house in New Orleans and say they will make the city their home. But they're likely to have better security than their neighbors.

New Orleans was doomed not just by Hurricane Katrina but by the failure of levees and flood walls that should have provided ample protection. The Army Corps of Engineers has worked day and night to patch the flood control system, and if a Katrina hit again tomorrow, most of the city should stay dry. But if a similar hurricane hit from a different angle -- or, heaven forbid, a stronger hurricane hit from any angle -- what's left of New Orleans would probably be destroyed.

The man who inspired Bush's immortal "Brownie" remark, Michael Brown, will go down in history as the Federal Emergency Management Agency director who botched the federal response to Katrina. But he intends to take others in the White House down with him. Last week, speaking to a group of graduate students, Brown claimed that he recommended that the White House assert federal control of the disaster response in the whole affected area.

"Certain people in the White House," Brown said, wanted to "federalize" the response in Louisiana to embarrass Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, a Democrat, but avoid taking any steps in Mississippi that would cast Gov. Haley Barbour, a Republican, in an unfavorable light. Brown did not name the White House officials who were behind these alleged machinations; a White House spokesman denied his claims.

I'm about as cynical as anyone about George W. Bush and his administration, but what I mostly saw in the days after Katrina was incompetence, not political gamesmanship. The scale of the disaster was almost unimaginable, and even if the federal government had done its job, lives would have been lost and the Gulf Coast left in ruins.

What is unconscionable is that a president who fundamentally does not believe in government has allowed market forces to take the lead in the reconstruction effort, which ensures that the New Orleans he promised to rebuild is gone forever. The logjam of insurance claims, construction permits, flood maps and levee projects keeps things from moving forward; businesses can't function without workers, and workers can't come home if they have no place to live.

What kind of president can see one of the nation's greatest, most historic cities ruined and not make its rebirth his highest priority? What kind of president gives a State of the Union and doesn't even mention New Orleans?

WAR NEWS:

Republican Senators May Offer Alternative Iraq Resolutions (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2007

Scrambling to head off a potentially embarrassing congressional rebuke for President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq, Senate Republicans are working on alternative legislation that would attach specific "benchmarks" to the White House plan.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who has been the leading congressional advocate of deploying additional troops to quell the sectarian violence in Iraq, said Thursday that he was interested in drafting a resolution to ensure that the effectiveness of the troop increase could be gauged.

And Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), one of the president's most loyal supporters on Capitol Hill, said he might introduce a similar resolution.

"It says we need to give it a chance," Cornyn said, echoing the president's State of the Union plea to lawmakers Tuesday to give his plan "a chance to work." "We owe it to our servicemen and servicewomen to say what we're for, not just what we're against."

The legislative maneuvering comes after a rough two weeks for GOP lawmakers, who have been struggling to respond to Bush's deeply unpopular proposal to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq by 21,500 in the coming months.

If McCain and Cornyn introduce resolutions, they could draw support away from other resolutions that directly oppose the buildup and cast Democrats as impediments to progress in Iraq.

Six Republican senators have already expressed support for one of two resolutions that explicitly criticize the Bush plan, bringing Senate Democrats close to the GOP support needed to override any filibuster.

The first, more critical of the resolutions — sponsored by Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) — was approved by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee Wednesday and sent to the Senate floor.

The second — put together by Sens. John W. Warner (R-Va.), Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine) — has the support of seven other senators, including two Republicans.

The White House has been working hard to derail both of the resolutions, which — although nonbinding — would mark the first time Congress has challenged Bush's leadership of the 4-year-old war.

"What they really want to come out of this is no resolution," said Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi, the No. 2 Republican leader in the Senate.

Cornyn said he had talked with the White House about his plans, as well as Senate Republicans and Sen. Joe Lieberman, a Connecticut Democrat who won reelection as an independent in November. Lieberman has been one of the strongest supporters of the president's plan.

Cornyn's and McCain's comments come days after House Republican leaders proposed their own measure to establish benchmarks, which they challenged Democrats to support.

"The new majority has two choices," House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said Monday. "They can either try to stop the president's new strategy and block funding for our troops, or they can join us in aggressively holding the Bush administration and the Iraqi government accountable for achieving success."

But Democrats — buoyed by public disapproval of the president and his Iraq plan — are pushing ahead with their plans to take on the White House.

Thursday, Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) took to the floor of the Senate to accuse Vice President Dick Cheney of being "out of touch with reality" for telling CNN that the administration has had "enormous successes in Iraq."

McCain Suggests Iraqi Government Meet Benchmarks (MERCN/MCT)

By Margaret Talev

The San Jose Mercury News, January 26, 2007

McClatchy Newspapers

(MCT)

WASHINGTON - Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., one of the most stalwart supporters of the war in Iraq, said Thursday that he might propose that the Iraqi government meet certain benchmarks for the United States to continue its engagement.

Fellow senators and independent political scientists said McCain's thinking reflected growing concerns within the Republican Party about the course of the war, and also might mark a turning point for the likely 2008 presidential contender, whose previous unconditional backing of the war may have hurt his prospects.

McCain said Thursday that he hadn't yet decided on precise benchmarks. "They'd have to be specific and they (the Iraqi government) would have to meet them."

Asked what penalty would be imposed if Iraq failed to meet his benchmarks, he said: "I think everybody knows the consequences. Haven't met the benchmarks? Obviously, then, we're not able to complete the mission. Then you have to examine your options."

Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott, R-Miss., a McCain ally, said many Republicans might back a resolution of the sort that McCain is suggesting. He noted that Republicans in the House of Representatives earlier this week proposed establishing a set of benchmarks and asking the Bush administration to report monthly on progress.

"Everybody wants the situation to change. Everybody wants to lay down some markers," Lott said. "We need to see some results here. A lot of people would like to be on record on something or for something."

Andrew E. Smith, a political science professor and the director of the University of New Hampshire Survey Center, said: "I think it certainly could be politically significant." New Hampshire will hold the first presidential primary of the 2008 cycle.

"This seems to me like he's trimming his sails a little on the issue," Smith said, adding: "He has a lot of company with this. He's not out on a limb. I think there is probably a deep sense of frustration among Republicans."

McCain in no way is withdrawing his backing for the war or President Bush's plan to add 21,500 troops. It was unclear what consequences or timetables McCain would spell out or whether he believes that Congress has the authority to enforce them.

Still, several Senate Democrats who oppose the troop buildup and also may seek the presidency said they were struck by McCain's comments.

"We Catholics call that an epiphany," said Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Joseph Biden, D-Del., who's sponsoring the main Democratic resolution opposing the troop buildup.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., said, "I called for that . . . several weeks ago. I'm glad that John McCain agrees with me.

"He's somebody who has enormous influence with the White House. He's been one of the key champions of this escalation of troops," Obama said, "and I think the fact that he recognizes the potential lack of follow-through on the part of the Maliki government, I think that's good."

Congress is preparing to debate up to a dozen proposals addressing Bush's plan to increase U.S. troops in Iraq. Voting could begin as soon as next week. Senate Democrats are working with a group of moderate Republicans to seek compromise language opposing the buildup. McCain isn't among them. He's long advocated that more troops are needed.

Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., said lawmakers on all sides of the war issue were weighing whether to set performance benchmarks for Iraq's government. "Maybe that's a way to bring some of these things together," Coleman said, referring to the various resolutions before Congress.

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

Senate Republicans, scrambling to head off GOP defections to a resolution opposing President Bush's war policy, are considering their own resolution demanding benchmarks to measure progress in Iraq and possibly a new diplomatic effort to end the war, senators said yesterday.

Senators from both parties began preparing for a showdown with President Bush over his plan to increase troop levels in Iraq, although that showdown may be pushed back to the week of Feb. 5. Two rival camps opposed to the additional troop deployments continued to dicker over the wording of a resolution expressing the Senate's opposition, while GOP leaders and White House loyalists plotted a response.

Minority Whip Trent Lott (Miss.) conceded that his party's leadership could not head off a vote, as the White House wants. But GOP leaders will try to force a vote on a resolution that they hope will satisfy Republicans who are leery of the president's approach but are reluctant to oppose him.

"What we need is to put together a list of benchmarks that are tough and measurable, with requirements that the administration report back on the progress," said Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), who has expressed deep concern with the Bush policy but voted against a Foreign Relations Committee resolution of opposition Wednesday.

Democrats said the GOP efforts might keep some Republicans from signing a resolution opposing the troop increase, but not all of them. At least half a dozen Republicans have already signed on to one of two nonbinding resolutions, a strongly worded measure that passed out of the Foreign Relations Committee and a more deferential version drafted by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.).

Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and his resolution's co-author, Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), requested a meeting with Warner and his supporters to try to negotiate a single resolution that could attract broad bipartisan support. Last night Warner rebuffed those overtures, saying that he will introduce his resolution on the floor as it is written and that any amendments will have to be made during open debate.

The two resolutions come to similar conclusions, opposing the introduction of an additional 21,500 troops, calling for more diplomacy and a regional peace effort, and demanding that U.S. troops be deployed away from urban sectarian hotbeds to guard Iraq's borders, hunt down terrorists and train Iraqi security forces.

But Warner's version starts with deferential language accepting Bush's constitutional powers as commander in chief, leaves rhetorical room for some additional troop deployments and treats the fight with Sunni extremists in Anbar province as a matter separate from the sectarian violence in Baghdad.

While the lawmakers negotiate, antiwar groups are launching a public relations blitz to sway Congress. A march on Washington is planned for the weekend. And a coalition of labor unions, liberal activists and Iraq war veterans, called Americans Against Escalation in Iraq, will barnstorm through Minnesota, Indiana, Ohio, Maine, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania and Virginia next week to pressure wavering Republican senators.

In each state, television advertising will show six ex-soldiers intoning: "When it comes to Iraq, America is divided. On the one hand, you've got two-thirds of the American people, a bipartisan majority in Congress, the Iraq Study Group and veterans like us, all opposed to the escalation."

Then, one of the veterans, who is missing an arm, concludes: "On the other hand, there's George Bush, who supports escalation. If you support escalation, you don't support the troops."

No Compromise Seen On Iraq Resolutions (AP)

By Anne Flaherty

The leader of a bipartisan effort to rebuke President Bush's Iraq strategy said Thursday he would not strike a compromise with a harsher Democratic resolution the Senate will debate next week.

Sen. John Warner, R-Va., former chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said he won't negotiate with Democrats to develop a single proposal on Iraq. His comments _ along with the emergence of other resolutions the Senate might consider _ underscored how a Congress largely against Bush's proposal to send more troops to Iraq remained divided over what to do about it.

Warner's decision bolsters chances that his resolution will be the one to win final Senate approval. Democrats are expected to vote for his proposal if their measure fails, and several Republicans said they prefer Warner's approach because it is less divisive.

His decision to avoid bargaining also decreases the odds that a single resolution would emerge that would garner a strong, bipartisan vote reproaching Bush's plan, which the White House hopes to avoid.

Warner's resolution would put the Senate on record as opposing Bush's decision to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq. It leaves open the possibility that a small number of forces could be sent to the western Anbar Province, where al-Qaida members are believed to be operating.

The nonbinding measure is less critical than one approved Wednesday in a 12-9 vote by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. That resolution _ introduced by Sens. Joseph Biden, D-Del., Carl Levin, D-Mich., and Chuck Hagel, R-Neb. _ states flatly that sending more troops into Iraq is "not in the national interest."

Any agreement on the two resolutions "should occur as a consequence of the will of the Senate, working in 'open' session," Warner wrote in a letter to Biden and other co-sponsors of the Democratic-driven resolution.

A full Senate vote could come as early as the week of Feb. 5, with debate beginning next week. The House is expected to follow with a vote on a similar measure.

Amid the maneuvering, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., led House members on a fact-finding trip to Iraq. And other Democrats attacked Vice President Dick Cheney for comments in a CNN interview Wednesday defending administration policy in Iraq.

"To have Vice President Cheney suggest that we have had a series of enormous successes in Iraq is delusional," said Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill.

As the Democratic-led Senate steams toward a vote on Iraq, Republicans crafted their own proposals in hopes of staving off GOP defections. Sens. John Cornyn, R-Texas, and Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., drafted separate resolutions that would voice support for the administration's Iraq policies.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said he is interested in drafting a resolution that would establish benchmarks by which the U.S. could measure the effectiveness of the troop increase.

Republican leaders, however, were unlikely to try to corral members behind a single position. Also, any agreement probably would look unfavorable for the White House because so many members have grown tired of the nearly four-year war.

David Satterfield, the State Department's senior adviser on Iraq, told a Senate panel Thursday that the increased security afforded by extra troops will make it easier to oversee rebuilding efforts in Iraq.

"We know there are no silver bullets, no guarantees regarding the question of Iraq. ... But the situation now in Iraq, and the stakes for the United States, the region and the international community, are extraordinary," Satterfield said.

Members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee responded that they were wary of pouring more money into rebuilding without a political settlement and improved security.

"I want you to know that I am not inclined to support any additional funding in this area without strong assurances that this sort of mismanagement has been alleviated," said Sen. Jim Webb, D-Va.

White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten said in an interview Thursday with National Public Radio that the administration does not expect Congress to cut the purse strings for the war. But he said the administration has some concern that the ill will that U.S. policy in Iraq has generated on Capitol Hill could hamper the ability for lawmakers to work with the White House on other issues.

"To some degree there will inevitably be some hangover of that issue into other areas, but that doesn't mean we shouldn't do the people's business," Bolten said.

US Senators Feel Weight Of Iraq Vote (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON

Back in 1971, Vietnam veteran John Kerry gave a face to the antiwar movement with a single question in televised testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee: "How do you ask a man to be the last man to die for a mistake?"

This week, Senator Kerry reprised the argument before the same panel: "How many of you here at this table believe what's happening [in Iraq] is a mistake today?" he asked, as the Foreign Relations Committee took the first congressional step opposing the strategy in Iraq since lawmakers authorized the use of force in 2002.

In the end, 12 senators – all the Democrats on the panel plus one Republican, Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska – backed a non-binding resolution opposing President Bush's "new way forward" in Iraq. The vote came 16 hours after Mr. Bush appealed to lawmakers, in his State of the Union address, to give his plan to add 21,500 US troops to the forces fighting in Iraq "a chance to work."

As the resolution moves to the full Senate next week, it's clear that deep disagreements exist within each party over how best to express doubts about the Iraq war. The result is a vivid – and very public – grappling over the terms of their disagreement.

At issue is whether the new Democrat-controlled Congress should aim for the strongest resolution opposing the troop buildup, or the one most likely to draw the largest bipartisan vote.

Even Republican senators on the foreign relations panel who did not vote for the resolution expressed serious doubts about the way the president is waging the war. But these were not enough to overcome their worries that their words could have unintended consequences – from undermining US troops to further isolating a commander in chief determined to go his own way.

"The president is deeply invested in this plan, and the deployments opposed by the resolution have already begun," warned Sen. Richard Lugar (R) of Indiana, the committee's ranking Republican, before the vote on Wednesday. "This resolution will increase the divide between the executive and legislative branches that is already unacceptably wide," he added, cautioning his colleagues not to give in to frustration with a White House that has not listened to the Congress in the past.

Those concerns are at the center of intense negotiations, as senators grapple with how to find words that will bring enough Republicans on board to get the attention of the White House, but not send a message of defeat to the troops.

The White House and its supporters on Capitol Hill want to avoid any language that will undercut the troops or undermine the mission of Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, whom the Senate on Wednesday unanimously confirmed to command US and multinational forces in Iraq.

"The goal is to try to salvage this thing and not send additional troops over with a message of disapproval from the Congress," says Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona, who supports the president on sending more troops to Iraq.

In a first move toward achieving a bipartisan consensus, the resolution's supporters agreed to drop any reference to the president's "escalating" the war in Iraq. For many Republicans, it's a loaded term that both recalls the Vietnam quagmire and appears to give Congress a claim to "micromanage" the commander in chief. Sens. Joseph Biden (D) of Delaware, Carl Levin (D) of Michigan, Olympia Snowe (R) of Maine, and Hagel, cosponsors of the resolution, agreed to drop it.

"We can't have 535 commanders in chief, and if you think the US is doomed to fail, please remember that the enemy is listening," says Sen. Lindsey Graham (R) of South Carolina, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, who opposes the resolution.

In a sharp disagreement with Kerry, Sen. Jim Webb (D) of Virginia cautioned colleagues to avoid comparisons between the Iraq war and the Vietnam War. "We're losing the support of a lot of people who supported the Vietnam War and who have problems with this [war in Iraq] if we try to lump [them] together," he said.

In the Vietnam era, senators also struggled to maintain a distinction between opposing Vietnam War policy and opposing the US forces fighting it.

"The dean of the antiwar resolutions in Vietnam, [Idaho's Democratic] Sen. Frank Church, was constantly trying to make this distinction," says Julian Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University. In the congressional debate over the Iraq war, "there's a very similar rhetorical strategy now to that period," he adds.

In the next few days, sponsors of a second resolution opposing the new White House strategy on the war – especially the involvement of US forces in combating sectarian violence – will be trying to line up backers. "Our resolution does not provide a reduction of the US forces now or provide a timetable, but it calls on the president to consider all options," specifically along the lines of the Iraq Study Group recommendations, says Sen. John Warner (R) of Virginia, the top Republican on the Armed Services Committee.

After the vote of the Foreign Relations Committee, backers of the alternative resolution – Senator Warner and cosponsors Susan Collins (R) of Maine, Norm Coleman (R) of Minnesota, and Ben Nelson (D) of Nebraska – said they had five other Democratic cosponsors for it. Both resolutions could come to the floor as early as next Wednesday.

Some criticize the resolutions as soft-pedaling. "This is not a time for legislative nuancing," said Sen. Russ Feingold (D) of Wisconsin Wednesday. "This is a time to stop the needless deaths of American troops in Iraq."

Brownback Could Back Rival Resolution Against Troop Increase (MERCN)

By Sam Hananel

The San Jose Mercury News, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON - Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback said Thursday he would not support a resolution drafted by Democrats opposing President Bush's Iraq plan, but he could back a rival proposal that contains less partisan language.

Brownback, among the first Republican lawmakers to publicly break with the president over a troop increase in Iraq, said the resolution approved this week by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is too divisive.

"I think what we ought to be discussing now as these resolutions move forward is what we should support, not what we're opposed to, and what we can pull together on, not what we're divided on," Brownback said during a conference call with reporters.

The Senate panel on Wednesday passed a resolution that rejects Bush's plans to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq as "not in the national interest." The vote on the nonbinding measure was largely along party lines, though Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., joined Democrats in offering his support.

Brownback, who is running for the 2008 GOP presidential nomination, said he prefers a milder resolution drafted by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., that leaves open the possibility of Bush sending in a much smaller number of troops.

"I believe we've got to get to a political solution. We cannot impose a military solution," Brownback said. "I also believe we have to be united here to win over there. You can't have a war with one party supporting it and one party opposing it."

Several GOP Senators, including Susan Collins, R-Maine, Norm Coleman, R-Minn., and Ben Nelson, D-Neb., have backed Warner's resolution and other Republicans, like Brownback, say they might be willing to sign on as well.

Despite his opposition to the resolution, Brownback he remains against the idea of sending more troops to Iraq.

"The Iraqis need to do the patrolling in Iraq and we should be fighting terrorists and not becoming targets for terrorists," Brownback said. "I think sending more troops delays some of those requirements that we need to have."

Asked if he would vote against funding an increase in troops, Brownback said, "I'm not at that point."

He has called on the Bush administration to step up diplomatic efforts to quell the violence in Iraq. Ultimately, Brownback said he expects to see a "three-state, one country solution" for Iraq, where the nation is divided into Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish regions, with Baghdad as a federal city.

Pataki Breaks Ranks, Opposes Iraq Troop Proposal (AP)

By Mark Humbert,

ALBANY - Former New York Gov. George Pataki, breaking ranks with President Bush and the front-runners for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, says he opposes the president's plan to send more than 20,000 additional American troops to Iraq.

Pataki's position, at odds with the support offered Bush by Sen. John McCain, former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, was made public Thursday as aides released excerpts of a speech the former governor was to deliver Friday at Georgetown University.

"A functioning democracy throughout Iraq is not essential to our achieving a military victory over al-Qaida in Iraq," said Pataki, who is eyeing a run for the 2008 nomination. "And I share the doubt of many that 20,000 additional troops alone will assure a successful democracy."

"Sending more American troops into Baghdad is unnecessary to achieve the core victory over al-Qaida in Iraq," he added. "A troop 'surge' is better suited as part of the effort to achieve a broader victory. But I oppose carrying out this surge unless the prospects for that broader victory are much greater than they appear today."

Pataki, whose eldest son is a Marine facing possible deployment to Iraq, said "before the United States government puts more troops in harm's way in Baghdad we must have confidence that the Maliki government will be an active partner in this effort."

Pataki spokesman David Catalfamo said the former governor wasn't ruling out possible future support for the Bush-backed initiative, but only if the Iraqi government proved it was getting control of the country and taking on more of the responsibility for security there.

"We must detail to the Iraqi government the terms under which we will continue to prop up its weak and struggling institutions," said Pataki. "If they want Americans to continue to die in defense of their government, if they want Americans to continue to pour tens of billions of dollars into their people's schools, services, and security, we can and must first demand action on their part."

While Pataki's comments appeared as a sharp departure from his past support of Bush on the Iraq war, the former governor began expressing reservations about the U.S.-Iraq policy after a November trip to the war zone when he said the Iraq government "is not delivering the security or the services that the people of Iraq need. That has to change and that has to change quickly."

The remarks released Thursday make it clear Pataki believes that had not happened.

"An oppressive majority can ignore the rule of law or use the power of government to deny opposition groups basic human rights," he said. "Unconstrained majorities can act in the interest of good or evil, or simply choose not to react to the evil of others. To a large extent, that has happened in Iraq."

Catalfamo said he did not expect Pataki to use the speech to announce his intentions about running for president. Pataki chose not to seek re-election last year after three terms as governor. National polls have shown Pataki trailing far behind McCain, Giuliani and Romney.

Feingold Pushes Plan To Cut Off War Funds (POL)

By John Bresnahan

The Politico, January 26, 2007

Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., has scheduled a hearing next Tuesday in his Judiciary Committee subcommittee to explore whether Congress has the authority to cut off funding for the U.S. military campaign in Iraq. The move comes as Congress prepares to vote on a congressional resolution opposing President Bush's escalation of the war.

Feingold, a fierce war critic, will force Democrats to consider an option many consider politically suicidal: denying funds to the military and U.S. soldiers to force a quicker end to the war. Democratic leaders have privately called on members to restrain from cutting off funding and focus on congressional resolutions condemning the Bush policy. The resolutions are nonbinding and therefore symbolic.

Republicans "would like this debate to be as whether or not we are going to be cutting off money for the troops," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid recently told The Politico. "The logical conclusion is that a lot of things can happen. But right now, the most important thing is to tell the president that what he has done with the escalation is wrong. And that's what we are doing, bi-partisanly."

Feingold, who chairs the Subcommittee on the Constitution, will question several witnesses, including a Library of Congress official and legal experts from Harvard, Duke, and the University of Virginia, on the issue. Senior Bush administration officials have publicly argued that Congress' has no such right, but Feingold plans to introduce legislation to force President Bush to American forces out of the troubled country.

"Congress holds the power of the purse and of the president continues to advance his failed Iraq policy, we have have the responsibility to use that power to safely redeploy our troops from Iraq," Feingold said in a statement released by his office on Thursday. "I will soon be introducing legislation to use the power of the purse to end what is clearly one of the greatest mistakes in the history of the nation's foreign policy."

Well at least we can all have a dialogue about all this.

Interesting that everyone went crazy at Hotspur's comments, even tho they're entitled to an opinion.

Obviously some people have not been around the last 6 years when Bush said -- about every single thing -- we're doing it my way and thats that. He definitely feels that he's king, and that the lord speaks to him personally, and thats fine. But not everyone subscribes to this ideology, and now some ideas are being bandied out. Man, everyone gets real freaked out when ideas are bandied about! Remember ideas?

No one wants "failure" in Iraq -- another buzzword bandied about ridiculously. What these congresspeople are doing is to try to steer the course towards something that WILL work.

As a last resort, if we all check our news sites, is that we can blast everyone with the new 'heat ray' and they'll all scatter.

I think its immaterial whether 70 or 7 percent are against the war. I think we should get out of Iraq. I imagine Bin Laden and al-Sadr feel the same way. Does that mean NOT getting out of Iraq is a better idea? No, it's worse. It's worse because it proven to be an endeavor that is not nearly worth the cost. I don't think we should have to sacrifice 3000 lives and tens of thousands maimed, AND almost 400 billion dollars....so that a country can have a democracy that did not develop organically withouth any lasting social or economic institutions held over from the previous regime. It doesn't matter that evil people want the same result that I do. No one will seriously doubt American power if we plan a stategic rereat (yes, RETREAT I have no problem with that word.)No one disputes America's unrivaled capability to execute a lightning fast, compeltely integrated (in terms of air, land, and sea), and surgically peformed invasion. No one will dispute that for a long time. The U.S is at least thirty years ahead of any country in terms of military capabilities. We have zero moral authority, it was exhausted with this fiasco. If we do pull out of Iraq, people will still think we can bomb the crap out of their country, and they'll think we can't occupy it, which is both true and something we shouldn't be doing anyway.

I think, instead of throwing personal attacks at the SENATOR (elected by his people), we need to consider the merit or lack of merit his proposition. The Senator is correct in his assertion that the Congress can allocate funding how it so chooses, especially as it pertains to the military [U.S. Constitution Article 1 Sections 7 and 8]. If we were to divulge into a Constitutional debate, there would be ?experts? for and against such an assertion but in the end, the Supreme Court will refuse to settle this dispute between the Executive and the Legislature, as it has done on no less than 3 occasions in the past. The core issue is: does this plan lack credibility, and I think it does. Why? Because by virtue of proposing this extreme to the President?s extreme of introducing more troops (humor me for a moment), the Congress is forced to fill in the gaps between the two extremes. At this juncture, the only true, enforceable alternative to President Bush?s plan is to withdraw funding but, I am almost certain that in order to avoid voting on a Fiengoldesque piece of legislation, members of Congress will be forced to develop more alternatives, which is a good thing. Who knows, maybe from the firestorm that will start because of the introduction of such a bill we may reach a happy medium and a true course in Iraq for the entire country to get on board with, which is, I think, how the framers would have envisioned such a quandary to play out. Ladies and gents, this is politics at its best. People are going say and do things that appease certain portions of the electorate so that they can maneuver themselves politically, especially as it pertains to their constituency. In politics, you can never take something at face value; as McNamara said about the Cuban Missile Crisis in the movie 13 days ?this is language to the likes of which the world has never seen. This is President Kennedy communicating [indirectly] to Premier Kruschev?. I would like to rephrase that as ?this is Cong

I hear a lot of comparasion of Iraq to WWII, but if we hadn't bombed everything and killed anything and everything the war would have lasted a lot longer. The insane and homo Hitler was one of our biggest allies and didn't even know it. He killed off so many of his brightest generals, tied their hands and wouldn't let the fight the way they needed to and couldn't properly supply them. If we hadn't been fighting their second stringers, replacement units and units recovering from the eastern front we might be speaking German or still fighting. Ever hear of the "Battle of the Bulge" again unable to supply his army. If we had to fight WWII the way were fighting in Iraq we would be speaking German. You cann't win a polically correct war in short order. And you cann't win with a bunch of cowardly "DEMOCRATS" running the show.

by Dexter on 01.26.2007 at 12:02 AM

If the same sort of polling technology that we have today were available in the late 1700s, we might still be British colonies. in the 1870s, the South might be their own nation.

The cold hard fact is that we are a Representative Republic. We are not a Democracy. The Founders were smart enough to realize that a Democracy is too unstable, in that the emotion of the public on any given day is too fluid. If the public on one day polled to got the troops out, and IF we were a democracy, then we might move the troops out. If on the next day we polled and found that the majority wanted the troops, do we move them back in?

The founders designed our government to be deliberate and slow to act. I government that can react quickly dissolves into a reactionary one, that gets nothing (or too much) done. The President is, by DESIGN, the sole Commander in Chief. The Founders wanted it this way, so that the people elect a person they trust to be the international REACTOR for the government for four years, who doesn't have to worry about the pulse of the Nation.

The Founders designed this Republic to operate as it is now. Who are we to argue with this design?

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

A recent Harris poll finds 29% of Americans feel the U.S. is losing in Iraq, compared with 10% who feel the U.S. is winning and 52% who said the U.S. is neither winning nor losing.

The poll, which was conducted Jan. 11 to 18, after President Bush proposed increasing troops in Iraq but before his State of the Union address, shows attitudes toward the president's handling of Iraq haven't budged since November: 70% of Americans said his handling of Iraq has been fair or poor over the last several months, compared with 26% who see it as good or excellent.

The online survey of 2,337 U.S. adults shows most Americans are also maintaining a negative outlook for the situation in Iraq: 61% said they aren't confident U.S. policies in Iraq will be successful, compared with 19% who have confidence in U.S. policies. Likewise, 55% say the situation for U.S. troops in Iraq is getting worse, compared with 13% who say it is getting better.

However, the poll indicates more Americans may be falling behind Mr. Bush's proposal to boost U.S. troops in Iraq: 27% of those polled said the U.S. should send more troops for a few months to stabilize the situation, up from 19% in November. Forty-four percent think a timetable should be set for the withdrawal of troops from Iraq, down from 51% in the previous poll, and 20% said the U.S. should withdraw all troops now.

When asked whether Mr. Bush appears to be listening to his generals on Iraq, 39% of respondents said they believe he is listening, but he isn't taking generals' advice and another 17% said he isn't listening to them at all; 19% think he is following their advice, while 25% aren't sure.

Harris Interactive conducted this online survey in the U.S., Jan.. 11-18, 2007, among a nationwide cross section of 2,337 adults. Figures for age, gender, race/ethnicity, education, income and region were weighted where necessary to align with population proportions. Propensity score weighting was also used to adjust for respondents' propensity to be online. In theory, with probability samples of this size, one can say with 95% certainty that the overall results have a sampling error of +/- 3 percentage points of what they would be if the entire U.S. adult population had been polled with complete accuracy. This online sample is not a probability sample.

Big Antiwar Rallies Set For L.A., D.C. And Other Cities Saturday (LAT)

By Adam Schreck And Valerie Reitman

WASHINGTON -- Emboldened by the Democratic takeover of Congress and shrinking public support for the Iraq war, antiwar groups are planning what they hope will be a massive protest Saturday on the National Mall.

Similar events are planned in dozens of cities around the United States, with some of the largest expected in Los Angeles and San Francisco. Organizers said they aim to put pressure on both the White House and Congress to end the war.

"The message will be 'Mr. President, bring our troops home,' " said Rep. Lynn Woolsey, D-Calif., one of several politicians, activists and actors scheduled to speak in Washington.

The Rev. Jesse Jackson, director of PUSH/Rainbow Coalition, one of the rally sponsors, is also scheduled to appear on the Mall, organizers said, as are Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich, D-Ohio, a longshot candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination, and actors Jane Fonda, Danny Glover, Susan Sarandon and Tim Robbins.

"We're predicting this will be one of the largest demonstrations since the war began," said Leslie Cagan, national coordinator for United for Peace and Justice, the umbrella group organizing the Washington protest.

About 300 busloads of protesters are traveling from more than 30 states to attend the rally, said United for Peace and Justice spokesman Hany Khalil.

Sgt. Scott Booker of the U.S. Park Police said organizers had initially requested a permit for 50,000 people on the Mall, but Khalil said Thursday that organizers are now expecting numbers to reach into the hundreds of thousands. When asked if he thought the revised estimate was realistic, Booker said, "It's quite possible."

The protests come at a time when polls show public support for Bush's Iraq policy and for the war itself are at all-time lows. A Times/Bloomberg poll last week found that 62 percent of those surveyed said the war was not worth fighting, and only one-third approved of the president's handling of the war. Three out of five respondents said they disapproved of Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 U.S. troops to Iraq, and about half said they wanted Congress to prevent the deployment.

Saturday's rally and march in Washington will be followed by a coordinated lobbying effort Monday to pressure lawmakers into supporting Senate and House resolutions against the deployment of additional troops to Iraq. Cagan said around 800 protesters are planning to speak with members of Congress.

Former Rep. Tom Andrews, D-Maine, national director of Win Without War, said the rally and appeal to lawmakers are part of the "most sophisticated and focused effort so far" against the war. Organizers are also calling on Congress to fully fund benefits for veterans and pay for reconstruction in Iraq.

"This is truly a movement," Andrews said. "We intend to step up and keep up pressure on Congress."

He added that plans by lawmakers to pass nonbinding resolutions against the war, such as one approved by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Wednesday, are not enough.

Antiwar Protesters Target Congress (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2007

When thousands of Iraq war protesters gather in Washington Saturday, their chants and amplified speeches are likely to be heard inside the secure grounds of the White House where the commander in chief has made his case for sending more troops into combat.

But the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue – the Capitol and the Democratic-led Congress – is where they most aim their message.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi is the main political target. War protesters want something tougher than nonbinding resolutions opposing the "surge" in additional US forces. Some want hearings on the controversial basis for the war itself, perhaps leading to the impeachment of President Bush.

It's not just the nation's capital, where busloads of people from at least 30 states are headed to make their voices heard.

Around the country, lawmakers' district offices are feeling the heat as well through Quakers' peaceful "vigils" and the occasional act of civil disobedience. In one recent case, the Episcopal bishop of northern California was arrested for blocking the door of the federal office building in San Francisco. And marches and rallies are planned in other cities, including Orlando, Fla., Seattle, San Diego, and Newark, N.J.

Major organizations are working to ensure that events do not include fringe groups and speakers, such as anarchists or socialists. Until recently, "people on the far left got control of the agenda and it became marginalized, even though the sentiment in the country increasingly became antiwar," says one organizer, who wished to remain anonymous. These days, such events feature labor union members, environmentalists, and especially active duty military people, says this source.

Organizers of the Washington event are anticipating between 300,000 and 500,000 people. Among Americans, 70 percent opposed a troop surge, according to a recent AP-Ipsos poll.

Movement organizers are careful not to indicate anything other than strong support for the troops.

"A big difference between the antiwar movement now and the one in Vietnam is that there has not been – even among the most radical of them – attacks on the troops themselves," says political scientist John Allen Williams of Loyola University Chicago. "That is absolutely crucial."

He turned against the war when he had to send his soldier son in Iraq proper body armor and night-vision equipment. "I got ticked off, and it snowballed," says Mr. Kahlor. "I started out as an upset parent trying to protect my son's unit and ended up spending hours every day writing letters and e-mails," he says, adding, "I'm just as ticked at the Democrats as the Republicans."

Nearly four years into the war, new antiwar recruits planning to travel to the rally in Washington include people like Judy Hess, who hasn't protested anything since she was in college during the Kent State shootings in 1970 when four Vietnam War protesters were killed by US National Guard troops.

"I was politically aware, politically interested, and always voted...." says Ms. Hess of Chula Vista, Calif. "But it was this war and how we got into it that really got me active."

Across the country, retiree Beverley Wiskow of Inverness, Fla., whose son-in-law has been serving in Iraq since July, will drive with three others to Washington for the protest rally and march.

"Congress clearly is not doing anything," she says. "The only hope for ending this is for the American people to say if you won't listen to us at the ballot box, perhaps you'll listen to us in the streets. I think our democracy is at stake."

Charlie Williams will leave his coffee shop in Daytona Beach, Fla., to drive north. "I think it's the moral thing to do, the right thing to do," he says. "I don't want my country getting involved in all this stuff."

These days, Phil Restino of Daytona Beach, Fla., has been spending most of his waking hours fielding calls from people in Florida and Georgia who are looking for rides to Washington or wanting to donate money.

"The phone has been ringing off the hook," says Mr. Restino, an Army veteran active with Veterans for Peace. "I haven't shaved in two days."

Eileen Fleming of Clermont, Fla., already has appointments with representatives of her two US Senators Mel Martinez (R) and Bill Nelson (D) in Washington. "We just have to hold [members of Congress] to the fire to do what we elected them to do, which is rise up and question this president, not just rubber-stamp everything."

Antiwar activities began earlier this week. A coalition of student, labor, church, and veterans' groups visited the offices of 17 US senators the morning after Mr. Bush's State of the Union address to Congress. Veterans for Peace formed up for a political assault in Washington beginning Thursday and scheduled to include a "grass-roots congressional education day" when lawmakers return to work Monday.

"The 109th Congress shirked their responsibility," says Michael McPearson, executive director of the veterans' group based in St. Louis. "The 110th Congress must stand up to the president. This is why they were elected."

Meanwhile, state legislators in half a dozen states are expected to introduce resolutions opposing what critics say is an "escalation" of US forces in Iraq.

But nonbinding resolutions don't satisfy many war opponents. Some activists want Speaker Pelosi to launch an investigation under congressional powers of impeachment.

"We're pressuring her to see if she'll let the Judiciary Committee do their work," says Norah Foster, co-chair of a San Francisco-area antiwar group that's also launched a "Pelosi Watch" to keep the spotlight on the new House speaker. "We feel that it's too important to wait; it's too serious."

"What's happening is, the left is trying to stiffen the resolve of the mainline Demo-crats," says Dr. Williams, who's also a retired naval reserve captain. The question for the political left on the eve of major demonstrations, he says, is "Do you want to be effective, or do you want to be cathartic?"

Groups Head To Capital To Step Up Antiwar Drive (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — Tens of thousands of demonstrators are set to arrive in the capital this weekend for a major antiwar march, staging the first of several protests intended to persuade the new Democratic-controlled Congress to do more than simply speak against President Bush's Iraq policy.

But do not look for senators to be standing among the protesters on the Mall on Saturday. Despite a consensus building around a Senate resolution to oppose sending more troops to Iraq, even the most liberal Democratic senators do not appear eager to align themselves with a traditional antiwar protest.

So the groups that are organizing the demonstrations against the president's strategy are also carrying out a sophisticated, well-financed lobbying campaign on Capitol Hill. Their behind-the-scenes efforts are intensifying, relying on tactics deployed in a cutthroat political race.

Americans Against Escalation in Iraq, a coalition of labor unions, MoveOn.org and other groups that have traditionally rallied against wars, has raised $1.5 million since it was formed two weeks ago. The group is singling out Republicans and Democrats who have spoken out against the war, but who have so far declined to pledge support for a resolution denouncing Mr. Bush's plan to increase the number of troops.

Next week, the group intends to fly Iraq veterans to the home states of Republican senators who serve on the Foreign Relations Committee and voted Wednesday against the resolution condemning the administration plan, including Senators Norm Coleman of Minnesota and John E. Sununu of New Hampshire. Television advertisements are scheduled to be shown in some of the same states in an effort to apply pressure before the Senate vote on the resolution in early February.

"The face of antiwar is not what it was in the '70s," said Jon Soltz, a veteran of the Iraq and Afghanistan wars who is the chairman of a group called VoteVets.

If members of Congress are slowly finding their voice opposing the administration's Iraq plan, aides to lawmakers say, it is in no small part because of the face-to-face lobbying campaign that is a central piece of the strategy employed by Americans Against Escalation in Iraq. The group plans to spend up to $9 million, said its spokesman, Brad Woodhouse, which they expect to raise through Internet solicitations and individual donations.

Mr. Soltz and nearly a dozen other veterans have been walking the halls of Congress, and they have had no problems getting appointments. One day last week, they held back-to-back meetings with Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, Democrats who are running for president in 2008.

"This battle to oppose the escalation is as important as the original battle in Iraq," said Jonathan Powers, who spent 14 months serving in Iraq as a captain with the First Armored Division. He laced up his beige combat boots and put on a blue suit as he went to Congress on a recent day of lobbying.

Senate leaders said Thursday that it appeared unlikely that any vote on an Iraq resolution would occur until the week of Feb. 5. Efforts to meld differing resolutions opposing the troop buildup faltered Thursday when Senators John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, and Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska, chose not to negotiate with those behind a competing plan approved by the Foreign Relations Committee.

Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., the Delaware Democrat who is the chairman of the panel, and his allies had offered to try to merge the resolutions, saying the differences could be overcome, clearing the way for a consensus measure.

But Mr. Warner has been reluctant to consider the idea of merging the two, a move that could bring a strong bipartisan vote against the president. In a written response to Mr. Biden, Senators Warner and Nelson said they would rather work out any disagreements on the floor "as a consequence of the will of the Senate."

In an interview on Thursday evening, Mr. Biden expressed disappointment that Mr. Warner did not agree to negotiate, but he added that a full-fledged debate on the Senate floor would be "healthy."

Mr. Coleman said he saw the Warner approach as less partisan than the plan offered by Mr. Biden and allies who included Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska.

"The Warner resolution, I think, offers an opportunity for a lot of us to express a concern about an aspect of the policy without taking a shot at the president," Mr. Coleman said.

The White House spokesman, Tony Snow, acknowledged the administration had been talking with Mr. Warner about his initiative. "We're trying to take his temperature on what he intends," Mr. Snow said.

Supporters of the president's policy were developing resolutions of their own. Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, said he would propose giving the Iraqis a series of benchmarks to demonstrate progress. A draft proposal from Senator John

Cornyn, Republican of Texas, declares that "the United States military leadership in Iraq should be given a reasonable chance to execute the new plan for Iraq."

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the majority leader, began trying to frame what could be a muddled procedural fight in the Senate by emphasizing that in the end, there is likely to be a bipartisan majority of senators going on record in opposition to Mr. Bush's approach in Iraq.

"For the first time in an intractable war," Mr. Reid said, "a bipartisan group of senators is going to tell the president that 'what you are doing is wrong."

But it remained an open question whether critics of the war would wait patiently for Democrats and Republicans to reach agreement.

"The country has told us they don't like what's happening, and they want us to do something about it," said Representative Lynn Woolsey, a California Democrat who is one of four members of Congress (none of them senators) scheduled to attend the rally on Saturday. "Congress has yet to keep up with the public."

Americans Against Escalation in Iraq receives its organizational and financial muscle, at least in part, from the Service Employees International Union, the largest labor organization in the country, which wields significant influence in Democratic politics. For the first time, the union is speaking out against the plan to increase troops in Iraq.

"There was an election that showed clear consequences," said Andrew L. Stern, the president of the union. "It's incumbent on Democrats to express their disagreement with the president."

While Democrats have shown little reticence speaking against the president's plan, there is little agreement on the next step. Next week, Senator Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin, is convening a hearing to discuss the ways in which Congress can begin blocking the financing for the war, an idea that remains deeply controversial inside the party.

"It's a walk in the park right now to oppose the idea of this war. It's also very easy to oppose the escalation," Mr. Feingold said. "They are once again being too timid and too cautious."

BAGHDAD — Iraq's prime minister vowed Thursday that his crackdown in Baghdad will leave militants nowhere to hide.

In a speech to the parliament that drew praise from the White House, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki urged politicians on all sides to support his new Baghdad security plan, backed by 17,000 additional U.S. troops who have begun arriving in the capital. President Bush has said Iraq's government must crack down on sectarian militias as a first step to reducing violence.

"There will be no safe haven — no school, no home, no (Sunni) mosque or Shiite mosque. They will all be raided if they are turned into a launch pad for terrorism, even the headquarters of political parties," al-Maliki said. He said his determination had already borne fruit. "I know that senior criminals have left Baghdad, others have fled the country," he said.

White House spokesman Tony Snow called al-Maliki's speech "a very assertive address. … We certainly welcome that, because it demonstrates the kind of vigor we've been talking about … and also responds specifically to concerns members of Congress have been expressing, in terms of the aims of and the determination of the government of Iraq."

Al-Maliki vowed to reverse the sectarian violence that has driven thousands from their homes. "We will detain every person who is living in the house of a displaced person in order to open the door for those displaced to return," he said.

The ensuing debate was contentious. Abdul-Nasser al-Janabi, a Sunni legislator and cleric, took the floor and accused the Shiite-dominated government of carrying out purges against Sunnis. Al-Maliki angrily denied the accusation and refused to shake hands with al-Janabi after the session.

Al-Maliki Promises A Safe Iraq (WT/AP)

By Bassem Mroue

The Washington Times, January 26, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki pledged in a speech to parliament yesterday that the militants who have made life intolerable in Baghdad would not be safe anywhere in Iraq in the face of a coming U.S.-Iraqi security sweep.

Mr. al-Maliki did not reveal the details of the plan, which he has dubbed "Operation Imposing Law," or say when it would begin. But he made clear that it would not be the last such battle against the militants.

"We are full of hope. We have no other choice but to use force and any place where we receive fire will not be safe even if it is a school, a mosque, a political party office or home," he said. "There will be no safe place in Iraq for terrorists."

As if to underline the urgency of the security drive, an extremist exploded a suicide bomb in the Shi'ite neighborhood of Karradah, killing at least 26 persons just hours after the prime minister spoke. In other violence, two rockets slammed into the Green Zone not far from the U.S. Embassy.

Meanwhile, the mayor of Baghdad's Sadr City said he reached agreement with political and religious groups to keep weapons off the streets of the heavily populated Shi'ite militia stronghold, and has presented the deal to U.S. and Iraqi government officials in an apparent attempt to avoid a crackdown on the area.

Rahim al-Darraji said Iraqi troops will be in charge of security in the sprawling district in eastern Baghdad. His comments come amid fears that Sadr City, the main headquarters of the Mahdi Army militia, could be a major target in the planned crackdown.

U.S. officials have indicated that the security operation, to which President Bush has pledged an additional 21,500 troops, should start in earnest about Feb. 1. A brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division already has arrived for the mission.

The prime minister vowed yesterday to go after those behind Baghdad's rampant violence regardless of their sectarian beliefs, promising at the same time to ensure the human rights of innocent Iraqis.

Past attempts to secure the capital have failed, and many critics said it was because Mr. al-Maliki intervened to protect members of the Mahdi Army militia that is run by one of his prime political backers, Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

"The firing of officers and civil servants under the pretext of de-Ba'athification should stop. What kind of national reconciliation are you talking about when you are implementing rules that marginalize" Sunnis, he asked.

"Stop sentencing innocent people to death because such sentences are politically motivated," Mr. al-Janabi implored, adding that Sunnis do not trust the government.

Mr. al-Maliki counterattacked by implying that Mr. al-Janabi was responsible for the kidnapping of 150 persons in Anbar province, the Sunni stronghold west of Baghdad.

"This brother will trust the Cabinet when I come forward with your file and show that you are responsible. There are 150 people detained in Buhayrat area, and you don't speak about them," Mr. al-Maliki snapped. Buhayrat is an insurgent stronghold in Anbar.

In his address, Mr. al-Maliki also called on lawmakers to enact laws on distribution of the country's oil wealth and reverse measures that have excluded many Sunnis from jobs and government positions because of Ba'ath Party membership.

Mr. al-Maliki also promised to stop the so-called practice of sectarian cleansing that has driven thousands from their homes.

"You should know that today or tomorrow we will detain every person who is living in the house of a displaced person in order to open the door for those displaced to return," Mr. al-Maliki said.

White House spokesman Tony Snow called the speech "a very assertive address. ... We certainly welcome that, because it demonstrates the kind of vigor we've been talking about and that the American people expect, and also responds specifically to concerns members of Congress have been expressing, in terms of the aims of and the determination of the government of Iraq."

After the car bombing, angry Karradah residents took to the streets chanting, "We want the Sunnis out." It was the second suicide bombing in three days in the neighborhood. The explosion destroyed three minivans, 11 cars and dozens of shops, as well as the local post office, a resident said.

Seven charred bodies were visible in one of the vans, including that of a woman who was half out a window in an apparent attempt to escape the inferno. Another women dressed in black was seen screaming in front of her son's shop, where he was killed. Ambulances raced from the scene, at least one with the back door still open and bodies stacked in the back.

A second huge explosion later rattled the capital, but police said it was a controlled blast to destroy a second car explosive that had been disabled before its suicide bomber could detonate it.

As the rockets fell and bombs exploded across the Tigris River, the public-address system inside the Green Zone compound could be heard warning in English that people should take cover because "this is not a drill."

Five persons were wounded in the rocket attack, none seriously. Mortar and rocket attacks hit the zone frequently, but reported casualties are rare.

Police yesterday reported 61 killed in sectarian violence nationwide, including the bodies of 22 torture victims dumped in Baghdad, and a parliamentary debate was suspended briefly after arguments broke out between Sunnis and Shi'ites over security.

Iraq Leader And Sunni Officials In Sectarian Clash On Security (NYT)

By Marc Santora

BAGHDAD, Jan. 25 — Iraq's Shiite prime minister and Sunni lawmakers hurled insults at one another during a raucous session of Parliament on Thursday, with the prime minister threatening a Sunni lawmaker with arrest and the Sunni speaker of Parliament threatening to quit.

The uproar revolved around the new Baghdad security plan, but it came as the prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, is under increasing pressure to demonstrate even-handedness. President Bush's new strategy for Iraq hinges in large measure on the Iraqi government's ability to rein in both Shiite and Sunni militants.

In Parliament on Thursday, Mr. Maliki focused his anger on Sunni lawmakers, accusing one of being involved in sectarian kidnappings. The confrontation erupted after Mr. Maliki described the outlines of the new Baghdad security plan and pledged there would be no "safe haven" for militants.

The leader of a powerful Sunni bloc, Abdul Nasir al-Janabi, provoked Mr. Maliki, saying over jeers from Shiite politicians, "We cannot trust the office of the prime minister."

His microphone was quickly shut off, and Mr. Maliki lashed into him, essentially accusing him of being one of the outlaws he had just said would not be granted sanctuary.

"I will show you," Mr. Maliki said, waving his finger in the air. "I will turn over the documents we have," implying that the legislator was guilty of crimes.

While the politicians battled in Parliament, the sectarian battle on the streets went on unabated, with 25 people killed by a suicide car bomb in a Shiite neighborhood in Baghdad.

It was the latest in a series of attacks directed at Shiites, claiming more than 200 lives in little more than a week and increasing pressure on Mr. Maliki to restrain his supporters from exacting revenge. Sunni leaders and critics of the administration's strategy remain deeply skeptical about Mr. Maliki's ability or desire to confront the Shiite militias, particularly the Mahdi Army of Moktada al-Sadr, one of his most important political backers.

American military officers say they have seen evidence in the past of the Maliki government using its influence with Iraq's security forces to further a sectarian agenda, turning a blind eye to Shiite militia death squads while cracking down on Sunni insurgents.

Mr. Maliki spent much of his speech before Parliament trying to counter that image, going further than he has before by promising to stop sectarian militias from driving rivals out of their neighborhoods and to return houses to their rightful owners. It is a daunting challenge given that the map of Baghdad has been almost completely redrawn along sectarian lines over the past year, displacing hundreds of thousands of people.

"Let it be known today or tomorrow, we will start arresting anybody who took by force the house of a displaced family," he said.

The prime minister's claims were challenged by Mr. Janabi, who leads the Sunni-dominated Tawafiq Party.

Mr. Janabi, over jeers from the Shiite politicians in the room, said that the government should suspend executions, which he said were being used for political purposes, and called for parliamentary oversight of the new security plan to be sure Sunnis were not unfairly singled out.

It was when he questioned Mr. Maliki's trustworthiness that the prime minister issued his vague threat to turn over incriminating information about Mr. Janabi. With that, the speaker of Parliament, Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, a Sunni, slammed his gavel down and condemned the prime minister and those who applauded him.

"That is unacceptable, Mr. Prime Minister," Mr. Mashhadani said over the tumult. "It is unacceptable, Mr. Prime Minister, to make such accusations against a lawmaker under the dome of Parliament."

But Mr. Maliki pressed on.

"What about the 150 people kidnapped near Al Bairaat?" he said, referring to an area by a lake south of Baghdad where Mr. Janabi has his base of support.

Mr. Janabi could not be reached for comment but another member of his party, Dhafer al-Ani, said Mr. Maliki was trying to "terrify" his opponents into silence. "If there are documents against him showing crimes, why were they not revealed until this session?" he said in an interview. "What kept him silent all this time?"

In the Parliament room, politicians shouted over one another trying to be heard. Mr. Mashhadani finally yelled for everyone to "shut up." He then used an ancient Arabic phrase, literally meaning to "put your stuff on the camel," which roughly translates as, "We expect more of this body." He said in disgust, "I cannot see how it is possible that a new security plan can work."

The session of Parliament was attended by nearly all members, a rarity in recent months, and was broadcast live on Iraqi national television.

The lawmakers had their shouting match while sitting beneath a banner with a phrase from the Koran that extols the importance of a civil debate in making good decisions.

Shatha al-Mousawi, a lawmaker from the Mr. Maliki's leading Shiite bloc, the United Iraqi Alliance, said some politicians were simply grandstanding for the cameras. But she said the fighting continued after Mr. Mashhadani abruptly called an end to the session and the cameras were turned off.

Mr. Mashhadani demanded that the prime minister apologize to Mr. Janabi. Members of Mr. Maliki's party said Mr. Janabi was the one who should apologize, Ms. Mousawi said.

Mr. Mashhadani then threatened to quit.

"Someone said you do not need to quit, we will dismiss you," she said.

Mr. Mashhadani called a Shiite politician a "psychopath," as the bitter exchanges continued.

Eventually, though, the tensions eased and Parliament approved the security plan.

No sooner had they finished their business than three rockets exploded in the heavily fortified Green Zone, where Parliament is housed. Lou Fintor, a spokesman for the United States Embassy, said that no one was killed in the attacks.

Um Mohammed, a woman who lives across the street from the site of the bombing, said she saw two buses full of people burn with the passengers trapped inside, dying agonizing deaths.

The attack occurred as people were leaving work, the streets crowded with traffic and local clothes stores packed with customers.

Her neighbor had just sent her 9-year-old boy, Amar Ali Habib, out to play with friends, she said.

"He took his ball and left the house."

Moments later, he was dead. The explosion was so powerful, she said, that pieces of one man's body were blown about 50 yards from where the car detonated.

Afterward, she said, many young men took to the streets. Some called for vengeance against Sunnis while others condemned the government for failing to do anything.

Looking At The Surge From The Other Side (WP)

By Gary Anderson

Policy Memo From the Planning Directorate, Mahdi Army:

We have completed a review of the new American surge strategy announced by their president. In analyzing possible courses of action, we must make two key assumptions:

First, it represents their administration's last chance to change course given the reported mood of the American public and their legislature. For us, this presents both opportunity and danger. We have to assume that we are the primary Shiite target of this plan. How we respond will largely determine how we position ourselves for operations after the Americans are gone.

Second, our Sunni adversaries will not be able to react in a coordinated manner; they are expected to remain divided in their actions and motivations.

Our first potential course of action would be to openly resist government and American efforts to gain control over Sadr City and other predominately Shiite neighborhoods. Potential advantage: Waging a stand-up battle could create such chaos and so many disturbing images of casualties -- American and Iraqi -- that the American public and Congress will demand an immediate withdrawal.

The disadvantages here are that such a battle would weaken us by causing attrition to our best fighters. We are just now recovering from the casualties that we sustained in the 2004 fighting with the occupiers. We must keep in mind (and be prepared for) the inevitable post-American battles with the Sunnis and the Badr Organization.

A second potential course of action is classic insurgent strategy: going to ground when confronted by enemy strength. The object here would be to lull the enemy into a false sense of security, perhaps enough for him to begin decreasing his strength early. Once the Americans have carried out a significant drawdown, we could openly challenge the government forces and attempt to push them out of our areas of influence. It is very likely this would have the effect of the Vietnamese Tet Offensive in convincing the Americans that nothing they do will work. It is also unlikely that their administration could get support for reinforcing Baghdad once they have begun to reduce troop levels.

Potential drawbacks:

First, there is always the chance that the Americans and the Maliki government will use this period to significantly increase the capability of the security forces and actually gain public support through increasing public service and employment, rendering us far less useful to Maliki. Given their performance to date, this is a remote possibility, but it cannot be totally discounted.

More likely is that some of our more enthusiastic fighters will resist on their own authority. Given the decentralized nature of our command-and-control system, this possibility must be considered. One solution would be to create training camps outside of Baghdad where we could hone their skills for urban combat (necessary if we are to succeed in the future). This would keep them occupied and out of the way.

A third course would be to avoid challenging the Americans and government forces directly but continue to attack them with IEDs and snipers. There will be many more American targets on the street, and a continuing stream of casualties would further undermine American public support. This has the advantage of keeping our fingerprints off such operations because the Sunnis will probably do this regardless of what we do. This also conserves our combat power. It shares the potential disadvantage that the American "hearts and minds" strategy may actually work and that the security forces will increase in capability. Again, we think this is unlikely.

Consequently, this final course seems to be the one most likely to serve our long-term interests by preserving our capabilities and allowing the Sunnis to bear the brunt and take the blame for most anti-government action. Clearly, America's time here is limited. Hurrying its exit at the cost of weakening our position does not make sense. We have been patient for a thousand years; another year or so is nothing.

If God wills it, we will be successful.

Vague rules

Defense officials tell us one of the rules of engagement for U.S. combat troops in Iraq is vague and written by lawyers with little or no battle experience. The result is that troops are at risk of getting killed in action because of military lawyers' penchant for ambiguity.

One troubling rule that is among several printed on the card given to troops going into combat is "use minimum force necessary to decisively eliminate the threat." It is viewed by many in the military as ambiguous and confusing.

"Does it mean you are obligated to wrestle with a threat rather than shoot him or her?" one defense official asked. "That is how a lot of police officers lose their lives each year, as the criminal gains control of the police officer's firearm. How about approaching and/or wrestling a threat who, it turns out, is a homicide bomber?"

Bottom line: There is no way in law to define "minimum deadly force," the official said.

It is not known whether the imprecise rules directly led to the deaths in action of U.S. troops in Iraq, but some say it is likely because the rules are overly cautious and vague, an apparent outgrowth of destructive political correctness applied to war.

"A major part of the problem is that military commanders have surrendered their responsibility for ROE [rules of engagement] preparation and approval to lawyers lacking the knowledge, training and experience to prepare ROE. Unsure of themselves, they err to caution and ambiguity," the official said.

Said a second official: "Only someone who hasn't been in a close gunfight could find that a reasonable set of ROE."

And a third official said of the "minimum" requirement: "Interesting. Someone did not take the Napoleon Orders class" — a reference to making sure that orders issued to troops are clear.

We're told that one of the first things Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the next commander of forces in Iraq, needs to do is demand an overhaul of the rules of engagement by line officers, not lawyers, so that ambiguities will be eliminated and lives saved.

A spokesman for Multinational Forces-Iraq could not be reached for comment.

Petraeus prediction

Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, asked Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the incoming commander in Iraq, what happens if the United States leaves Iraq.

"There is the very real possibility of involvement of countries from elsewhere in the region, around Iraq, entering Iraq to take sides with one or the other groups," Gen. Petraeus said at his Senate Armed Services confirmation hearing this week. "There is the possibility, certainly, of an international terrorist organization truly getting a grip on some substantial piece of Iraq. There is the possibility of problems in the global economy, should in fact this cause a disruption to the flow of oil — and a number of other potential outcomes, none of which are positive."

World government

House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Tom Lantos, California Democrat, announced his committee's organization this way: "Members formed subcommittees with jurisdictions spanning the Earth and covering a range of the most pressing global challenges."

Korea, not Vietnam

Sen. James H. Webb Jr., Virginia Democrat and decorated war hero, gave the Democrats' response to President Bush's State of the Union address, and likened Iraq to the 1950-53 Korean War.

Mr. Webb said, "As I look at Iraq, I recall the words of former general and soon-to-be President Dwight Eisenhower during the dark days of the Korean War, which had fallen into a bloody stalemate. 'When comes the end?' asked the general who had commanded our forces in Europe during World War II. And as soon as he became president, he brought the Korean War to an end."

We think that is an apt comparison, but probably not for the same reason as Mr. Webb's.

Like Iraq, the U.S. war in Korea was dogged by poor planning, the wrong types of troops, failed tactics and major miscalculations, such as China coming to the communist north's defense. The American death toll: 36,000 in theater.

But in the end, America won. The north's invasion was reversed and the south was preserved. It matured into one of the world's great democracies, free markets and U.S. allies. And a free South Korea helped blunt Josef Stalin's plan for a communist Asia. What some have called the "forgotten war" was messy and unpopular. It drove Harry S. Truman from office. But it made the world a better place. It just took 30 years to realize it.

Moving on

Word in the Pentagon is that Eric Ruff, press secretary to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, will leave the building later this year.

Mr. Ruff had worked as a special assistant for more than two years in May when Mr. Rumsfeld named him press secretary. Mr. Rumsfeld left office in December, succeeded by Robert M. Gates.

Mr. Ruff forged a close working relationship with Mr. Rumsfeld, advising him on communication strategy.

He is generally liked by the Pentagon press corps, which finds him accessible and responsive.

Mr. Ruff has served in a number of government public affairs jobs, including press secretary to Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, and Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, Texas Republican.

The un-Rumsfeld

Our colleague David Sands traveled with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates last week. He filed this report:

Mr. Gates made a quickie post-confirmation trip to Baghdad last month. But Secretary Gates' seven-country, five-day, 13-flight swing through Western Europe, Central Asia and the Middle East last week was the real shakedown cruise for the secretary, his generals and admirals, his schedulers, his staff and the Pentagon press corps. All were still recovering from six years of verbal and policy jousts with former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

The new boss relies on notes from index cards in his public remarks, using few of the colorful metaphors or eloquent hand gestures favored by his predecessor. For journalists, the good news is that low-key, soft-spoken Mr. Gates rarely challenges the premises of their questions, another favorite Rumsfeld tactic. The bad news is that he answers only as much of the question as he wants.

Mr. Gates did let slip a few personal insights on the trip. His long years in the CIA served him well, as he could recall previous visits to virtually every stop on the tour. He even reminisced with Romanian journalists in Iraq about his 1975 trip there.

He frankly acknowledged the "risk" to his reputation in leaving a job he dearly loved as president of Texas A&M University to head the Pentagon in the depths of the Iraq war. But he added, "I think if you put your personal interests — including protecting your reputation — ahead of a sense of duty, you've got your values screwed up."

And the Pentagon chief strongly hinted that his future fact-finding missions will feature either fewer stops or more days.

"I've found at least one fact," he said in Iraq on the trip's final full day. "I'm too old to do seven countries in 5½ days."

Suicide Car Bombing Kills 26 In Baghdad (AP)

Iraq's prime minister insisted Thursday there will be "no safe place in Iraq for terrorists," hours before a suicide car bombing killed at least 26 people in the Shiite neighborhood of Karradah and two rockets slammed into the heavy fortified Green Zone not far from the U.S. Embassy.

Angry Karradah residents took to the streets chanting "We want the Sunnis out!" after the blast, the second suicide bombing in three days in the neighborhood. The explosion destroyed three minivans, 11 cars and dozens of shops, as well as the local post office, according to a resident.

Seven charred bodies were visible in one of the vans, including that of a woman who was half out a window in an apparent attempt to escape the inferno. Another women dressed in black was seen screaming in front of her son's shop, where he was killed. Ambulances raced from the scene, at least one with the back door still open and bodies stacked in the back.

A second huge explosion later rattled the capital, but police said it was a controlled blast to destroy a second car explosive that had been disabled before its suicide bomber could detonate it.

As the rockets fell and bombs exploded across the Tigris River, the public address system inside the Green Zone compound could be heard warning in English that people should take cover because "this is not a drill."

Five people were wounded in the rocket attack, none seriously. Mortar and rocket attacks hit the zone frequently but reported casualties are rare.

The attacks came on a day that police reported 61 killed in sectarian violence nationwide, including the bodies of 22 torture victims dumped in Baghdad, and a parliamentary debate was suspended briefly after arguments broke out between Sunnis and Shiites over security.

Parliament held yet another raucous session, this time witnessing a heated exchange between Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and Sunni legislator and cleric Abdul-Nasser al-Janabi, who accused the Shiite-dominated government of carrying out purges against Sunnis, the minority sect in Iraq.

The prime minister was seeking support for his and President Bush's plan to crush sectarian violence in Baghdad.

Al-Maliki gave no details for the plan, which he named "Operation Imposing Law," nor did he say when it would begin. U.S. officials have indicated the security operation, to which Bush has pledged an additional 21,500 American soldiers, should start in earnest about Feb. 1. A brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division already has arrived for the mission.

The prime minister vowed to go after those behind Baghdad's rampant violence no matter where they try to hide and regardless of sectarian beliefs, promising at the same time to ensure the human rights of innocent Iraqis.

"We are full of hope. We have no other choice but to use force and any place where we receive fire will not be safe even if it is a school, a mosque, a political party office or home," he said. "There will be no safe place in Iraq for terrorists."

But al-Janabi took the floor and said al-Maliki's government had gratuitously and summarily fired former members of Saddam Hussein's ousted Baath party from government jobs, sentenced people to death for political reasons and detained without reason Sunni pilgrims returning from the hajj in Saudi Arabia this month.

He also accused al-Maliki of running a sham program to reconcile Sunni-Shiite differences that have produced a near-civil war in Baghdad and prompted the new security drive _ the third since al-Maliki took office May 25.

"The firing of officers and civil servants under the pretext of de-Baathification should stop. What kind of national reconciliation are you talking about when you are implementing rules that marginalize" Sunnis, he asked.

"Stop sentencing innocent people to death because such sentences are politically motivated," al-Janabi implored, adding that Sunnis do not trust the government.

Al-Maliki counterattacked by implying al-Janabi was responsible for the kidnapping of 150 people in Anbar province, the Sunni stronghold west of Baghdad.

"This brother will trust the Cabinet when I come forward with your file and show that you are responsible. There are 150 people detained in Buhayrat area and you don't speak about them," al-Maliki snapped. Buhayrat is an insurgent stronghold in Anbar.

Parliament speaker Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, a Sunni, then organized a short suspension of the debate, called a vote on the security plan _ which was approved unanimously _ and continued with normal business.

Al-Maliki refused to shake hands when al-Janabi approached him after the session.

Angry and insulting exchanges have become normal in Iraq's 275-member parliament, but the involvement of the nation's leader heightened the tension.

Parliamentary sessions previously were broadcast live, but the government has since ordered them to be aired with a 30-minute delay to allow editing.

During Thursday's session, state-run Iraqiya television stopped airing the session shortly after the exchange and later aired an edited version.

In his address al-Maliki also called on lawmakers to pass laws on distribution of the country's oil wealth and reverse measures that have excluded many Sunnis from jobs and government positions because of Baath party membership.

Al-Maliki also promised to stop the so-called practice of sectarian cleansing that has driven thousands from their homes.

"You should know that today or tomorrow we will detain every person who is living in the house of a displaced person in order to open the door for those displaced to return," al-Maliki said.

White House spokesman Tony Snow called the speech "a very assertive address. ... We certainly welcome that, because it demonstrates the kind of vigor we've been talking about and that the American people expect, and also responds specifically to concerns members of Congress have been expressing, in terms of the aims of and the determination of the government of Iraq."

Until Monday, parliament had not had a quorum since late November, when 30 legislators and five Cabinet members loyal to renegade Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr announced a boycott of the government and the National Assembly to protest al-Maliki's meeting with Bush in Jordan.

The boycott was a blow to al-Maliki, who owes his job to support from the Sadr bloc in parliament.

On Sunday the Sadr legislators ended their walkout under threat that they would be ousted from the political process and that their allied militia, the Mahdi Army, could face wholesale attack by American soldiers in the coming security sweep.

At Least 24 Killed In Car Bombings In Baghdad (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 25 -- Two car bombs detonated in a busy commercial area of central Baghdad on Thursday afternoon, killing at least 24 people and injuring dozens more, Iraqi officials said.

The bombs were placed in Karrada, a predominantly Shiite Muslim sector of the city, and wounded at least 60 people when detonated, according to a spokesman for the Iraqi Interior Ministry. A set of car bombs killed at least 79 people in a Shiite market in central Baghdad on Monday.

The Karrada explosions occurred shortly after at least two rockets struck the U.S. Embassy compound in the fortified Green Zone. The rockets injured six people, one of them seriously, the U.S. military said in a statement.

U.S. Embassy spokesman Lou Fintor said the rounds landed inside the compound shortly after 4 p.m.

"The damage was minor, and the embassy is functioning normally," Fintor said. "It wasn't a densely populated area." He said that no U.S. citizens were injured and that none of the injuries was life-threatening.

Also Thursday, a soldier from the U.S.-led coalition was killed northwest of Baghdad when a roadside bomb exploded near his vehicle, the military said in a statement. The soldier's identity was withheld pending notification of next of kin.

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki asked lawmakers Thursday to embrace his security plan for the capital, which he said would target militants aggressively regardless of sect.

"Some people are saying that it targets the Shiites, and others say that it targets Sunnis," Maliki said. "While I say that it targets everyone."

Maliki offered few details of the initiative. While acknowledging the support of U.S. forces, he said the security plan is being driven by the Iraqi government. "This is a 100 percent Iraqi plan and under Iraqi command," he said, adding that the American military's role is "just to provide backup."

Reporters who have accompanied U.S. and Iraqi forces on joint missions in recent months have described American forces as taking control of the operations. Several U.S. soldiers have told reporters they don't trust the ability, competence or commitment of their Iraqi counterparts.

Maliki, a Shiite, has faced questions at home and abroad about his ability and willingness to enforce the law uniformly amid unrelenting sectarian violence in a country with a weak criminal justice system. He urged lawmakers during his speech to help him keep sectarian tensions from hindering the security plan.

But Thursday's session showed the extent to which sectarian tensions influence the political process. Abdul Nasser al-Janabi, a Sunni Muslim legislator who belongs to a bloc that wants U.S. troops to leave and has criticized Maliki for favoring Shiites, lashed out at the prime minister and criticized his security plan.

An exasperated Maliki appeared to threaten Janabi: "This brother will trust the prime ministry when I bring your file forward and hold you responsible." He did not elaborate.

Numerous other violent acts were reported in the capital and elsewhere Thursday.

A suicide bomber on a motorcycle slammed into a market in central Baghdad, killing eight people and injuring 18, according to a spokesman at the Interior Ministry. At least seven people were killed by improvised explosive devices elsewhere in the city.

Insurgents Post Video Of Downed Copter (AP)

By Maamoun Youssef

AP, January 26, 2007

An insurgent group that has claimed responsibility for the downing this week of a U.S. helicopter in Baghdad that killed five Americans posted a video Thursday on an Islamic Web site showing the wreckage and two bodies.

The 1-minute, 14-second video carried the logo of the 1920 Revolution Brigades, a known Sunni militant group. It showed wreckage of a helicopter with bricks scattered around it. The naked bodies of two men, one with gray hair and the other with dark hair, were seen near the wreckage.

"Our heroes were able to shoot the film of the helicopter wreckage after they downed it over a roof of a house of a citizen," said a statement from the group.

Iraqi and U.S. officials said earlier that four of the five Americans who died in the downing of a U.S. security company's helicopter in a dangerous Sunni neighborhood in central Baghdad on Tuesday were shot in the head execution-style _ though it was unclear if they were alive when shot.

The two bodies shown in the video had no visible gunshot wounds to the head or any other visible wounds. The dark-haired man's hair was tangled and matted but it was difficult to see from the footage if it was blood or dirt.

Another militant group, Ansar al-Sunnah Army, which also has claimed responsibility for downing the helicopter, said in a statement posted Wednesday on an Islamic Web site that its fighters "rushed toward the crash of the helicopter while under fire from a second (U.S.) helicopter and killed three U.S. soldiers."

The authenticity of the two statements could not be verified.

The helicopter, owned by Blackwater USA, swooped into electrical wires and crashed after racing to help a U.S. Embassy ground convoy that had come under fire in the Sunni neighborhood. U.S. officials said it was not clear if gunfire brought down the aircraft or caused its pilot to veer into the wires during evasive maneuvers.

A second helicopter also was hit but there were no casualties among its crew, a Washington official said.

The Ansar al-Sunnah Army posted with its statement an ID card it claimed was from a man who was on the helicopter. The card bore the name of Arthur Laguna, later identified by his mother as among those killed. Laguna was a 52-year-old pilot for Blackwater, which provides security for State Department officials in Iraq, trains military units from around the world, and works for corporate clients.

The crash of Blackwater's small surveillance helicopter was the second in a week associated with the U.S. war effort in Iraq.

A U.S. Army Black Hawk helicopter went down Saturday northeast of Baghdad, killing all 12 service members on board, including two colonels, one lieutenant colonel and two command sergeants major. It was the largest number of key officers and sergeants killed in a single incident since the Iraq war started nearly four years ago.

Iraq's Violence Tests Limits Of Humanitarians' Resolve (USAT)

By Emily Bazar

The slaying last week of an American working for a democracy-building project in Iraq is just the latest in a series of attacks testing the resolve of relief groups and other international organizations working there.

Since 2003, at least 82 Iraqi and international aid workers have been killed, 80 kidnapped and 245 wounded in Iraq, says Kasra Mofarah of the NGO Coordination Committee in Iraq, which assists non-governmental organizations (NGOs) such as charities and relief groups.

Those figures do not include attacks on staff members with democracy-building groups such as the Washington-based National Democratic Institute. Last week, institute staffer Andrea Parhamovich, 28, was killed when her convoy was ambushed in Baghdad.

As the violence gets worse, groups that aim to help rebuild Iraq and provide medical and other services are pulling out or relocating to less violent parts of the country, even as the need for their assistance has grown.

"The bigger organizations have made a decision to pull out," usually after a staffer has died, says Samuel Worthington, president of InterAction, an alliance of about 165 humanitarian organizations. "We have the world's largest unfolding humanitarian disaster … and our ability to function on the ground compared to the size of the disaster is completely out of sync."

Typically, 40 to 50 InterAction groups respond to a crisis, he says. There are fewer than 10 in Iraq.

Mofarah says there are about 80 international aid groups still active in Iraq. There were 300 in 2003.

Most humanitarian organizations have moved their non-Iraqi staff members to safer locations, such as northern Iraq or Jordan, says Greg Hansen, a consultant to the Feinstein International Center at Tufts University. The organizations maintain a low profile, he says: They don't display their logos, they work out of homes instead of offices, and they avoid coordinating with other groups to keep their actions quiet.

As dangerous as the situation is, some groups avoid seeking protection from soldiers or armed guards because they don't want to be seen as taking sides or be mistaken for government or military personnel, Hansen says.

Les Campbell, the National Democratic Institute's regional director for the Middle East, declined to say how many people the institute has in Iraq or where they are, except that they work outside the high-security Green Zone in Baghdad.

The group, which trains locals in democratic political processes, has been soul-searching since Parhamovich's death. "We're going to try to assess whether or not we can still make a difference," he says.

The Los Angeles-based humanitarian group Relief International pulled its non-Iraqi staff out in mid-2004, says program manager Lindsay Mathieson. The Iraqi staff that remains works in less dangerous parts of the country

In some cases, projects are delayed by violence and instability.

"In an ideal world, we would be working in the more dangerous places because there's such a significant need," she says. "But there is a line you can't cross. You need to take care of your staff."

Christian Peacemaker Teams, a group based in Chicago and Toronto that promotes human rights in war zones, has been in Iraq since October 2002, before the invasion.

In November 2005, four members were kidnapped. American Tom Fox was killed; the other three were released in March 2006. Many of the Iraqis who had worked with the group have left the country or gone into hiding, co-director Doug Pritchard says.

The group pulled out in April 2006 but returned in July. It is limiting its activities to safer areas of northern Iraq, Pritchard says.

"It's certainly gotten worse and worse," he says. "If anything, it makes us more determined to work with Iraqis who are still willing to face this and hold out hope of a better society."

DOJ_NMG_0122199

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

The Bush administration has authorized the U.S. military to kill or capture Iranian operatives inside Iraq as part of an aggressive new strategy to weaken Tehran's influence across the Middle East and compel it to give up its nuclear program, according to government and counterterrorism officials with direct knowledge of the effort.

For more than a year, U.S. forces in Iraq have secretly detained dozens of suspected Iranian agents, holding them for three to four days at a time. The "catch and release" policy was designed to avoid escalating tensions with Iran and yet intimidate its emissaries. U.S. forces collected DNA samples from some of the Iranians without their knowledge, subjected others to retina scans, and fingerprinted and photographed all of them before letting them go.

Last summer, however, senior administration officials decided that a more confrontational approach was necessary, as Iran's regional influence grew and U.S. efforts to isolate Tehran appeared to be failing. The country's nuclear work was advancing, U.S. allies were resisting robust sanctions against the Tehran government, and Iran was aggravating sectarian violence in Iraq.

"There were no costs for the Iranians," said one senior administration official. "They are hurting our mission in Iraq, and we were bending over backwards not to fight back."

Three officials said that about 150 Iranian intelligence officers, plus members of Iran's Revolutionary Guard Command, are believed to be active inside Iraq at any given time. There is no evidence the Iranians have directly attacked U.S. troops in Iraq, intelligence officials said.

But, for three years, the Iranians have operated an embedding program there, offering operational training, intelligence and weaponry to several Shiite militias connected to the Iraqi government, to the insurgency and to the violence against Sunni factions. Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the director of the CIA, told the Senate recently that the amount of Iranian-supplied materiel used against U.S. troops in Iraq "has been quite striking."

"Iran seems to be conducting a foreign policy with a sense of dangerous triumphalism," Hayden said.

The new "kill or capture" program was authorized by President Bush in a meeting of his most senior advisers last fall, along with other measures meant to curtail Iranian influence from Kabul to Beirut and, ultimately, to shake Iran's commitment to its nuclear efforts. Tehran insists that its nuclear program is peaceful, but the United States and other nations say it is aimed at developing weapons.

The administration's plans contain five "theaters of interest," as one senior official put it, with military, intelligence, political and diplomatic strategies designed to target Iranian interests across the Middle East.

The White House has authorized a widening of what is known inside the intelligence community as the "Blue Game Matrix" -- a list of approved operations that can be carried out against the Iranian-backed Hezbollah in Lebanon. And U.S. officials are preparing international sanctions against Tehran for holding several dozen al-Qaeda fighters who fled across the Afghan border in late 2001. They plan more aggressive moves to disrupt Tehran's funding of the radical Palestinian group Hamas and to undermine Iranian interests among Shiites in western Afghanistan.

In Iraq, U.S. troops now have the authority to target any member of Iran's Revolutionary Guard, as well as officers of its intelligence services believed to be working with Iraqi militias. The policy does not extend to Iranian civilians or diplomats. Though U.S. forces are not known to have used lethal force against any Iranian to date, Bush administration officials have been urging top military commanders to exercise the authority.

The wide-ranging plan has several influential skeptics in the intelligence community, at the State Department and at the Defense Department who said that they worry it could push the growing conflict between Tehran and Washington into the center of a chaotic Iraq war.

Senior administration officials said the policy is based on the theory that Tehran will back down from its nuclear ambitions if the United States hits it hard in Iraq and elsewhere, creating a sense of vulnerability among Iranian leaders. But if Iran responds with escalation, it has the means to put U.S. citizens and national interests at greater risk in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere.

Officials said Hayden counseled the president and his advisers to consider a list of potential consequences, including the possibility that the Iranians might seek to retaliate by kidnapping or killing U.S. personnel in Iraq.

Two officials said that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, though a supporter of the strategy, is concerned about the potential for errors, as well as the ramifications of a military confrontation between U.S. and Iranian troops on the Iraqi battlefield.

In meetings with Bush's other senior advisers, officials said, Rice insisted that the defense secretary appoint a senior official to personally oversee the program to prevent it from expanding into a full-scale conflict. Rice got the oversight guarantees she sought, though it remains unclear whether senior Pentagon officials must approve targets on a case-by-case basis or whether the oversight is more general.

The departments of Defense and State referred all requests for comment on the Iran strategy to the National Security Council, which declined to address specific elements of the plan and would not comment on some intelligence matters.

But in response to questions about the "kill or capture" authorization, Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the NSC, said: "The president has made clear for some time that we will take the steps necessary to protect Americans on the ground in Iraq and disrupt activity that could lead to their harm. Our forces have standing authority, consistent with the mandate of the U.N. Security Council."

Officials said U.S. and British special forces in Iraq, which will work together in some operations, are developing the program's rules of engagement to define the exact circumstances for using force. In his last few weeks as the top commander in Iraq, Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. sought to help coordinate the program on the ground. One official said Casey had planned to designate Iran's Revolutionary Guard as a "hostile entity," a distinction within the military that would permit offensive action.

Casey's designated successor, Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, told Congress in writing this week that a top priority will be "countering the threats posed by Iranian and Syrian meddling in Iraq, and the continued mission of dismantling terrorist networks and killing or capturing those who refuse to support a unified, stable Iraq."

Advocates of the new policy -- some of whom are in the NSC, the vice president's office, the Pentagon and the State Department -- said that only direct and aggressive efforts can shatter Iran's growing influence. A less confident Iran, with fewer cards, may be more willing to cut the kind of deal the Bush administration is hoping for on its nuclear program. "The Iranians respond to the international community only when they are under pressure, not when they are feeling strong," one official said.

With aspects of the plan also targeting Iran's influence in Lebanon, Afghanistan and the Palestinian territories, the policy goes beyond the threats Bush issued earlier this month to "interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria" into Iraq. It also marks a departure from years past when diplomacy appeared to be the sole method of pressuring Iran to reverse course on its nuclear program.

R. Nicholas Burns, the undersecretary of state for political affairs, said in an interview in late October that the United States knows that Iran "is providing support to Hezbollah and Hamas and supporting insurgent groups in Iraq that have posed a problem for our military forces." He added: "In addition to the nuclear issue, Iran's support for terrorism is high up on our agenda."

Burns, the top Foreign Service officer in the State Department, has been leading diplomatic efforts to increase international pressure on the Iranians. Over several months, the administration made available five political appointees for interviews, to discuss limited aspects of the policy, on the condition that they not be identified.

Officials who spoke in more detail and without permission -- including senior officials, career analysts and policymakers -- said their standing with the White House would be at risk if they were quoted by name.

The decision to use lethal force against Iranians inside Iraq began taking shape last summer, when Israel was at war with Hezbollah in Lebanon. Officials said a group of senior Bush administration officials who regularly attend the highest-level counterterrorism meetings agreed that the conflict provided an opening to portray Iran as a nuclear-ambitious link between al-Qaeda, Hezbollah and the death squads in Iraq.

Among those involved in the discussions, beginning in August, were deputy national security adviser Elliott Abrams, NSC counterterrorism adviser Juan Zarate, the head of the CIA's counterterrorism center, representatives from the Pentagon and the vice president's office, and outgoing State Department counterterrorism chief Henry A. Crumpton.

At the time, Bush publicly emphasized diplomacy as his preferred path for dealing with Iran. Standing before the U.N. General Assembly in New York on Sept. 19, Bush spoke directly to the Iranian people: "We look to the day when you can live in freedom, and America and Iran can be good friends and close partners in the cause of peace."

Two weeks later, Crumpton flew from Washington to U.S. Central Command headquarters in Tampa for a meeting with Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. commander for the Middle East. A principal reason for the visit, according to two officials with direct knowledge of the discussion, was to press Abizaid to prepare for an aggressive campaign against Iranian intelligence and military operatives inside Iraq.

Information gleaned through the "catch and release" policy expanded what was once a limited intelligence community database on Iranians in Iraq. It also helped to avert a crisis between the United States and the Iraqi government over whether U.S. troops should be holding Iranians, several officials said, and dampened the possibility of Iranians directly targeting U.S. personnel in retaliation.

But senior officials saw it as too timid.

"We were making no traction" with "catch and release," a senior counterterrorism official said in a recent interview, explaining that it had failed to halt Iranian activities in Iraq or worry the Tehran leadership. "Our goal is to change the dynamic with the Iranians, to change the way the Iranians perceive us and perceive themselves. They need to understand that they cannot be a party to endangering U.S. soldiers' lives and American interests, as they have before. That is going to end."

"This has little to do with Iraq. It's all about pushing Iran's buttons. It is purely political," the official said. The official expressed similar views about other new efforts aimed at Iran, suggesting that the United States is escalating toward an unnecessary conflict to shift attention away from Iraq and to blame Iran for the United States' increasing inability to stanch the violence there.

But some officials within the Bush administration say that targeting Iran's Revolutionary Guard Command, and specifically a Guard unit known as the Quds Force, should be as much a priority as fighting al-Qaeda in Iraq. The Quds Force is considered by Western intelligence to be directed by Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, to support Iraqi militias, Hamas and Hezbollah.

In interviews, two senior administration officials separately compared the Tehran government to the Nazis and the Guard to the "SS." They also referred to Guard members as "terrorists." Such a formal designation could turn Iran's military into a target of what Bush calls a "war on terror," with its members potentially held as enemy combatants or in secret CIA detention.

Asked whether such a designation is imminent, Johndroe of the NSC said in a written response that the administration has "long been concerned about the activities of the IRGC and its components throughout the Middle East and beyond." He added: "The Iranian Revolutionary Guards Quds Force is a part of the Iranian state apparatus that supports and carries out these activities."

Tehran's Influence Grows As Iraqis See Advantages (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 25 -- When Fadhil Abbas determined that his mother's astigmatism required surgery, they did not consider treatment in his home town of Najaf, in southern Iraq. Instead they joined a four-taxi convoy of ailing Iraqis headed to Iran.

For more than two weeks last fall, Abbas, his sister and his mother were treated to free hotels, trips to the zoo and religious shrines, and his mother's $1,300 eye surgery at a hospital in Tehran, all courtesy of the offices of Moqtada al-Sadr, Iraq's ascendant Shiite Muslim cleric. Abbas returned to Najaf glowing over the technical prowess of Iran.

"When you look at this hospital, it is like something imaginary -- you wouldn't believe such a hospital like this exists," said Abbas, a 22-year-old college student. "Iran wants to help the patients in Iraq. Other countries don't want to let Iraqis in."

The increasingly common arrangement for sick or wounded Iraqis to receive treatment in Iran is just one strand in a burgeoning relationship between these two Persian Gulf countries. Thousands of Iranian pilgrims visit the Shiite holy cities in southern Iraq each year. Iran exports electricity and refined oil products to Iraq, and Iraqi vendors sell Iranian-made cars, air coolers, plastics and the black flags, decorated with colorful script, that Shiites are flying this week to celebrate the religious holiday of Ashura. But when President Bush and top U.S. officials speak of Iran's role in Iraq, their focus is more limited. U.S.

officials accuse Iranian security forces, particularly the al-Quds Brigade of the Revolutionary Guards, of funneling sophisticated explosives to Iraqi guerrillas.

"We will not allow hegemony of a hostile regime to have power over this area," U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad said this week.

But changing the "behavior" of the Iranian government, as Khalilzad proposes, collides with Iran's expanding influence in Iraq, which is built on deep cultural ties as well as personal and business relationships developed during the years that many leading Iraqi Shiite politicians spent in exile in Iran.

Iran has dispatched 56 diplomats to staff its embassy in Baghdad and consulates in Basra and Karbala. It maintains informal liaison offices in the Kurdish cities of Sulaymaniyah and Irbil, the latter of which was raided Jan. 11 by U.S. troops, who arrested five Iranians. Each day, Iran provides 1,000 tons of cooking gas, about 20 percent of the Iraqi demand, and 2 million liters of kerosene. Iran exports electricity through Iraq's Diyala province and plans to quadruple the amount with new projects, Iraqi officials say.

Iran has also extended a $1 billion line of credit to Iraq to help fund reconstruction and rebuilding. When Iraqi President Jalal Talabani and his delegation of ministers visited Iran in November, he asked for more help and said Iraq "would like to expand our relations in every field with the Islamic Republic of Iran."

"The economic power between the two countries, it's enormous," said Hassan Kazemi Qomi, Iran's ambassador to Iraq. "We can help them in technical issues and engineering. We have a lot of experience in building roads and airports."

Qomi works inside a stone embassy in a compound with lush gardens and spear-wielding statuary just outside the fortified Green Zone, the seat of U.S. power in Iraq. When he speaks of the Americans, he calls them "the others."

"As for our policy, it's clear and it's going forward. We are happy with the Iraqi government," Qomi said at a recent news conference. "The kidnapping of our diplomats will have no effect at all on our help and cooperation with the Iraqi side. . . . We are only at the first stages of this support."

Qomi said the presence of American troops in Iraq "has increased the instability, increased the killing of innocent people and inflamed the sectarian violence."

"If we want to establish security in Iraq, the Iraqi government should take security into its own hands," he said. "Unfortunately, the others don't want that to happen."

Caught between the United States and Iran is Hoshyar Zebari, Iraq's foreign minister. "I'm treading a very thin line," he said last week over tea in his office. Zebari says he believes Iran wants a stable government in Iraq, along with the departure of U.S. troops, but is worried that a full-scale civil war could spill over Iraq's borders.

Iran supports the two largest Shiite political parties, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI) and the Dawa party of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, U.S. officials have said. But Iran also negotiates with Kurdish and Sunni politicians and sometimes bypasses the central government to forge agreements with Iraqi provinces, Zebari said.

"Historically that has been their attitude, to bet on every horse. And they have changed their support from one group to another," Zebari said.

Some analysts say the violence and instability in Iraq attract more Iranian involvement, not less, as Iran positions itself to be on the winning side of a sectarian war.

"The whole Gulf system is turned upside down, and everybody is trying to figure out how they situate themselves in it," said Ray Takeyh, an Iran expert at the Council on Foreign Relations, referring to traditional relationships in the Persian Gulf region. Iranian support is "part of the program of strengthening the Shia community to resist and expand its influence, and become a successful combatant in a civil war."

For the Iraqi government, it has been a frustrating strategy. "Instead of diversifying your support or aid to different groups, militias, political leaders, if you're sincere in your commitment to see this government succeed, why don't you give all this assistance and money and weapons and training directly to the government?" Zebari said.

Iran has driven a wedge between Iraq and the United States. Last month, when U.S. troops seized two Iranian officials inside the Baghdad compound of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the leader of SCIRI, the Iraqi government intervened and the United States freed them. After U.S. troops seized five more Iranian officials from the liaison office in Irbil, the Iraqi government again appealed for their release -- so far unsuccessfully -- saying the men worked in an approved office providing consular services.

In both cases, U.S. officials accused some of the Iranians of being operatives with the al-Quds Brigade, which the Americans say arms and trains terrorist groups outside Iran, including the Lebanese organization Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad, which is active in the Palestinian territories. Both the Iraqis and Iranians have asked the United States for proof of clandestine activities.

U.S. officials decided to escalate their tactics against Iran after public denunciations of Iran's alleged military activities, along with attempts to "harden" Iraq's security forces to repel Iranian influence, failed to produce satisfactory results, Khalilzad said. "We've come to the view that we need to do more than that, we need to go after their networks," he said.

During the rule of Saddam Hussein, who oppressed Iraq's Shiites and fought an eight-year war against Iran, Iraqi Shiite dissidents in exile, especially SCIRI and its armed wing, the Badr Brigade, found welcome help from Iranian security forces.

"We know what the relationship between SCIRI, Badr and the Iranian institutions were in those days. Now it's a different situation," Khalilzad said. The Iraqi government is no longer "an opposition movement in need of support from the security agencies of a neighboring state, so there is a need for adaptation in terms of what's appropriate in terms of a relationship."

Iraqi officials are sharply divided in their perceptions of Iran's intentions in Iraq. Hussein al-Falluji, a Sunni member of parliament, said Iranian influence exceeds that of the United States, but it is "hidden, and is heading toward targeting vital joints of the Iraqi state."

Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser, said, "Iran is networking aggressively inside Iraq in every aspect of life, including the security aspect."

Mariam Rayis, a foreign affairs adviser to Maliki, dismissed as paranoia U.S. assertions about Iran's "dark involvement" in Iraq. "These neighbors can help us for a while until we can have new construction here," she said. "We have noticed that there is moral support from Iran."

Iran Calls For Summit With Iraq, Syria (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst And Qassim Abdul-zahra

AP, January 26, 2007

Iran has invited the Iraqi and Syrian presidents to Tehran for a weekend summit with Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to hash out ways to cooperate in curbing the runaway violence that has taken Iraq to the verge of civil war and threatens to spread through the region, four key lawmakers told The Associated Press on Monday.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani has accepted the invitation and will fly to the Iranian capital Saturday, a close parliamentary associate said.

The Iranian diplomatic gambit appeared designed to upstage expected moves from Washington to include Syria and Iran in a wider regional effort to clamp off violence in Iraq, where more civilians have been killed in the first 20 days of November than in any other month since the AP began tallying the figures in April 2005.

The Iranian move was also a display of its increasingly muscular role in the Middle East, where it already has established deep influence over Syria and Lebanon.

"All three countries intend to hold a three-way summit among Iraq, Iran and Syria to discuss the security situation and the repercussions for stability of the region," said Ali al-Adeeb, a lawmaker of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's Dawa Party and a close aide to the prime minister.

Both Iran and Syria are seen as key players in Iraq. Syria is widely believed to have done little to stop foreign fighters and al-Qaida in Iraq recruits from crossing its border to join Sunni insurgents in Iraq. It also has provided refuge for many top members of Saddam Hussein's former leadership and political corps, which is thought to have organized arms and funding for the insurgents. The Sunni insurgency, since it sprang to life in late summer 2003, has been responsible for most of the U.S. deaths in Iraq.

Iran is deeply involved in training, funding and arming the two major Shiite militias in Iraq, where Tehran has deep historic ties to the current Shiite political leadership. Many Iraqi Shiites spent years in Iranian exile during Saddam's decades in power in Baghdad. One militia, the Badr Brigade, was trained in Iran by the Revolutionary Guard.

An Ahmadinejad spokesman said that Talibani's visit was scheduled several weeks ago for late November to work on improving bilateral relations. But Majid Yazdi told the AP that he had no information on a coming visit by the Syrian leader.

But Talabani confidants said the invitation was issued on Thursday by Iranian Ambassador Hassan Kazimi Qumi, who said Syrian President Bashar Assad also would be in Tehran for the talks with Ahmadinejad.

Rockefeller: Cheney Applied 'Constant' Pressure To Stall Investigation On Flawed Iraq Intelligence (MCT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

McClatchy Newspapers, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON - Vice President Dick Cheney exerted "constant" pressure on the Republican former chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee to stall an investigation into the Bush administration's use of flawed intelligence on Iraq, the panel's Democratic chairman charged Thursday.

In an interview with McClatchy Newspapers, Sen. Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia also accused President Bush of running an illegal program by ordering eavesdropping on Americans' international e-mails and telephone communications without court-issued warrants.

In the 45-minute interview, Rockefeller said that it was "not hearsay" that Cheney, a leading proponent of invading Iraq, pushed Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., to drag out the probe of the administration's use of prewar intelligence.

"It was just constant," Rockefeller said of Cheney's alleged interference. He added that he knew that the vice president attended regular policy meetings in which he conveyed White House directions to Republican staffers.

Republicans "just had to go along with the administration," he said.

In an e-mail response to Rockefeller's comments, Cheney's spokeswoman, Lea McBride, said: "The vice president believes Senator Roberts was a good chairman of the Intelligence Committee."

Roberts' chief of staff, Jackie Cottrell, blamed the Democrats for the investigation remaining incomplete more than two years after it began.

"Senator Rockefeller's allegations are patently untrue," she said in an e-mail statement. "The delays came from the Democrats' insistence that they expand the scope of the inquiry to make it a more political document going into the 2006 elections. Chairman Roberts did everything he could to accommodate their requests for further information without allowing them to distort the facts."

"I'm not aware of any effort by the vice president, his staff or anyone in the administration to influence the speed at which the committee did its work," said Bill Duhnke, who was Roberts' staff director.

Rockefeller's comments were among the most forceful he's made about why the committee failed to complete the inquiry under Roberts. Roberts chaired the intelligence committee from January 2003 until the Democrats took over Congress this month.

The panel released a report in July 2004 that lambasted the CIA and other U.S. intelligence agencies for erroneously concluding that Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein was concealing biological, chemical and nuclear warfare programs. It then began examining how senior Bush administration officials used faulty intelligence to justify the March 2003 invasion.

Robert promised to quickly complete what became known as the Phase II investigation. After more than two years, however, the panel published only two of five Phase II reports amid serious rifts between Republican and Democratic members and their staffs.

Rockefeller recalled that in November 2005, the then-minority Democrats employed a rarely used parliamentary procedure to force the Senate into a closed session to pressure Roberts to complete Phase II.

"That was the reason we closed the session. To force him" to complete the investigation, he said.

The most potentially controversial of the three Phase II reports being worked on will compare what Bush and his top lieutenants said publicly about Iraq's weapons programs and ties to terrorists with what was contained in top-secret intelligence reports.

In the two reports released in September, the panel said that the administration's claims of ties between Saddam and al-Qaida were false and found that administration officials distributed exaggerated and bogus claims provided by an Iraqi exile group with close ties to some senior administration officials.

Rockefeller said it was important to complete the Phase II inquiry.

"The looking backward creates tension, but it's necessary tension because the administration needs to be held accountable and the country . . . needs to know," he said.

Rockefeller said that he and the senior Republican member of the committee, Sen. Christopher Bond, R-Mo., have put the frictions behind them and agree that the committee should press the administration for documents it's withholding on its domestic eavesdropping program and detainee programs.

Under the eavesdropping program, the National Security Agency monitored Americans' international telephone calls and e-mails without court warrants if one party was a suspected member or supporter of al-Qaida or another terrorist group.

Rockefeller charged that Bush had violated the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which requires the government to obtain permission to eavesdrop on Americans from a secret national security court.

"For five years he's (Bush) has been operating an illegal program," he said, adding that the committee wants the administration to provide the classified documents that set out its legal argument that Bush has the power to wiretap Americans without warrants.

Rockefeller is among a handful of lawmakers who were kept briefed on the program after it started following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. But he told Cheney in a handwritten note in July 2003 that he was deeply concerned about its legality.

In the interview, Rockefeller said the committee needs more details about how the program worked before it considers amending the eavesdropping act to give the administration the flexibility it says it requires to be able to track terrorists.

"How do we draw something up if we have no idea about what the president sent out in the way of orders to the NSA? What about the interpretation of the Department of Justice?" he asked. "Americans . . . should want us to discern what the facts are, what the truth is."

G.I. Gets 18-Year Prison Term For Killing 2 Captive Iraqis (NYT)

By Paul Von Zielbauer

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

FORT CAMPBELL, Ky., Jan. 25 — An Army infantryman received an 18-year prison sentence on Thursday after pleading guilty to killing two unarmed Iraqis during an assault northwest of Baghdad last May.

The infantryman, Pfc. Corey R. Clagett, 22, of the Third Brigade, 101st Airborne Division, also pleaded guilty to trying to kill a third unarmed man detained in the raid, and to conspiracy and obstruction of justice.

Under the terms of a plea deal made with military prosecutors and approved by the division's commanding general, Private Clagett will be eligible for parole after roughly five years, his lawyers said.

Private Clagett is the third of four soldiers charged with premeditated murder in the case to plead guilty in exchange for a reduced sentence. His plea further strengthens prosecutors' case against the remaining soldier, Staff Sgt. Raymond L. Girouard, and increases the chances that Sergeant Girouard may also seek a plea arrangement to avoid conviction at trial, which would require a life sentence.

Sergeant Girouard, 24, the squad leader, is charged with creating a plan to free the three Iraqi men from their plastic handcuffs, have Private Clagett and another soldier shoot them as they fled and then cover up the crime by telling investigators the men had attacked the soldiers and tried to escape.

Military officials raised questions about the deaths after the bodies were removed and found to still have blindfolds and parts of plastic handcuffs on them.

In his plea, Private Clagett told the military judge, Col. Theodore Dixon, that he had conspired with Sergeant Girouard and Specialist William B. Hunsaker to kill the three men after blindfolding and handcuffing them with plastic "zip-tie" handcuffs.

"I cut the zip-ties loose, pulled the blindfold up on one of them, down on the other," he said, referring to two of the three Iraqi men. "Hunsaker told them to run. I told them to 'yallah,' meaning to run faster." He said he and Specialist Hunsaker had sprayed the men with rifle fire, killing two and gravely wounding the third.

Specialist Hunsaker pleaded guilty to murder charges on Jan. 11 and received an 18-year prison sentence. That same week, Specialist Juston R. Graber, the fourth soldier charged in the case, pleaded guilty to aggravated assault for shooting the wounded man after an Army medic had declared him to be beyond help.

Sergeant Girouard's trial is scheduled to begin March 5. If he does not end up pleading guilty, his lawyers said they would ask the judge to force the soldiers' brigade commander, Col. Michael D. Steele, to testify at his trial.

Several soldiers in Private Clagett's platoon have said in sworn statements that Colonel Steele told his men that they would be attacking a stronghold of Al Qaeda and ordered them to kill all men of military age they encountered during the raid.

Colonel Steele, in sworn testimony to Army investigators that has not been made public, said he had not given orders using those exact words, but had warned his soldiers to expect a fierce battle. He was reprimanded by an Army general last summer for issuing confusing rules of engagement that investigators said had contributed to the deaths of the three Iraqi men and a fourth man killed during the raid.

Private Clagett's civilian lawyer, Paul W. Bergrin, said his client was sorry for killing unarmed men but was steadfast in his belief that the men, had they lived, would have gone on to kill American soldiers.

"My client was 100 percent convinced at all times that the individuals that were killed were terrorists," Mr. Bergrin said outside the courtroom.

U.S. Soldier Sentenced To 18 Years After Pleading Guilty To Murder In Iraqi Detainees' Deaths (FINDLAW/AP)

By Beth Rucker, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 26, 2007

(AP) - FORT CAMPBELL, Kentucky-A 101st Airborne Division soldier was sentenced to 18 years in prison after pleading guilty Thursday to murdering an Iraqi detainee and taking part in the killings of two others, saying he went along with a plan to make it look like they were escaping.

Pfc. Corey R. Clagett, 22, was one of four soldiers from the division's 3rd Brigade "Rakkasans" who were accused in the detainees' deaths during a May 9 raid on the Muthana chemical complex in Samarra, about 60 miles (96 kilometers) north of Baghdad.

In an agreement with prosecutors, Clagett pleaded guilty to charges of murder, attempted murder, conspiracy to commit murder and conspiracy to obstruct justice. Prosecutors dropped a second obstruction charge and charges of disrespecting an officer and threatening.

Clagett will also be demoted to private and dishonorably discharged. If he does not cooperate with prosecutors, he could be sentenced to life in prison with a chance at parole.

The soldiers first told investigators they shot the detainees because they were attempting to flee - a story they now say they made up - and that commanders had given them orders to kill all military-age males on the mission.

Two of those soldiers, Spc. William B. Hunsaker and Spc. Juston R. Graber, have changed their stories and pleaded guilty. The squad leader, Staff Sgt. Raymond Girouard, is awaiting his court-martial.

"(Sgt. Girouard) said we were going to cut the zip ties loose and kill the detainees," Clagett told the military judge, Col. Theodore Dixon, on Thursday. "I knew it was an unlawful order. I just went along with it."

The judge asked Clagett what his intention was when he shot at the detainees.

"To kill them, your honor," Clagett said.

Prosecutors said Clagett fatally shot one detainee and seriously wounded another. Official say Graber then killed the wounded detainee, and Hunsaker killed the third.

Clagett's lawyer, Paul Bergrin, has insisted Clagett was following orders, but sought the plea agreement after Hunsaker, 24, told a military judge that Clagett helped him shoot the detainees.

"My client was 100 percent convinced at all times that the individuals that were killed were terrorists," Bergrin told reporters after the sentencing. "His heart is bleeding that he can no longer serve his country."

Military prosecutors would not discuss the case.

Hunsaker pleaded guilty to murder, attempted murder and obstruction of justice this month and was also sentenced to 18 years in prison.

Graber, 21, pleaded guilty to a lesser charge of aggravated assault with a dangerous weapon as part of his agreement to cooperate with prosecutors. He was sentenced to nine months in military jail.

Hunsaker testified that Girouard cut him on the face and arm to make it appear there was a struggle after he and Clagett killed the detainees. Clagett repeated that story to the judge Thursday.

Four other soldiers from the division's 2nd Brigade Combat Team are accused of raping and killing an Iraqi teenager and killing three others in her family last March. A former Army private also faces murder and rape charges in federal court for the same incident.

Salvadoran's Death In Iraq Leaves His Mother Fuming (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

SAN SALVADOR, Jan. 21 — From her hillside home in western El Salvador, Herminia Ramos sobbed and sobbed the other day as she recalled her fallen son.

In some ways, Ms. Ramos is like the thousands of other Salvadoran mothers who lost children in the 12-year civil war here that ended in 1992. But Ms. Ramos' grief is fresher than the rest, the result of a more recent conflict.

El Salvador is the only country in Latin America with troops in Iraq, a point of pride for President Antonio Saca, who is a gung-ho supporter of the Bush administration, but extremely unpopular among the war-weary population.

"Our army should be at home," said Ms. Ramos, 48, fuming against a war she said she did not know the first thing about until smartly dressed officers showed up at her home in 2004 to inform her that her son, Natividad, had become the first Salvadoran to die in combat in Iraq.

The United States has been debating for years the reasons for the war in Iraq and whether the invasion and continued presence of troops there are justified. Was there reason to believe that weapons of mass destruction were there? Was Saddam Hussein's despotism enough reason to topple him? Did links between Iraq and Al Qaeda exist?

El Salvador, which has been involved in the war since August 2003 and currently has 380 troops in Iraq, has been having its own discussion. Ms. Ramos, for one, can find no justification. Those other mothers can say that their children fell while fighting for their country, either for the Marxist guerrilla movement or the American-backed government. But Natividad Ramos, 20, died in Najaf in a clash with armed followers of the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr.

"I got through our war without losing any family," she said of El Salvador's civil war, which took an estimated 75,000 lives. "And now my son was sent to fight in someone else's war."

Officially, Mr. Saca's government says the deployment of what is called the Cuscatlán Battalion is a way to thank the world for its assistance in helping stop the civil war here a decade and a half ago. Salvadoran officials say their country is an active part of the United Nations and believe in the world body's effort to rebuild Iraq.

They stress the humanitarian dimension to their soldiers' work there, like building roads, health clinics and schools, while acknowledging the dangers that have resulted in the deaths of five soldiers and the wounding of about two dozen more. They proudly note that El Salvador's army, once linked to right-wing death squads, has been purged of its bad elements and is now one of the most respected institutions in the country.

But those arguments have not been enough to sway local critics. A newspaper opinion poll put opposition to El Salvador's involvement in Iraq at 81 percent. In 2004, masked protesters briefly took over the country's main cathedral and demanded an immediate withdrawal of troops. For the most part, though, Salvadorans have been preoccupied with local concerns, such as their economic woes and the insecurity that causes strains in their own country.

Every time a new contingent is sent, though, the legislature splits along party lines, with the right-wing government and its allies backing the plan and the leftist opposition voting no.

"It's the gringos' war," said one critic, Olga Serrano, who is executive secretary of a group of wounded veterans from the war in the 1980s. "What are we doing over there?"

Behind the scenes, government officials sell the plan differently. They point to all the benefits they believe they are receiving from Washington as a result of their assistance, even as the Bush administration insists that it is not giving El Salvador special favors for its troop presence.

"We're doing this to help the Iraqis but we're also doing this for our own people," said Carlos Rolando Herrarte Rivas, a legislator from the center-right Christian Democratic Party who went to Iraq in December as part of a government delegation to visit the troops. "The president can't say that but that's why we're doing it."

Mr. Herrarte, a retired colonel, said the Bush administration had been treating Salvadoran migrants well despite strong anti-immigrant sentiment in the United States. He pointed to the Bush administration's decision in January 2005 to grant a one-year extension of temporary protected status for about 250,000 Salvadorans living in the United States. The status gives them a reprieve from deportation because of natural disasters or political turmoil at home.

Mr. Herrarte also cited the $461 million in antipoverty funds that El Salvador was awarded last fall by the Millennium Challenge Corporation, an American foreign aid agency, as being another outgrowth of the war effort.

"When I go to my town, they yell," he said of his vociferous antiwar constituents. "They want to know why we are there. They say, 'Get them out.' Then I start explaining how this is helping our people in the United States."

To say that El Salvador and the United States are joined at the hip is an understatement. Nearly a third of native-born Salvadorans are living in the United States, including relatives of President Saca, Defense Minister Otto Alejandro Romero Orellana and many other decision makers. Those Salvadorans abroad send home about $2.5 billion every year, which represents about 17 percent of the country's gross domestic product.

Former President Francisco Guillermo Flores Pérez, who was considered especially close to the White House, sent the first troops to Iraq in 2003. The issue came up in the presidential campaign the following year when Mr. Saca, a pro-American businessman, defeated Schafik Handal, a former Communist guerrilla.

Mr. Handal had pledged to withdraw Salvador's 380 soldiers from Iraq immediately. Mr. Saca said a victory by Mr. Handal ran the risk of cutting the flow of money from Salvadoran migrants in the United States.

Mr. Saca has continued sending troops even though the governing Nationalist Republican Alliance party, known as Arena, lacks a majority in the legislature. Mr. Saca's party has had to strike deals with two smaller parties to come up with the 43-vote simple majority.

The Farabundo Martí National Liberation Front, an outgrowth of the guerrilla movement that fought the government in the 1980s, has consistently voted against the war.

Critics of decision to send Salvadoran troops point out that Nicaragua, Honduras and Dominican Republic continued to have strong relationships with Washington, even though they pulled their troops out of Iraq in the spring of 2004.

They point out that Hondurans and Nicaraguans also have the same preferred immigration status that Salvadorans do. Honduras and Nicaragua also received Millennium grants, albeit smaller ones than El Salvador's, critics note.

Salvadoran officials are not speaking of an increase in troops to quell the Iraqi insurgency. But when they are asked how long the country plans to involve itself in the war, they do adopt President Bush's language: as long as it takes.

Hello, Mr. Chips: Vendors Feeding Demand In Iraq (USAT)

By Zaid Sabah

DOJ_NMG_0122209

BAGHDAD — It's a sight on Baghdad sidewalks as common as cigarette or kebab vendors: Rows of clear plastic bags, some the size of small duffle bags, bulging with golden potato chips.

Dates are the country's biggest food export and pistachios are a better-known local commodity. But Iraqi-made potato chips — deep fried, thin and greasy — are considered more than a snack: They're a delicacy.

"I love them," said Lubna Bahjat, 25, a civil engineer, who said she eats the chips while watching DVDs at home. "I can't watch a movie without them."

MORE LIFE IN IRAQ: Index of stories

Baghdad once flourished with several potato chip factories, said Ali Ismail, a sidewalk chip vendor in Baghdad's Karrada district. But since 2003, some of the factory owners have been kidnapped, killed or have fled the violence, while other factories simply closed for financial reasons, Ismail and other chip vendors say. Today, one factory dominates the industry — near Jamila Square in Sadr City, the Baghdad slum and bastion of the Mahdi Army, a powerful Shiite militia.

Due in part to the shrinking supply, the cost of chips has increased. A 2-pound bag now sells for about $3.80, compared with about $2 a bag before the U.S. invasion.

The story of potato chips in Baghdad dates back to the late 1950s, when a Kurdish merchant known as Abu Rafal opened the first potato chip factory in the capital, said Jassim Issa, another Karrada chip vendor.

At first wildly foreign to Iraqis, the strange, crispy treat quickly surged in popularity, he says. Initially, potato chips were consumed mainly by men drinking beer or liquor at bars or restaurants. They later became mainstream and grew popular among women and children.

Ismail said he used to sell about 110 pounds of chips a day from his sidewalk stand. But since the bombing of a holy Shiite shrine in Samarra in February 2006, which launched a wave of sectarian violence, his business has diminished because fewer people are on the streets, he said.

Today, he sells about 45 pounds of potato chips per day, Ismail said. His most popular flavor: chicken.

"Potato chips are still very popular in Iraq," he said.

Issa has owned his sidewalk chip stand since 1994. He once dreamed of opening his own chip factory. But the venture involved an endless bureaucratic tangle with Baghdad's municipal government and the health and oil ministries and required several million Iraqi dinars, putting the plan out of reach, he said. He gave up on the idea and focused on his sidewalk sales.

He says his business has suffered as the violence has increased in Baghdad, keeping people indoors. Through February 2006, he was selling about 165 pounds of chips a day, Issa said. Today, he's lucky to sell 66 pounds.

Despite the dip in sales, Issa said he'll stick to his profession — more out of love for the chip than lust for profits.

"This job is the blood that flows in my veins," Issa said, adjusting the bags of chips on his stand. "Can a fish live outside the water? Neither can I."

Army Finds Probable Cause In Afghans' Torture, Death (LAT)

By Kevin Sack And Craig Pyes

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2007

Army criminal investigators have concluded there is probable cause to believe that two soldiers committed assault in the handling of detainees at a Special Forces firebase in Afghanistan in March 2003.

The case stems from reports of torture and the death of a detainee that had been concealed from military authorities until disclosed by The Times in 2004.

The military investigators, who work for the Army's Criminal Investigation Command, also found probable cause of dereliction of duty by one of the two soldiers. The incident was never reported up the chain of command, according to top Special Forces officials, and any attempt to cover up wrongdoing can constitute dereliction under Army criminal codes.

Christopher P. Grey, chief of public affairs for CID, said Thursday that he could not release names or details of the findings because the soldiers have not been formally charged. Rather, the findings have been forwarded to the U.S. Army Special Forces Command, based at Ft. Bragg, N.C., for decisions on whether the soldiers should be charged and prosecuted.

Maj. James O. Gregory, a spokesman for the Special Forces command, said a statement would be issued soon, but he declined to comment further.

Grey did not specify the gravity of the assault findings. Simple assault and dereliction of duty can be considered minor offenses by superior officers, according to specialists in military justice.

Grey also would not say whether the criminal findings relate directly to the death of an 18-year-old Afghan army recruit, Jamal Naseer, who died at the Special Forces compound in Gardez after being interrogated there by U.S. troops. A number of other Afghans who were taken prisoner along with Naseer have said they were severely beaten and otherwise abused while being held at the base by soldiers with the 20th Special Forces Group, an Alabama-based National Guard unit.

Concurrently, the Army investigators determined there was not probable cause to charge anyone in the separate case of an Afghan detainee who died in the custody of the same 20th Special Forces Group team, known as ODA 2021. That detainee, an unarmed woodcutter named Wakil Mohammed, was shot in the face by a soldier during a search of the village of Wazi after a fierce firefight, also in March 2003, according to Afghan witnesses interviewed by The Times.

Grey, the CID spokesman, said in an e-mailed statement that "the case involving Wazi was unfounded." That term is used, he said, "when there is not probable cause to believe that the offense occurred … considering the quality and quantity of all available evidence."

In March 2005, however, CID announced it had found probable cause in the Wazi case to recommend charges of murder against one member of the 20th Special Forces Group and of dereliction of duty against another soldier for not reporting Mohammed's death. Those referrals, known as "listings," have since been rescinded, but Grey declined to say what had changed.

Details of Mohammed's death were revealed in a two-part series about ODA 2021 that was published in The Times in September.

Grey said both investigations were closed by CID on Jan. 11. "If any new credible information becomes available, CID stands ready to reopen the investigation," he said.

The deaths of Naseer and Mohammed were never reported to higher authorities, according to both the battalion and group commanders who oversaw the 20th Group's operations in Afghanistan. That distinguished them from scores of other questionable deaths of detainees in U.S. custody in both Afghanistan and Iraq.

The Times account last fall cited numerous Afghan witnesses who saw Naseer immediately before and after his death and said he appeared to have been badly beaten. It quoted one Special Forces member as saying the team held a meeting after the detainee died to coordinate stories should an investigation arise.

"Everybody on the team had knowledge of it," the soldier said, speaking on condition of anonymity. "You just don't talk about that stuff in the Special Forces community. What happens downrange stays downrange."

Other detainees arrested with Naseer also showed signs of severe beating that were noted in local doctors' reports after their release from the base. One of those detainees was a man with one leg.

The commander of the Special Forces team at the time of both deaths was Chief Warrant Officer Kenneth C. Waller, a full-time National Guardsman who continues to work at 20th Group headquarters in Birmingham. Grey would not say whether Waller, who is now 36, is among those implicated in the CID investigation.

Officials with 20th Group said today that Waller, despite the ongoing case involving his unit, is currently deployed to East Africa, as is Col. Leonard Kiser, the 20th Group's current commanding officer. Neither was available for comment.

While the Special Forces team in Gardez consisted mostly of Alabama National Guardsmen, it also included several members from other groups.

U.S. To Seek $10.6B For Afghan Aid (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 26, 2007

President Bush will ask Congress for $10.6 billion to help Afghanistan strengthen its security forces and rebuild from years of war, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday.

The money would be on top of $14.2 billion in aid the United States has already given to Afghanistan since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001 that toppled the repressive Taliban.

The request, which Bush will make formally next month, comes after a year in which Taliban forces launched surprisingly fierce attacks across the country. U.S. and NATO forces are bracing for a renewed offensive by Taliban fighters in the spring

"The challenges of the last several months have demonstrated that we want to and we should redouble our efforts," Rice told reporters flying with her to Brussels for NATO meetings on Afghanistan.

Rice said that of the total, $8.6 billion would be for training and equipping Afghan police and security forces, and $2 billion would be for reconstruction. The money would be spent over the next two years.

The aid proposal also comes as the U.S. appears to be stepping up its military commitment in the country.

The Defense Department has said that 3,200 soldiers from the New York-based 10th Mountain Division already in Afghanistan would have their tour extended by four months. In a visit to Afghanistan last week, new Defense Secretary Robert Gates indicated he is likely to ask Bush for more troops for the country.

There are about 24,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan, the highest number since the war began in October 2001. About half are under the control of NATO, which is gradually gaining more control over operations there.

A senior State Department official who spoke on condition of anonymity gave another indication that U.S. forces in Afghanistan may grow, saying, "We will not be decreasing our military commitment in Afghanistan, quite the contrary."

On Thursday, Gen. David Richards, the top NATO commander in Afghanistan, said NATO-led troops battling resurgent Taliban militants will shortly be reinforced with another combat brigade. The NATO-led force is about 20 percent short of the troops levels pledged by its contributing nations.

Among other issues, Rice will raise with her NATO colleagues are the divisions within the alliance on sharing the burden in Afghanistan. More NATO countries have shown a greater willingness than others to send troops to areas of conflict.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said there is a pressing need to address the problem of high levels of opium poppy production in Afghanistan.

"Everybody understands that it's a problem that needs to be addressed," he said. "We don't want an Afghanistan (economy) that is based solely on production of narcotics and international aid."

Officials in the Afghan capital of Kabul said this week that despite pressure from the United States the country's heroin-producing poppies will not be sprayed with herbicide this year despite a record crop in 2006. Afghan officials said there would be an increased effort to destroy poppy crops with traditional techniques _ typically sending teams of laborers into fields to batter down or plow in the plants before they can be harvested.

Fueled by the Taliban, a powerful drug mafia and the need for a profitable crop that can overcome drought, opium production from poppies in Afghanistan last year rose 49 percent to 6,700 tons. That's enough to make about 670 tons of heroin, or more than 90 percent of the world's supply and more than the world's addicts consume in a year.

The U.S. budget request follows a review of U.S. policy in Afghanistan that the White House began last year.

"It had been over five years since we went into Afghanistan and the situation on the ground _ economic and security _ has changed," said Gordon Johndroe, a spokesman for the National Security Council. "There's now a viable government that we're working with. Substantial progress has been made in many areas, but it's also clear that the policy needed to be reviewed, so that we continue to improve the lives of Afghan citizens."

Rice To Press Europe On Afghan Funding (FT)

By Daniel Dombey, Aunohita Mojumdar And Fidelius Schmid

Financial Times, January 26, 2007

Condoleezza Rice, the US secretary for state, will ask her European counterparts on Friday to do more to help the reconstruction and security of Afghanistan, amid signs of a growing divide on the issue between the US and continental Europe.

At a meeting of Nato and European Union foreign ministers in Brussels, Ms Rice is expected to unveil details of a US initiative to provide about $8bn (€6bn, £4bn) for the war-torn country and call on Europe to make a similar step.

President George W. Bush is scheduled to ask Congress for the funds next month, an indication of the growing concern in Washington about the future of Afghanistan and the bitter fight against Taliban insurgents. The request would be a huge increase as the total assistance provided by Washington.

In an effort to boost troops in the country, the US Department of Defense has also said about 3,500 US soldiers will stay four months longer than scheduled.

Separately, the European Commission will on Friday announce about €600m ($780m, £395m) for Afghanistan for the next four years, aimed at improving governance, providing alternative livelihoods to the drugs trade, and health.

The figure represents a fall on the levels of aid the Commission has given Afghanistan in the past, although typically European governments, not Brussels, provide the lion's share of EU aid.

"We are working within limited resources," said a Commission official. "This is by far our largest aid programme in Asia."

The difference between the US and many European states has also been exposed by most Nato countries' reluctance to deploy troops to the south and east of Afghanistan, where the main fighting against the Taliban is taking place.

A hard core of Atlanticist countries, led by the US, the UK, Canada and the Netherlands, is spearheading the fight in the region, with countries such as Germany and France clearly set against joining them.

On Thursday Gen Rahim Wardak, Afghanistan's defence minister, said he expected "much more force in hand" because of the US decision to increase numbers in Afghanistan, the deployment of 1,000 Polish troops and the expected augmentation of British forces. He said that it would give Nato commanders a "strategic reserve".

The Afghan National Army's own strength would increase by up to 12,000 troops from its current level of 40,000 by the time of any "spring offensive" by the Taliban.

But France is pulling out most of the 200 special forces it has in the country, although it has agreed to provide extra aircraft for the Nato mission. Germany is also seeking to provide Nato with more aircraft.

"The countries that are in the south and east are the countries that wake up every morning feeling that their own national security is tied to the future of Afghanistan," said a senior Nato diplomat.

Bush To Seek More Aid For Afghanistan (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And David S. Cloud

BRUSSELS, Jan. 25 — President Bush plans to ask Congress for $10.6 billion in aid for Afghanistan, primarily to beef up the country's security forces, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday.

The aid request would come before what is expected to be another spring offensive by resurgent forces linked to the Taliban, the former rulers of Afghanistan. In Washington, the Pentagon announced Thursday that it was delaying the departure of a 3,200-soldier combat brigade from Afghanistan for as long as three months, increasing the American force level there to around 24,000. An additional 20,000 soldiers from other NATO countries are also deployed there.

The aid request would include $8.6 billion for training and equipping Afghan security forces and would go toward increasing the size of Afghanistan's national army by 70,000 and its local police forces by 82,000, said a senior American official familiar with the issue.

An additional $2 billion would go to reconstruction projects like building roads, laying down electric power lines, development in rural areas, and counternarcotics efforts, administration officials said. The officials said that they planned to use some of the money to help Afghanistan and Pakistan battle the Taliban and other insurgents along the Afghan-Pakistan border.

President Bush is expected to make a formal request for the funds next month, after a year in which Taliban forces have carried out fierce attacks across the country, particularly in the south.

"The challenges of the last several months have demonstrated that we want to and we should redouble our efforts," Ms. Rice told reporters aboard her flight to Brussels for a NATO meeting on Afghanistan, coming from a donors' conference for Lebanon that was held in Paris.

President Bush announced two weeks ago that he was sending more than 20,000 additional troops to Iraq, where the United States already has about 132,000 troops.

The troops to remain longer in Afghanistan, from the Third Brigade of the 10th Mountain Division, provide commanders with more forces before an expected spring offensive by the Taliban. The unit was supposed to return to the United States next month. But commanders asked Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates for additional forces when he visited Kabul last week and he said at the time that he was inclined to support the request.

In a statement, the Army said the additional forces were necessary to "deny the Taliban a base of operations."

Because another battalion is scheduled to leave Afghanistan shortly, the actual increase in American troop numbers as a result of holding over the 3,500-member brigade will be about 2,500 troops, said Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman.

The increase comes at the same time that the Bush administration is renewing pressure on European allies to increase their troops in Afghanistan and is aimed at quelling European concerns that the United States may soon draw down in Afghanistan to meet its growing troop commitments in Iraq. British, Canadian and Dutch troops have at times since last summer been in intense combat in southern Afghanistan, the Taliban's heartland.

In addition, an American general, Dan K. McNeil, is taking command of the NATO mission in Afghanistan next month, taking over from a British officer.

The NATO-led force remains about 15 percent short of the troop and equipment levels pledged by its contributing nations, a point that is bound to be of contention during Friday's scheduled NATO meeting in Brussels to discuss Afghanistan.

Mr. Gates has been more open to adding troops to Afghanistan than his predecessor, Donald H. Rumsfeld, who argued for holding down force levels. Mr. Gates has indicated that he favors aggressive action to root out the Taliban and has said repeatedly that Afghanistan cannot be permitted to fall back into chaos.

American officials say that Taliban fighters are mounting increasingly brazen cross-border attacks from Pakistan and are preparing to resume attacks in the spring, as they have done every year since the American invasion, which toppled the Taliban in 2001.

Since 2001, the United States has provided over $14.2 billion in aid to Afghanistan.

KABUL, Jan. 25 -- NATO-led troops battling resurgent Taliban fighters will soon be reinforced with another combat brigade, the top NATO commander in Afghanistan said Thursday.

British Gen. David Richards said the brigade will consist of members of different nations participating in NATO's International Security Assistance Force. A brigade is typically 1,500 to 3,500 troops. Richards did not specify how many reinforcements he expected.

At NATO headquarters in Brussels, officials would not specify which countries planned to send reinforcements, saying such announcements are up to individual nations.

Several countries, however, plan to boost their contributions in response to requests for more troops to join the fight against the Taliban in the spring.

Poland is expected to send about 1,200 soldiers in February, and British news media have reported that Britain is considering deploying 600 more troops. It was not clear if Richards was referring to those upcoming troop contributions.

The U.S. Defense Department said Wednesday that about 3,500 soldiers from the New York-based 10th Mountain Division already in the country would have their tour extended by four months.

The NATO-led force, which is bracing for renewed fighting with the Taliban, is about 20 percent short of the troop levels pledged by its contributing nations.

Richards made the comments during the opening of a joint operations center in Kabul that will be manned by officers from Afghanistan, Pakistan and NATO. The three are trying to increase coordination in their counterinsurgency efforts.

Relations between Pakistan and Afghanistan have deteriorated recently as top officials have traded accusations over which side was responsible for the increase in Taliban attacks. About 4,000 people died in insurgency-related violence in Afghanistan last year, according to numbers from Afghan, U.S. and NATO officials.

Also Thursday, Italy's government approved financing for the country's military mission in Afghanistan despite calls for a pullout by leftist parties in Prime Minister Romano Prodi's coalition. Prodi has agreed to keep Italy's 1,800-strong contingent in Afghanistan, although he has resisted NATO's request to increase its size.

Bush Seeks Funds To Counter Taliban (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Bush administration will ask Congress for $10.6 billion next month for Afghanistan's reconstruction and to beef up the country's security forces to counter recent Taliban gains, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday.

The unusually large figure -- the United States has given Afghanistan $14.2 billion in aid since 2001 -- is an indication that the administration views the difficulties facing President Hamid Karzai's government as extremely serious, U.S. officials said.

In addition, the Pentagon announced yesterday that it would extend the tours of 3,200 soldiers in Afghanistan. The troops from the 3rd Brigade, 10th Mountain Division, were expecting to complete a one-year deployment next month, but their tour of duty had been extended by up to 120 days.

The extension means there will be about 2,500 more soldiers in Afghanistan than planned for the next few months.

"The challenges of the last several months have demonstrated that we want to and we should redouble our efforts," Miss Rice said as she flew last night to Brussels, where she will urge fellow NATO members today to follow Washington's lead and increase their financial assistance.

She said $8.6 billion would be used for training and equipping Afghan police and security forces. The money would also help to increase the Afghan army by 70,000 soldiers and police forces by 82,000, a senior U.S. official said.

The remaining $2 billion would go to building roads, an electricity grid and other infrastructure, as well as counternarcotics operations, said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

The administration will submit the request as a supplemental to this year's budget, but the funds would be disbursed over the next two years, officials said.

They said the White House had realized that an "adjustment in strategy" was urgently needed if Afghanistan was going to be the success the United States wants it to be, and a broad interagency review was conducted in the past several months.

"There was a feeling that we were incrementally making progress, but that, given the kind of insurgency threat we faced last year, maybe that wasn't enough, that what we needed to do was make significant progress across the board," Richard Boucher, assistant secretary of state for South and Central Asian affairs, said yesterday in Brussels.

Mr. Boucher said the "significant funding," a decision to keep more troops in Afghanistan, as well as other steps by the United States and NATO were meant to disrupt Taliban's plans for the winter.

About 4,000 people were killed in insurgency fighting last year, and U.S. officials have said there were nearly 140 suicide attacks, up from 27 in 2005.

Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates visited Afghanistan last week, but officials said the administration delayed the new funds pledge until Miss Rice's meeting at NATO in order to "make a political point."

"We're looking for others to step up their effort with us, step it up across the board," Mr. Boucher said.

About 33,000 troops from 37 countries under the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force are currently deployed in Afghanistan.

The Bush administration has been criticized that it stopped paying enough attention to the country after toppling the Taliban in 2001, and particularly since the war in Iraq began nearly four years ago.

A senior U.S. official said yesterday the administration wanted to show to its European allies that "it's not all about Iraq, all the time."

White House Wants More Aid For Afghanistan (LAT)

By Paul Richter

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration will seek $10.6 billion more in aid for Afghanistan, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday, in another sign that the White House is deepening its commitment in the Central Asian nation in response to growing concern over a Taliban resurgence.

The proposal for additional money came the same week the Pentagon announced plans to extend the deployment of 3,200 troops in the country and amid a broad rethinking of the American strategy for dealing with Afghanistan.

The new aid, which would be spent over two years, would mark a substantial addition to the $14 billion the United States has spent in Afghanistan since the invasion that toppled the Taliban's fundamentalist Islamic government in late 2001. About $8.6 billion of the new funding would be used to train and arm Afghan troops and police, and the remainder would be for reconstruction, including new roads, electricity and other infrastructure, Rice told reporters during a trip to Brussels.

"The challenges of the last several months have demonstrated that we want to, and should, redouble our efforts," she said.

U.S. officials have become increasingly alarmed by the resurgence of the Taliban, whose attacks on the fragile government and international forces made 2006 the bloodiest year since the U.S.-led invasion, with 4,000 deaths from violence. Military strategists are preparing for an expected spring campaign by the Taliban forces.

A senior U.S. official, speaking to reporters last week, said that prospects for progress in the Afghan effort were far better than in Iraq. Even so, he said, "efforts in Afghanistan need desperately to be intensified."

The official, who would discuss U.S. strategy only on condition of anonymity, said the United States and its NATO allies needed a "comprehensive approach" that included not only stepped-up security, but also efforts to strengthen the weak economy, fight the opium trade and extend the reach of a government that is hardly in evidence in many parts of the country.

As part of the effort to stabilize the country, the U.S. is temporarily increasing the size of its force there by postponing the return of the 3rd Brigade of the 10th Mountain Division. The brigade, based at Ft. Drum, N.Y., will be extended by up to 120 days beyond its one-year deployment, the Pentagon said this week. Taking into account service members being rotated out of Afghanistan, that will mean a net increase of about 2,500 U.S. troops in the country.

About 24,000 U.S. troops are in Afghanistan, representing the largest American force since the start of the war. About half of them are under the command of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

The new aid proposal requires approval from the Democrat-controlled Congress as part of the administration's 2007 supplemental budget proposal, a special war spending measure separate from the regular budget. The war budget proposal is expected to top $100 billion, adding to more than $400 billion spent on the conflicts and reconstruction efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan since 2001.

Pentagon officials said the money would enable them to train 70,000 Afghan soldiers and 82,000 police officers.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said during a trip to Afghanistan last week that he was sympathetic to NATO requests for more U.S. and European troops and expressed concern that progress in the country would "slip away" under a sustained Taliban offensive.

Rice will address the planned addition of forces with European leaders at a NATO ministerial meeting today in Brussels.

Although the Afghanistan mission is NATO's first outside Europe, U.S. officials are unhappy that their allies have not provided more troops and that the NATO forces have in some cases limited their missions in an effort to reduce casualties. The Bush administration has been pressing Spain, Italy and Germany to lift operational restrictions on troops in southern Afghanistan, where the fighting is the most dangerous.

The senior U.S. official said the French too "need to do more." But the Europeans, for their part, have expressed concern that the Pentagon may shift U.S. troops from Afghanistan to Iraq to try to quell the surging violence there, leaving NATO to fill the gap.

New York Prosecutor With Wall Street In His Sights (FT)

By Brooke Masters In New York

Michael Garcia, the US prosecutor who has raised hackles abroad with his wide-ranging internet gambling investigation, takes pride in being an ordinary guy.

Spurning the car and driver that comes with his position as US attorney for the southern district of New York, he commutes by train and is never recognised on the street.

He notes wryly that his alma mater is so low on the academic totem poll that he was the first Albany Law School graduate to be hired by the office in more than 200 years.

But Mr Garcia's personal modesty stands in stark contrast with his ambitious view of his office's jurisdiction. The 217 lawyers under his command have tackled corruption at the United Nations, securities fraud cases from around the US, and most recently sub-poenaed more than a dozen non-US banks as part of a controversial crackdown on internet gambling.

"This is an office that has been willing to take on the difficult and new cases, and you see the results," Mr Garcia, 45, told the Financial Times. "If there is a case there, we will make it."

A born-and-bred New Yorker, Mr Garcia spent nine years as a line prosecutor in the southern district in the 1990s, working mainly on terrorism cases at a time when the office was a world leader at bringing such offenders to justice.

"He was a regular guy. He put his head down. He worked with agents. He made the cases," said Lev Dassin, a colleague from those days who now serves as one of Mr Garcia's top deputies.

As a young terrorism prosecutor, Mr Garcia travelled to Asia to help build the office's case against Ramzi Yousef for plotting to blow up US airliners. A few years later, he went to Kenya and Tanzania to collect evidence from the victims of the 1998 US embassy bombings there.

"Mike is just an extraordinarily talented prosecutor and investigator," said Mary Jo White, the US attorney at the time.

The southern district is known, only half jokingly, as "the sovereign district", in recognition of its broad jurisdiction and its founding in 1789, which predates the Justice Department itself.

Located blocks from Wall Street, the office attracts many of the US's pre-eminent securities fraud prosecutors and brought recent cases against the leaders of WorldCom and Adelphia, and domesticity mogul Martha Stewart.

"New York is a centre and New York is a target," Mr Garcia said. "For a lot of those reasons, our venue is very expansive and we are proud of that."

The gambling probe has particularly raised hackles because Mr Garcia's staff have not only filed money-laundering charges against the Canadian founders of Neteller, a company that processes gambling proceeds, but also sought to trace the overseas financial holdings of gambling companies and their principal officers.

Though Mr Garcia would not comment on the particulars, he says he sees the gambling crackdown as simple fairness.

"We think it violates US law and we are going to do it whether it is the guy in the Bronx operating an illegal gambling [den] or a multi-million dollar offshore on-line gambling operation."

Mr Garcia, who is married to a Federal Bureau of Investigation agent he met at an office party, is also well versed in the ways of Washington.

He spent more than five years there, first in the Commerce Department and then heading Immigration and Customs Enforcement, a newly created bureaucracy of more than 20,000 people within the Department of Homeland Security.

Mr Garcia calls his 2005 return to New York a "great honour" and has promised to beef up prosecution of public corruption. His emphasis on meetings and reporting lines initially irked some long-time staffers and contrasted with his predecessor, David Kelley, who had often roamed the halls.

Mr Garcia's arrival coincided with a rough patch for the white-collar unit. Last summer the office lost an appeal and then agreed to a deferred prosecution of banker Frank Quattrone, a move widely seen as a defeat.

A federal judge publicly railed at the office's handling of its case against accountancy firm KPMG, and the office also dropped criminal charges against seven former New York Stock Exchange specialists.

Mr Garcia's supporters are quick to point out that all of these cases started before his arrival in 2005 and he dismissed the problems as "cyclical".

"This office is always going to be at the forefront of white-collar work," he promised. "This year you will see some very good cases coming out."

Reichert To Submit Candidates To Succeed U.S. Attorney McKay (SEATIMES)

By David Bowermaster, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, January 26, 2007

Rep. Dave Reichert, R-Auburn, is working with local lawyers and law-enforcement officials to identify candidates to succeed John McKay as U.S. Attorney for the Western District of Washington.

McKay is stepping down today after five years as the region's top law-enforcement official. He announced Thursday he will join the faculty of Seattle University Law School.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is expected to name an interim replacement for McKay today, to avoid disruptions to prosecutions. But it could take weeks to choose a permanent successor.

U.S. attorneys are White House appointees subject to Senate confirmation.

It is traditional for the senior member of the state's congressional delegation, who is from the same party as the president, to work with the White House to select U.S. attorney candidates.

Rep. Doc Hastings is the longest-serving Washington Republican. But because Hastings is from Eastern Washington, he asked Reichert to pick candidates to succeed McKay.

Mike Shields, Reichert's chief of staff, said the congressman will submit a list of finalists to the White House. However, the final decision rests with the administration.

Reichert is not obligated to consult with members of the opposite party.

Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash, has not been contacted by Reichert's office about the U.S. attorney vacancy, said Alex Glass, a spokeswoman for Murray.

"Congressman Reichert is involved in looking at candidates and will seek to work in a bipartisan way in putting that name forward," Shields said.

Reichert tapped Norm Maleng, King County prosecutor, to head a panel that is reviewing candidates, said Dan Donohoe, a spokesman for Maleng.

McKay announced his plans to resign Dec. 14.

His departure became the subject of speculation after a spate of reports earlier this month suggested that the White House had pushed several U.S. attorneys out of their jobs. The White House denied it had orchestrated a purge, but declined to comment on whether McKay had been asked to leave.

McKay said last month he stepped down to return to the private sector. Emily Langlie, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office, said McKay stood by that statement and would not comment further.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

McNulty Memo On Attorney-Client Privilege Blasted For Lack Of Change (NLJ)

By Pamela A. MacLean, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, January 26, 2007

Critics say result will be silent pressure by Justice; Congress expected to seek bans on waiver demands

Revision of the Justice Department's much maligned guidelines for seeking corporate waivers of attorney-client privilege in white-collar investigations has been likened to a "don't ask, don't tell" policy that will drive prosecution waiver demands underground.

And few believe that what has been dubbed the McNulty memorandum, issued on Dec. 12 by Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul McNulty, will resolve the simmering anger among corporate counsel over what has been called a "culture of waiver."

Now that Congress has returned this month, it is expected to renew a call for a legislative ban on federal prosecutors and regulatory agencies demanding waivers. And a federal rules reform advisory committee has proposed a change in Rule 502 of the Federal Rules of Evidence to codify "limited waiver" of attorney-client privilege, despite wide federal and state court rejection of the concept.

McNulty said the department supports the recognition of limited waiver. The danger of waiver exposing corporations to third-party lawsuits and shareholder suits "is a significant concern," McNulty said in a recent interview. "That is why we are supportive of the effort to create a limited waiver and to amend federal rules to allow it to occur. We would like to see some way forward to make it possible for limited waiver," he said.

A DEPARTURE

His comment is a departure from a June decision by the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejecting a partial waiver sought by Qwest Communications International Inc. The decision noted that rather than support Qwest's request for adoption of selective waiver of privilege, the government "carefully took no position," and declined to participate in oral argument. In re Qwest Communications Securities Litigation, 450 F.3d 1179 (2006).

As for Congress stepping in to ban all but voluntary waivers, McNulty said, "I am hopeful the Senate and the House will give the new guidance a chance to work and see how it plays out in our corporate fraud work. I am confident that if they do give it a chance there will be no need for legislation and there will be no need for further guidance."

But efforts at cooperation may not be so amicable in the new year. Critics, who complain that McNulty's 21-page memo fails to provide sufficient protection against government coercion, have started lining up to push for tougher legislation to curb prosecution waiver demands and to oppose legitimizing "partial waivers."

At a Jan. 12 meeting in Phoenix, a subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States heard public comments on proposed Rule 502 changes.

A 2003 memo by former Deputy Attorney General Larry D. Thompson, which told prosecutors considering whether to charge a corporation criminally to take its cooperation into account, turned the waiver controversy into a subject of national debate. Waiver of attorney-client or work-product privileges was considered a sign of cooperation. Companies failing to cooperate could be indicted along with suspect executives.

The Justice Department was tampering with a privilege that has existed in common law for more than 400 years of balancing the courts' search for truth with a need to protect defendants' right to counsel, according to Steven K. Hazen, an advisor to the American Bar Association task force on Rule 502 and the State Bar of California Business Law Section. "Confidentiality is like toothpaste, once it is out of the tube it is out for good," he said.

A survey earlier this year by the Association of Corporate Counsel, representing 19,000 public companies, found that nearly 75 percent of inside and outside counsel said government agencies expect a company under investigation to waive legal privileges. In addition, it found that in the last five years, 51 percent of outside counsel and 30 percent of in-house counsel reported the government expected waivers in order to be eligible for leniency.

"It is chilling the relationship with employees and impacts whether people report misconduct," said Susan Hackett, a spokeswoman for the association.

The McNulty memo didn't resolve the conflict. "We're thrilled the Department of Justice has taken this step forward after two years of begging. But this proposal is no solution. It not only doesn't go far enough, it still misses the point. They still think DOJ gets to decide whether corporate counsel they are prosecuting have a right to counsel or not," Hackett said.

"One bone dangled before counsel is a confidentiality agreement [partial waiver]," she said. "We don't support the rule change. There is still a fundamental constitutional problem of right to counsel. Only a court can decide that right."

The McNulty memo converts the Thompson memo's upfront requests for waiver to a "don't ask, don't tell policy," complained Judson W. Starr, head of environmental defense for Venable in Washington. "The government raises the prospect of getting information but doesn't ask for it. You still have every bit as much pressure to waive," said Starr.

"In environmental cases it is on the table in every case," he said. "If you refuse to waive, it becomes part of the conspiracy."

McNulty disputed the notion that his changes would turn government waiver requests into an unspoken wink and nod. "Practically speaking, if someone engaged in some subtle process of seeking waiver without following the procedure, it would come out quickly," he said.

"If a corporation came back and said 'there was a method or tone we picked up, that gave the impression it would be bad if we didn't volunteer to waive,' I would want to know a lot more about the facts of that," McNulty said.

Jim Parkman, who successfully defended HealthSouth Corp. CEO Richard M. Scrushy, said, "I am not for giving any waivers of any kind." In the HealthSouth prosecution, said Parkman of The Cochran Firm's Birmingham, Ala., office, "we knew they signed an agreement and provided the government everything. We tried to obtain the agreement. The court ordered we get it, but we never did."

ABA task force advisor Hazen added that there's a danger of "commoditizing" waivers by making them bargaining chips to be traded for something of value.

But most troubling, the McNulty memo "leaves the impression something significant has been done when it hasn't," Hazen said. "Comparing the McNulty memo line by line with the Thompson memo, there is almost no change. It is very subtle." Hazen also said the Justice Department "institutionalize[s] artificially the entire attorney work-product protection area as trivial."

Nacchio's Legal Tab Picked Up (DENP)

By Andy Vuong, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, January 26, 2007

Bylaws require Qwest to pay for ex-CEO's defense

The Denver-based phone company is paying for Nacchio's multi million-dollar defense against civil and criminal charges, which include 42 counts of illegal insider trading.

Nacchio, Qwest's former chief executive and chairman, has pleaded not guilty, and his criminal trial is scheduled to start March 19.

His final legal tab could run from $25 million to $75 million for both civil and criminal cases, according to experts. Former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling, who was convicted of fraud and conspiracy last year, reportedly rang up $65 million in legal fees.

Qwest's bylaws require it to "advance legal fees to current and former officers who may be involved" in any criminal or civil legal proceeding because of their work with the company, said spokesman Bob Toevs.

"If there is a finding against one of those former officers, the company does have the ability or the right to recover the fees that were advanced to the individual," Toevs said.

But Qwest would have to recover the fees through court action, and the company wouldn't get anything if Nacchio's finances are emptied by fines and other debts.

Nacchio faces up to 10 years in prison and a $1 million fine for each of the 42 insider-trading charges. A separate Securities and Exchange Commission civil fraud lawsuit seeks his stock sale profits from 1999 to 2002 and bonuses. Nacchio, who reaped $176.5 million in stock sales during the period covered by the SEC lawsuit, has denied any wrongdoing.

The requirement for Qwest to cover Nacchio's legal bill is also spelled out in his severance agreement. Nacchio was forced out of Qwest in mid-2002.

"It's really sad that a public corporation like Qwest is going to end up having to pay for his legal expenses," said retiree Nelson

Phelps, executive director of the Association of US West Retirees. "It's a further hit against a company (through) legal costs for a person that many retirees look at as almost sinking the company."

"Expensive litigations"

Qwest, which acquired Baby Bell US West in 2000, hasn't disclosed how much it has spent or expects to spend on Nacchio's defense. Some of the fees may be covered by so-called Directors and Officers liability insurance, which many public corporations including Qwest carry to help defend and settle lawsuits against key officials.

But the insurance typically doesn't cover criminal charges, said John Toothman, founder of The Devil's Advocate, a legal-fees consulting firm in Great Falls, Va.

The Justice Department's case alleges Nacchio sold $101 million in Qwest stock in early 2001 while he knew the company's finances were faltering.

Separately, the SEC has sued Nacchio and several other former Qwest executives, alleging that they fraudulently boosted revenues by $3 billion from 1999 to 2002. Qwest later restated much of that revenue.

Nacchio has also been named in several shareholder lawsuits.

He is represented by two law firms: Roseland, N.J.-based Stern & Kilcullen and Denver's Richilano & Gilligan.

Herbert Stern is Nacchio's lead attorney, and John Richilano is the top local attorney. Six other attorneys from those two firms have entered appearances in the criminal case.

Costs add up

Toothman said the lead attorneys in the case could likely charge more than $500 an hour and their associates around $200 an hour. The legal bill would also include fees for pollsters, expert witnesses, travel expenses and other costs.

One expert already has appeared in court filings on Nacchio's behalf. Noted jury specialist Edward Bronson of California State University reviewed hundreds of newspaper articles and prepared a 62-page report supporting Nacchio's effort to move the trial to New Jersey, which was rejected. Bronson has said that he is paid $125 an hour for his work.

"These are expensive litigations," said John Marquess, president of Legal Cost Control, a legal-fees consulting firm in New Jersey. "These things could go as high as $60 million to $75 million to defend."

Since Qwest is paying fees in advance, Marquess said Nacchio has no reason to control costs. Skilling shelled out $23 million from his own pocket for his attorney fees, his insurance covered $17 million and $25 million went unpaid, according to published reports. Enron had filed bankruptcy by the time Skilling faced criminal charges.

"When it's your own money, you may care a bit," Marquess said. "When it's not your own money, what's he care?"

Legal experts said large corporations such as Qwest need to offer officers and directors financial protection from lawsuits in order to hire them.

"It'd be hard to attract the kind of individuals that you need to run a public corporation without that type of indemnification," said John O'Dorisio, a Denver corporate attorney.

Recommended steps

Harvey Pitt, former chairman of the SEC, said companies should have their boards conduct an investigation into charges before advancing legal fees. He also said they should have adequate protections in place to ensure that they'll be able to recover the fees.

"Unless there are satisfactory responses to these questions, I don't believe boards are justified in advancing expenses, even though they may legally be able to do so or even obligated to do so," said Pitt, who now heads business consulting firm Kalorama Partners.

Experts said companies rarely recover legal fees from former executives even if they are convicted, and shareholders ultimately foot the bill.

The company would have to stand in line behind court fines, debt holders such as mortgage companies and shareholders that file civil suits.

Experts said Qwest would have the ability to recover attorney fees from former Qwest chief financial officer Robin Szeliga, who pleaded guilty to one count of illegal insider trading.

But during her sentencing last year, Szeliga said she has faced "financial devastation." She was fined $250,000 as part of her sentence.

DOJ_NMG_0122221

Szeliga is the only other former top Qwest officer to have been charged criminally. Former president Afshin Mohebbi and former CFO Robert Woodruff, who preceded Szeliga, are also named in the SEC suit.

Toevs said he couldn't comment about individual cases.

GM Delays Earnings Announcement; Will Restate Some Financial Statements (DEN)

By Sharon Terlep And Christine Tierney, The Detroit News

Detroit News, January 26, 2007

General Motors Corp. is delaying its fourth-quarter and 2006 earnings announcement, originally scheduled for next Tuesday, but said it expected to show an improvement in its auto business in the fourth quarter.

GM also said it would restate prior financial results -- many of which have previously been restated -- due primarily to tax accounting adjustments.

"As a result of these anticipated adjustments related to the deferred tax liabilities, hedging activities and other miscellaneous items, GM will be restating its financial statements for 2002 through the third quarter of 2006," the U.S. automaker said in a statement. "GM does not expect any material impact on cash flow."

While GM's indication of improved results for the fourth quarter is likely to reassure investors that the automaker is on a recovery track, its continuing accounting problems are bound to provoke concern.

While some of the past restatements appear to be technical in nature, the automaker's accounts are being investigated by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and Justice Department.

Last year, GM reported a $10.6 billion loss for 2005 -- after restating the result it issued previously.

That shortfall was dwarfed Thursday by Ford Motor Co.'s announcement that it lost $12.7 billion in 2006 -- the biggest annual loss in its history.

Of Detroit's automakers, struggling against intense competition from Asian rivals in their home market, GM is furthest along in its recovery program, and investors are watching its progress closely. GM said it expected to report "improved performance in its automotive business, including record fourth quarter revenue in 2006."

Analysts have been expecting strong results from GM for 2006, a year in which the automaker pared back its workforce, cut production costs and scaled back less profitable businesses, such as sales to rental car companies. "I think they will not disappoint," analyst Brad Rubin of BNP Paribas said prior to GM's announcement that it would delay and restate results.

"The company expects to be profitable on a reported consolidated basis in the 2006 fourth quarter, and net income is expected to improve significantly over the fourth quarter of 2005," GM said in its statement.

It said it had improved its liquidity position, ending the year with around $26.4 billion in cash and equivalents, an increase of about $5.9 billion over year-earlier levels.

In its statement, GM also said GMAC, its former finance arm, was not able to supply information on time that GM needed for its fourth-quarter report. GM sold 51 percent of GMAC on Nov. 30 as part of an effort to raise cash.

The automaker confirmed Thursday that it was considering the sale of its Allison Transmission division in Indianapolis.

GM did not say when it would report its fourth-quarter and annual results but will provide information on the progress of its financial reporting in early February. It said it expected to file its annual report on Form 10-K with the SEC by March 1, the due date.

OUTSIDE INFLUENCE How Borrowed Shares Swing Company Votes (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

Private investment firms have found a simple way to profit from the workings of public companies: Borrow their shares, and then swing the outcomes of their votes.

In some cases, the strategy has allowed speculators to gamble that a company's stock will drop, and then vote for decisions that will ensure that it does -- without their ever having to own any stock themselves. Some outside interests have used the strategy to hide their voting power within a company until the last moment. Often, individual shareholders don't realize their own stocks, and their voting rights, have been borrowed from their brokerage accounts, until it's too late.

Fueling the practice -- dubbed "empty voting" in a study by two University of Texas professors -- is a booming business in lending shares. That business has nearly doubled in the past five years, according to one report, and now earns $8 billion a year for big brokerages and banks plus an unknown amount for institutional investors. Voting rights are lent along with the shares, and increasingly, that is leading to unintended consequences.

Vote counters often fail to keep track accurately and let the borrowers and owners of the same shares both cast votes. Four big banks paid the New York Stock Exchange $2.35 million last year to settle charges in this area. Meanwhile, other shareholders often are unaware that a big voting bloc has no real ownership stake in the company -- and that it may vote directly opposite the wishes of the stock's actual owners.

This phenomenon has gotten the attention of regulators, who fear it is escalating just as shareholder voting is gaining importance as a way to improve corporate governance and keep management excesses in check. If elections can be too easily gamed, critics fear, a basic foundation of public companies -- that shareholders vote in the company's best interest -- will be undermined.

The practice "is almost certainly going to force further regulatory response to ensure that investors' interests are protected," Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox said in an interview. "This is already a serious issue and it is showing all signs of growing."

The SEC has no firm plans yet. Britain's securities regulator, the Financial Services Authority, has begun a study into whether to force greater disclosure of large investors' stakes in companies, regardless of whether they own stocks or are just borrowing them. One of the largest pension-fund managers there, Hermes, has called for regulators to outlaw voting altogether by borrowers of shares. In Hong Kong, the Securities and Futures Commission said it is studying "issues relating to borrowed shares and voting."

The concern arises just as more companies are moving toward requiring a majority of all shares to elect directors, instead of simply a plurality of those casting votes. A recent U.S. federal appeals court decision opened the door to giving shareholders a greater say in the election and nomination of directors, and the SEC recently approved a rule to make it easier for investors to put up their own slates of directors. But the vulnerability of the voting system could set back such efforts.

"It seems in trying to perfect corporate governance, we were polishing an apple that had a lot of worms inside, and we didn't know it," says Carol Hayes, corporate secretary of Coca-Cola Co., and a member of the Society of Corporate Secretaries and Governance Professionals.

The opportunity for "empty voting" arises when brokerage firms or institutional fund managers lend the shares they manage to hedge funds or other firms, for a fee that can rise with how difficult the shares are to get. The value of securities borrowed on any given day has reached $1.6 trillion after several years of double-digit growth, according to Astec Marketing Research Group Inc., a New York capital-markets research firm.

When it comes times for a shareholder vote, it's the borrowers that hold the voting rights. Under Delaware law, where most large companies are incorporated, voting rights belong to whoever holds the stock on a date the company chooses in advance of its stockholder meeting. It's as if in the U.S. electoral system, someone could borrow your voting rights and use them to vote in your place without your knowing it. Individual share owners often are unaware that contracts with brokerages normally allow the brokerages to make money by lending out stock if it's held in margin accounts, just as banks profit from lending their cash deposits.

The owners must ask for their stock to be recalled if they want to vote -- which means they would have to know the stock was lent and that the vote was coming. If their stocks are lent, the borrowers of the shares, not the owners, are supposed to receive invitations to vote. Stocks in cash accounts aren't affected.

READ THE STUDY

See the study by law professors Hu and Black1, which cites 22 instances in which either borrowed stock or hedging strategies, or both, were used.

No one knows how widespread "empty voting" is. Law professors Henry Hu and Bernard Black at the University of Texas at Austin have studied 22 instances world-wide from 2001 through 2006 in which either borrowed stock or hedging strategies, or both, were used. (See Messrs. Hu and Black's study2.) Consider one example:

Henderson Land Development Co., Hong Kong's third-largest property developer, owned 73% of a subsidiary called Henderson Investment. It offered a rich premium in November 2005 to buy the rest. It had failed in a similar effort three years earlier, but this time it came back with a better offer. Under Hong Kong law, the deal would go through unless 10% of all the shares opposed it. Since the parent owned such a large stake and large institutions backed the deal, passage was considered a foregone conclusion.

Yet the acquisition was voted down early last year by a slim margin. Several market participants were quoted in news reports saying there was a surge in borrowed shares by at least one hedge fund ahead of the vote, compared with little if any lending in Henderson shares over the previous seven months.

By borrowing the shares and simultaneously shorting the underlying stock, the hedge funds gained the voting rights to squash the deal and stood to profit when the stock dropped 18% the next day. After the Henderson vote, the Hong Kong regulator said it was examining voting practices.

"It appears that one or more hedge funds borrowed Henderson Investment shares before the record date, voted against the buyout, and then sold those shares short, thus profiting from its private knowledge that the buyout would be defeated," the Texas professors wrote in the May 2006 Southern California Law Review. A Henderson spokeswoman declined to comment.

Altogether the professors analyzed 12 instances in which it appeared that hedge funds or other large shareholders voted to try to swing public-company contests in their favor without much ownership stake. In 10 others, they said investors just hid their stake in the company until a vote.

The shareholder vote is rooted firmly in corporate law, which is based on the notion that shareholders vote in the best interests of the company in which they own stock. The effects of short-selling and other sophisticated instruments that can separate a vote from economic interest were never considered. "You have this whole superstructure built on this notion that there is this coupling of economic interest and voting power," says Mr. Hu. "With these financial innovations, you're screwing around with the foundation."

Hedge funds say their actions are legitimate, lawful and many times in the best interest of their investors. Often they borrow stock or use a hedging strategy to minimize the risk of their stake without any intention to affect the votes of the companies. They also say that if institutions can make money by lending shares, there shouldn't be a judgment against those who borrow.

"You should be able to vote your shares irrationally if you want," says Mark Weingarten, a partner in New York with law firm Schulte Roth & Zable who advises hedge funds. He adds, "The rules and state law simply haven't caught up with the marketplace for sophisticated trading techniques. They never contemplated the slicing and dicing of ownership and voting power that's done in the marketplace."

It's routine for hedge funds and other investors to borrow shares to vote them. Many individual investors hold their shares in margin accounts with their brokers. Brokers lend those shares out, often when they are requested by short-sellers, who borrow shares in the expectation the price will fall, sell them and hope to profit by buying them back at a lower price.

The California Public Employees' Retirement System reported in October that it made $129.4 million in net income from lending securities for the year ending March 31, 2006. Critics say investors like Calpers shouldn't lend their shares if borrowers will use them in ways to undermine corporate governance. Proponents of securities lending say Calpers and other institutional investors have a fiduciary duty to make the most money for their constituents.

Not everyone agrees where the fiduciary duty lies. Lord, Abbett & Co., a mutual-fund company, has scaled back its stock lending program recently, saying it sometimes didn't get securities back in time to vote and decided that the money it was earning from lending out stocks wasn't worth it. "It was impeding our corporate governance efforts in a troubling number of circumstances," says Robert Morris, chief investment officer at Lord Abbett.

Calpers says it prohibits lending its 30 largest equity investments to make sure they will be available for voting, and on a second list monitors 300 of its largest so that if Calpers wants to vote the shares, it can try to get them back. A Calpers spokesman called those measures "a sufficient safeguard for our interests, for the time being."

Brokerage firms keep records of which shares are lent out when, and which holders of stocks are supposed to have the votes. But shares can be lent and re-lent and the records don't always keep up. Sometimes proxies are sent to both owners and borrowers, leading to "overvoting."

The New York Stock Exchange, which says tracking of votes has become inadequate, found overvotes in almost all the shareholder votes it tested at Deutsche Bank in 2002 and 2003: 23 of 27 instances. "There shouldn't be overvoting," John Thain, chief executive of NYSE Group Inc., said in a speech last year. "The question is, 'How do we prevent that from happening?' "

Last February, Deutsche Bank agreed to pay $1 million, without admitting or denying wrongdoing, to settle NYSE allegations that the brokerage firm didn't have proper systems in place. In June, UBS Securities, Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and Credit Suisse Securities agreed to pay a total of $1.35 million, without admitting or denying wrongdoing, to settle similar NYSE charges.

James Morphy, the head of mergers and acquisitions at New York-based law firm Sullivan & Cromwell, says because the votes haven't yet affected many outcomes in general corporate elections, companies haven't spent the time or money to dig deeply into who actually owns and votes their stocks. "To the extent there are a lot more voting contests, these issues are going to come to the fore," he said. As shareholders are getting more power in the wake of management scandals, votes are narrowing, which forces companies to pay more attention to who their shareholders are -- as have the growth and increased combativeness of hedge funds.

One way "empty voting" occurs is by borrowing stock ahead of the date that companies use to determine which stockholders can vote at a particular meeting. Record dates are usually set 30 days before a vote, designed to give companies adequate time to print and mail information to its shareholders of record.

In 2002, activist British hedge fund Laxey Partners, which owned a 1% stake in British Land, a major British property owner, sought to break up the company and oust its chairman John Ritblat. With a key proxy vote approaching, Laxey boosted its voting stake in British Land to 9% by borrowing more than 40 million shares days before the record date. By being shareholders of record on the record date, Laxey was entitled to vote at the next meeting.

In the end, Laxey's proposals were defeated. But Mr. Ritblat criticized Laxey for borrowing the shares, saying it wasn't good corporate governance. The three institutions that lent out shares -- Hermes, Barclays Global Investors and Scottish Widows, a life insurance and investment arm of Lloyds TSB -- apologized to British Land. Hermes says it didn't lend shares to Laxey but apologized to British Land for not recalling its shares and voting its full strength in support of management.

Since then, several large pension funds have taken notice and established internal systems to allow them to recall shares ahead of a vote and better monitor which shares are lent.

Because corporate voting is mostly governed by state law, the SEC's main tool in voting issues is requiring more disclosure. "Empty voting" usually doesn't trigger current disclosure rules because they don't cover borrowed stock or derivative holdings unless an investor owns more than 5%. Many hedge funds own just shy of 5%, Mr. Hu says -- and then use empty-voting strategies to enlarge or hide their stake.

Paul Atkins, a Republican SEC commissioner, expressed concern in a speech this week that empty-voting and other techniques should be considered as the SEC looks to tackle other shareholder proposals. That could delay the SEC from moving forward in resolving whether shareholders are permitted to nominate their own directors on corporate ballots.

One potential solution is to give institutional investors better notice of important proxy votes so they can know to recall shares -- and the attached voting rights -- that they've lent. Some investors already write recall options into their lending contracts, but brokerage firms have advised it could make borrowing those shares less attractive.

Professors Hu and Black recommend regulators require disclosure of an investor's complete stake, however it is held. Disclosure now "is so patchwork, you almost never see it," says Mr. Hu. "We need to get a better grip on just how extensive these practices are."

Regulators, however, don't want to disrupt the stock-lending market, and also have to be careful that any fix doesn't have the reverse effect that they intend. For instance, weighing votes by how long the stock has been held could curtail empty voting but disenfranchise individual investors, too.

Federal Agents Raise Ante On Overseas Corruption (PORTBIZ)

By Cathy Cheney

Portland (OR) Business Journal, January 19, 2007

A push by the U.S. Department of Justice to combat corruption overseas means Oregon companies need to pay particular attention to how they win contracts with government officials in foreign business markets.

About a year ago, the Justice Department beefed up its enforcement of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act by devoting more resources to it, including several staff members whose sole purpose is to crack down on corruption in international markets. Passed in 1977 and amended in 1988, the FCPA prohibits U.S. companies from paying bribes to foreign officials in order to gain new business or retain existing contracts.

Schnitzer Steel Industries Inc. felt the act's new teeth last October when its Korean subsidiary, SSI International Far East Ltd., was forced to pay a $7.5 million fine for violating the FCPA and engaging in conspiracy and wire fraud. SSI Korea admitted to paying more than $1.8 million in bribes over a five-year period to nearly all of Schnitzer Steel's government-owned customers in China as well as private customers in China and South Korea, according to the Justice Department.

The bribes, paid to secure scrap metal purchases from Schnitzer, resulted in gross revenue of more than $602 million and nearly $55 million in profits on scrap metal sold to private-sector Chinese and South Korean customers during those five years. Schnitzer's earnings on scrap metal sold to government-owned entities in China during that period totaled more than $96 million in gross revenue and yielded more than $6 million in profits.

Besides the $7.5 million federal fine, Schnitzer agreed to pay $7.7 million in civil penalties to the Securities and Exchange Commission for violating the FCPA, according to the Justice Department.

The Schnitzer case illustrates the responsibility U.S. companies carry under the FCPA, said Chris Helmer, head of the business litigation practice group at Portland law firm Miller Nash LLP. American companies doing business abroad are liable not only for the actions of their subsidiaries, but anyone working on their behalf, she said.

"A lot of businesses think they are immune if they're working through an agent or distributor in a foreign country," Helmer said, but the FCPA requires U.S. companies to conduct due diligence to ensure their representatives obey the act's provisions. "You don't insulate yourself by using an agent or distributor."

In the Schnitzer case, the company agreed to adopt internal compliance measures that must be monitored by an independent consultant to ensure the company adheres to them.

Such measures already are in place -- voluntarily -- at Intel Corp.'s Oregon operations, where employees receive extensive, mandatory training about the FCPA, said James Jarrett, legal and government affairs director, who is based at Intel headquarters in Santa Clara, Calif. No third party monitors Intel's training efforts.

"Intel has scores of people working with government representatives worldwide, so it is very important that we interact with these officials in a way that will be positive for both sides," Jarrett said. "One base requirement is that we adhere to the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act and equivalent local legislation. Because we are governed by the requirements of the FCPA and similar local laws, we make sure that all of our people, particularly within government affairs, public affairs, and the sales and marketing groups, are well aware of the details of the FCPA and other government laws and regulations."

Intel employees are expected to screen local agents and consultants on an ongoing basis for FCPA compliance, and immediately report to their manager and Intel's legal counsel if they become aware of an FCPA violation. Employees who fail to comply with state, federal and international regulations can be fired and may be held personally liable as well, said Bill MacKenzie, Intel's communications manager.

Low Funding 'threatens' US Futures Regulator (FT)

By Jeremy Grant In Houston

Financial Times, January 26, 2007

The US futures industry regulator, the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, is at "critical levels" in its funding and staffing that threaten its ability to carry out its mission, a commissioner at the agency will warn Thursday.

The comments by Walter Lukken, a Republican who is one of five CFTC commissioners, come as the regulator faces calls from Democratic lawmakers that Congress extend its mandate to the vast over-the-counter energy markets.

There is increasing concern that the CFTC is struggling to carry out its existing mandate to oversee the exchange-traded futures markets, let alone be capable of expanding its oversight to the rapidly growing OTC markets. OTC markets are where trades are negotiated privately between counterparties, unlike on a formal exchange such as the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Such markets have grown rapidly in the last five years and are more lightly regulated than traditional energy futures markets on exchanges like the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Consumer groups, utility companies and lawmakers say the growth of OTC markets means they must be subjected to the same level of oversight as exchange-traded energy futures if federal regulators are to be able to detect and prevent manipulation that could affect the prices that consumers pay for gas and petrol.

On Wednesday, the American Public Gas Association, whose members are 950 public gas systems across the US, was joined by the Iowa public gas system in calling on Congress to enact legislation that would empower the CFTC to collect information concerning trading positions held by the largest traders in the OTC natural gas derivatives markets – as is done with formal exchanges.

"It simply makes no sense to have oversight of one portion of the market and no oversight over another, particularly given that the OTC markets are one of the fastest growing segments of the natural gas marketplace," the groups said in a letter to Tom Harkin, chairman of the senate agriculture committee, which is responsible for overseeing the CFTC.

However, Mr Lukken is expected to tell a conference on energy trading speculation in Houston that the CFTC's continued ability to apply its relatively flexible, "principles-based" regulation of markets under the existing scope of its mandate could be jeopardised if the agency is not given added resources.

"Despite record exchange trading volumes, employee levels at the CFTC are the lowest in the agency's 30-year history," he will say Thursday in a speech obtained by the Financial Times. "Unless the proper funds are dedicated to our mission, this regulatory tool cannot be properly utilised and could end up sitting idle, gathering dust while these markets and investors are jeopardised due to the lack of regulatory oversight."

The conference, hosted by the University of Houston's "Global Energy Management Institute", will focus on speculation in the energy markets, including the OTC markets.

Craig Pirrong, the institute's energy management director, said: "Government reports and private analysts have blamed speculation for recent [energy price] volatility, and they are advocating tighter regulations [of OTC markets]. Economists, on the other hand, believe that speculation facilitates the transfer of risk from those who are very averse to it to those who are less averse."

Judge Rules Against Former H-P Executive (WSJ)

By Christopher Lawton

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

A former Hewlett-Packard Co. executive who accused the giant printer and computer maker of paying an informant to gain information about rival Dell Inc., among other things, was ordered to withdraw his counterclaim against the company on Thursday.

Judge Michael Schneider of the Eastern District Court of Texas, Tyler Division, ruled that former H-P vice president Karl Kamb, Jr. must withdraw his counterclaim against H-P filed on Jan. 19th. In the counterclaim, under which Mr. Kamb alleges breach of contract and emotional distress and was seeking an unspecified amount in damages, the former executive said the Palo Alto, Calif., company had instructed him to covertly gather information about Dell's planned entry into the printer market in 2002.

H-P gave a monthly stipend to one informant, Katsumi Iizuka, the former president of Dell Japan, in the form of payments to a company called Dinner Inc., the claim asserts. H-P later investigated Mr. Kamb for misappropriated funds intended for Dinner, according to the claim.

Mr. Kamb also says H-P attempted to illegally gain access to his phone records through pretexting, a tactic the company used to obtain phone records for its own board members and others in a boardroom scandal last year. Subsequently, Mr. Kamb was terminated and denied his severance package.

Mr. Kamb's counterclaim is a response to an amended lawsuit filed by H-P against him and others last August. In H-P's suit, the company alleged Mr. Kamb and a team secretly organized and began a competing business venture against H-P using company resources, contacts and trade secrets.

In a statement earlier, H-P spokesman Ryan Donovan said, "This counterclaim is wholly without merit." Mr. Kamb's attorneys didn't immediately return calls for comment.

Dell spokesman Bob Pearson said in a statement, "There is no place for industrial espionage, and if we discover that we have been the victim of that we will consider all appropriate actions in response."

CNBC Defends Anchor Bartiromo (WSJ)

By Brooks Barnes And Monica Langley

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

CNBC yesterday moved to defend its star anchor Maria Bartiromo, amid increasing questions about her relationship with a former top Citigroup executive.

Earlier this week, the financial-services conglomerate ousted Todd Thomson, chief of its wealth-management unit, after Mr. Thomson's spending and friendship with Ms. Bartiromo angered Citigroup Chairman and Chief Executive Charles Prince. His concerns related to judgment issues, including improper use of the corporate jet -- one case involving a trip from Asia with Ms. Bartiromo -- and a decision to spend $5 million on a Sundance Channel program in which she would appear, according to a person familiar with the situation.

"Maria Bartiromo ... works tirelessly around the world in the service of business journalism," CNBC said in a prepared statement. "In 2006 alone, she made 46 public appearances on behalf of CNBC. Her travel has been company-related and approved, and involved legitimate business assignments. Her record and reporting speak for themselves." CNBC, a business-news channel, is owned by General Electric Co.'s NBC Universal.

CNBC says any trips by Ms. Bartiromo on the Citigroup jet were preapproved and fell under the "source development" section of its code of ethics. The channel considers the matter closed and says it isn't investigating Ms. Bartiromo's relationship with Citigroup.

For over a decade, Ms. Bartiromo has been a primary anchor and public face of CNBC. In the late 1990s, when the Internet was helping Wall Street become more accessible to millions, Ms. Bartiromo helped to usher in a new era of TV business journalism, bringing glitz and celebrity to what had been a staid genre.

Business-news organizations including CNBC have strict regulations regarding accepting gifts or payment from outside companies, or in any way compromising their ability to provide news coverage of those companies. Consequently, the disclosure of Ms. Bartiromo's ties to Mr. Thomson has drawn media scrutiny. The Wall Street Journal carried a front-page story2 Wednesday detailing the role of Mr. Thomson's relationship with Ms. Bartiromo in his ouster by Citigroup.

Dow Jones & Co., publisher of The Wall Street Journal, provides news content to CNBC. Ms. Bartiromo hosts the syndicated program "Wall Street Journal Report with Maria Bartiromo" but is a CNBC employee. A Dow Jones spokesman declined to comment.

Ms. Bartiromo has reported substantial pieces on Citigroup 11 times since 2004, according to a review of CNBC transcripts, including four interviews with Mr. Thomson.

Citigroup records show that Ms. Bartiromo flew on its corporate jets a few times, but Mr. Thomson tried but failed to get her on the jet on at least one occasion. More than a year ago, Mr. Thomson was entertaining some private-banking clients on a ski vacation at his home in the members-only Yellowstone Club resort near Bozeman, Mont. While there, he requested a Citigroup plane to fly Ms. Bartiromo to his house, according to a person familiar with the situation. The Citigroup official who was asked to approve the requisition rejected it. Ms. Bartiromo ultimately didn't make the trip, the person said. Ms. Bartiromo and Mr. Thomson declined to comment, according to the spokesman for both, Charles McLean.

Mr. Thomson has told colleagues that bringing Ms. Bartiromo to events was a great "business-building tool" with important clients.

News organizations often give approval for their reporters to take corporate jets if the flights represent a journalistic opportunity like access to a certain executive; the rule is to reimburse the company for what a commercial, often first-class, ticket to or from that destination would cost.

Inside CNBC and NBC Universal, according to executives and reporters for the channel, there is a feeling that the channel and Ms. Bartiromo have been caught in unfair crossfire from Citigroup. These people say Citigroup was concerned that Mr. Thomson might be leaking Ms. Bartiromo information -- particularly after the anchor broke the news that former chairman Sanford Weill planned to leave the company -- and therefore didn't distance her from the Thomson imbroglio. A Citigroup spokeswoman declined to comment.

NBC Universal executives say they gave approval last spring for Ms. Bartiromo to tape a portion of a Sundance Channel series examining the intersection of the environment and business. But the format of the series soon changed and by last July Ms. Bartiromo was no longer a formal host, although plans still called for her to appear. NBC Universal owns a minor stake in Sundance Channel.

This isn't the first time Ms. Bartiromo has garnered attention over journalistic issues. Last spring, Ms. Bartiromo ran into Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke at a cocktail party before the annual White House correspondents' dinner and asked him if his public statements were being misinterpreted by investors. He said yes. Ms. Bartiromo reported the scoop on her Monday program, roiling financial markets. She drew criticism because the annual dinner is widely known to be an off-the-record event. Ms. Bartiromo said Mr. Bernanke was speaking for attribution at the time.

In 2003, Ms. Bartiromo prompted CNBC to institute a new stock-ownership policy for its staff after she disclosed during an on-air interview with then-Citigroup Chairman Sanford Weill that she owned 1,000 shares of the company's stock. Most major news outlets prohibit newsroom staff from owning stocks of companies they cover. Ownership by family members is also strictly regulated. Under CNBC's new rules, staffers are prohibited from owning individual stocks and bonds, including stock in parent General Electric, unless such stock is part of a company plan such as a 401(k) or owned through a mutual fund or blind trust.

Anchor's Ties To Citigroup Attract Scrutiny (NYT)

By Geraldine Fabrikant

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

Late last year, an executive from Citigroup phoned an official connected with CNBC, the cable business news channel. According to people with knowledge of the call, the Citigroup executive made it clear that Maria Bartiromo, the popular CNBC anchor, would not be permitted to fly on Citigroup's corporate jet again.

Shortly before that, Todd S. Thomson, the head of Citigroup's global wealth management group, arranged for Ms. Bartiromo to speak to some Citigroup clients in Hong Kong and Shanghai. Ms. Bartiromo had flown home with Mr. Thomson on the corporate jet, bumping several company bankers from the plane.

Mr. Thomson was let go by Citigroup this week amid concerns over his judgment, his expenses and the way he handled some of his interactions with the CNBC anchor, including his decision to have Citigroup put $5 million into a multiyear sponsorship of a program on the Sundance Channel cable television network that would have Ms. Bartiromo as a co-host.

Ms. Bartiromo, by contrast, has the strong support of her employer. CNBC, which had said that her flight was pre-approved and that Citigroup was compensated, issued a statement yesterday that said she had not violated any of the channel's ethical standards. It called her "one of the most prolific and well-respected financial journalists in the industry."

Despite CNBC's blessing, it is unusual for a financial journalist to make a public appearance on behalf of a major advertiser. That incident and other associations with Mr. Thomson have raised questions about Ms. Bartiromo's judgment in getting too close to the people and organizations that she covers.

CNBC executives dismissed any suggestion of an ethics breach in any of Ms. Bartiromo's activities involving Citigroup. Neither Mr. Thomson nor Ms. Bartiromo would comment for this article.

The episode comes at an awkward time for CNBC. Having endured a long ratings and advertising slump after the last bull market, the network has been on a run, becoming a growing profit center for NBC Universal. At the moment, the channel has no competitors in the field of 24-hour business news coverage on television, but the News Corporation, controlled by Rupert Murdoch, has been promising for almost three years to start a business channel.

As CNBC's most visible asset, Ms. Bartiromo, who is married to Jonathan Steinberg, son of the financier Saul Steinberg, has become something of a celebrity. She has written two financial books and has a regular column in BusinessWeek magazine. And she is often seen at corporate or political events: she is spending this week leading the network's coverage from the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland.

Some of the events put her in close proximity to Citigroup executives. According to one of last year's guests at Davos, Ms. Bartiromo made the trip back to the United States on the Citigroup private jet on that occasion as well. She appeared at a Citigroup-sponsored awards event in London in 2005, as co-host of the event with another CNBC anchor, Simon Hobbs. Mr. Thomson represented Citigroup at the event.

One executive representing CNBC said that Ms. Bartiromo had made "no more than two" trips on the Citigroup jet. CNBC executives would not agree to be quoted by name because they said they did want to be seen as adding anything to what they considered an illegitimate inquiry.

CNBC also denied that Ms. Bartiromo had involvement with Citigroup more so than other businesses. In its statement, CNBC said, "In 2006 alone, she made 46 public appearances on behalf of CNBC."

The CNBC representative said that as the on-air figure most closely associated with the channel, Ms. Bartiromo routinely made promotional appearances at corporate events. Many of the corporations advertise on CNBC. Citigroup is among the biggest advertisers, a CNBC spokesman said.

Of the 46 appearances Ms. Bartiromo made in 2006, the CNBC representative said, only three were on behalf of Citigroup. The list of other companies with events at which she appeared last year included Google, Schwab and Dow Jones.

In no case was Ms. Bartiromo paid for speaking at the events, the CNBC representative said. The channel defended Ms. Bartiromo's travel arrangements. The statement said, "Her travel has been company-related and approved, and involved legitimate business assignments." The CNBC representative added that the awards event in London was a routine appearance for Ms. Bartiromo.

CNBC also dismissed any connection between Citigroup's sponsorship in the Sundance Channel program and Ms. Bartiromo's participation.

The CNBC representative noted that CNBC's parent company, NBC Universal, owns more than 50 percent of the Sundance Channel; so Ms. Bartiromo, an NBC employee, was a logical choice as host of a Sundance program. Her selection for the program came long before Citigroup's decision to invest, the representative said. She has since ended her participation in the program.

There are other connections between Ms. Bartiromo and Mr. Thomson. In 2004, she was named to an advisory board for the Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania. A Wharton news release then reported that Mr. Thomson — who, along with his wife, had made a gift of $500,000 to the Wharton Center to Support Leadership and Change Management — had led the formation of the advisory board, which included Ms. Bartiromo.

In June 2005, she and Mr. Thomson were co-hosts of a leadership conference at Wharton. A Wharton spokeswoman did not return phone calls yesterday seeking comment.

Ms. Bartiromo has drawn criticism before. In 2003, she disclosed during an interview with Citigroup's chief executive, Sanford I. Weill, that she owned 1,000 shares of stock in his company. Many journalistic enterprises consider it an ethics breach for reporters to own shares in businesses they cover, and CNBC tightened its guidelines soon after the interview. In 2006, she reported off-the-record comments by the Federal Reserve chairman, Ben S. Bernanke.

But CNBC remained supportive. "Her record and reporting speak for themselves," its statement said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Justice Dept. Announces More Manpower, Equipment For New Orleans (AP)

By Mary Foster, The Associated Press

AP, January 26, 2007

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — New Orleans is getting additional federal manpower and equipment to help its beleaguered police force fight violent crime that increased as the city repopulates following Hurricane Katrina in August 2005.

"The goal is to help take the pressure off local officials and to turn up the heat on these violent felons," U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said at a news conference.

Among initiatives announced Thursday morning by Letten and by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in Washington is a plan to have a "small number" of agents from the FBI, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the Drug Enforcement Administrations work with the New Orleans Police Department around the clock.

"These federal agents will identify cases that are subject to federal jurisdiction, provide the necessary investigative assistance to make federal arrests, and follow up with federal prosecutions," the Justice Department said in a news release.

U.S. Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., said she was pleased with the Justice Department's moves which tracked suggestions to Gonzales she initially pushed earlier this month.

"This additional manpower and technical assistance is essential to backing up the efforts of our local law enforcement agencies in the fight against violent crime in New Orleans and the region," Landrieu said.

"Additional federal resources and technical assistance is only one solution," she added. "More reform and coordination on the ground in New Orleans must continue. Only with across-the-board commitment and dedication to new solutions will we back down these criminals and win the fight."

Also, the department is extending funding for six assistant U.S. attorneys already assigned to the area to stay through the end of the current federal fiscal year; and ATF has obtained new ballistics equipment to replace the National Integrated Ballistics Identification Network equipment that had been deployed at a New Orleans Police Department site, but was destroyed by Katrina.

"By the end of February, ATF will move the NIBIN equipment to the new ATF offices to facilitate use and access until the police department is able to identify a suitable permanent site," the Justice Department announcement said.

The equipment will allow New Orleans to link with over 200 sites throughout the country to compare ballistics information

ATF also will assign more agents to supplement the six ATF agents permanently assigned to its New Orleans Violent Crime Impact Team (VCIT). The FBI will add nine agents to its Violent Gang Safe Streets Task Force in New Orleans. Meanwhile, the Justice Department said, and the DEA temporarily has been provided authority to investigate and enforce all federal criminal law, in addition to federal drug laws. "This authority will allow DEA agents to assist the New Orleans Police Department in maintaining law and order in the City of New Orleans," the Justice Department release said.

U.S. Sen. David Vitter, R-La., also praised Gonzales' decision to address the city's law enforcement needs.

"My focus has been to place more federal agents in New Orleans and to get them to immediately coordinate with local law enforcement on the ground," said Vitter. "To end the reign of fear, we must protect our citizens and enable them to assist law enforcement."

Katrina virtually emptied the city of its residents when it hit in August 2005. The city has been slow to repopulate since then, and crime has returned along with the people. With a population estimated at 200,000, less than half the pre-Katrina population of 454,000, the city had 161 killings last year. That's a per capita murder rate of 81 murders per 100,000 people.

The rate was 56 per 100,000 in 2004, when the city had 264 murders.

The police force is down from its pre-Katrina level of 1,700 officers to about 1,400. But that number includes about 100 officers on leave for injuries or illness.

And Police Superintendent Warren Riley said during Thursday's news conference that the force is losing officers at a rate of about 17 per month. Better pay in other jurisdictions is luring many away, he said.

Law Enforcement Turns Up Heat In N.O. (BRADV)

By Joe Gyan Jr., Advocate New Orleans Bureau

Baton Rouge Advocate, January 26, 2007

NEW ORLEANS — U.S. Attorney Jim Letten announced Thursday that the Justice Department and a host of other federal law enforcement agencies are turning up the heat on drug activity and violent crime in New Orleans to get the "thugs and predators'' off the city's streets and into federal prison.

"We're not screwing around. We're going to bring all federal resources to bear,'' James Bernazzani, special agent in charge of the FBI's New Orleans office, said during a news conference at the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Those federal resources include more manpower from the FBI, Drug Enforcement Administration and Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms as well as equipment to help the understaffed New Orleans Police Department battle a post-Katrina rise in violent crime.

Bernazzani and William Renton, special agent in charge of the DEA's New Orleans office, both said their agencies will be targeting the "worst of the worst.''

Terry Ebbert, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin's homeland security chief, said residents should notice a difference by June 1 at the latest.

"We're bigger, better and faster than the scum that's out there in the street,'' he said.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Letten announced in Washington and New Orleans, respectively, that the Justice Department is extending funding for six assistant U.S. attorneys already assigned to the area to stay through the end of the current federal fiscal year.

"The people of New Orleans deserve the opportunity to rebuild their communities without the fear of being victimized by violent criminals,'' Gonzales said.

ATF is assigning more agents to supplement the six ATF agents permanently assigned to its New Orleans Violent Crime Impact Team, and the FBI is adding nine agents to its Violent Gang Safe Streets Task Force in the city, Letten said.

"The goal is to help take the pressure off the local criminal justice system and turn up the heat on these violent felons,'' he said.

Meanwhile, the Justice Department has given DEA temporary authority to investigate and enforce all federal criminal law, not just federal drug laws.

"This authority will allow DEA agents to assist the New Orleans Police Department in maintaining law and order in the City of New Orleans,'' a Justice Department news release said.

U.S. Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., and U.S. Rep. David Vitter, R-La., applauded the extra federal law enforcement manpower dispatched to New Orleans.

"This additional manpower and technical assistance is essential to backing up the efforts of our local law enforcement agencies in the fight against violent crime in New Orleans and the region,'' said Landrieu, who called for more federal agents in a 10-point anti-crime plan she unveiled earlier this month.

"I believe we can make strides and clamp down on the crime problems plaguing New Orleans,'' Vitter added. "The increase in the number of agents to the Violent Gang Safe Streets Task Force is just one example of how this continued commitment from the Department of Justice will help.''

Some of the technical assistance that Landrieu referred to includes new ballistics equipment that the ATF has obtained to replace the National Integrated Ballistics Identification Network equipment that had been deployed at a New Orleans Police Department site but was destroyed by Katrina.

David Harper, special agent in charge of the ATF's New Orleans office, said the equipment will allow New Orleans to link with more than 200 sites across the country to compare ballistics information.

Feds Add Firepower To Battle Crime (NOTP)

By Gwen Filosa, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, January 26, 2007

More agents, equipment to help New Orleans police

Federal law enforcement agencies on Thursday vowed to team up with New Orleans police to solve homicides, quell drug trafficking, and walk the beat in an effort to win the confidence of families who call the city's most dangerous neighborhoods home.

The boots-on-the-ground plan, paid for and designed at the federal level, will double the number of federal agents assigned to New Orleans at a time when the city's alarming murder rate is exacerbated by a dwindling police force.

Agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation will patrol the streets with New Orleans police officers. The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives will add six special agents to its team of six permanently assigned to New Orleans, and provide NOPD with ballistics identification equipment to replace what the force lost to Hurricane Katrina.

"The goal is to detain, imprison, prosecute, convict and incarcerate these violent criminals, to take the pressure off the local criminal justice system," U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said at a news conference that drew New Orleans Police Superintendent Warren Riley and leaders from every federal law enforcement agency.

"This is a reflection of support for NOPD," Letten said. "We're giving them more muscle. Our goal is to get as many individuals into the federal system as possible and bring federal laws to bear."

In 90 days, the collective federal effort will review its progress.

Thursday's announcement, which came from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and was delivered by Letten, includes nine additional FBI agents who will join the 13 already assigned to the Violent Gang Safe Streets Task Force.

The Drug Enforcement Administration has been given added authority to investigate and enforce all criminal law, in addition to federal drug laws, with plans to hit the streets of Central City in undercover sweeps.

The U.S. Marshal's office will add three deputies and one investigator to its team.

Police are leaving force

The infusion of federal resources comes at a time when New Orleans still has the National Guard and State Police troopers embedded with local police, and after a recent shakeup among the brass of NOPD districts.

"We are losing about 17 officers a month right now," Riley said. "Our recruits can't live in a $1,200-a-month apartment when they're taking home $700 every other week."

Riley, who spoke briefly at Thursday's news conference, held in the downtown offices of the U.S. attorney, said the NOPD recruiting drive must be successful.

"We're at a point where every avenue is being covered," Riley said. "This city is at a critical point. We obviously have issues with crime and repeat offenders."

In New Orleans, federal agencies said their support of NOPD is nothing new. Since the 2005 hurricane season, the U.S. Department of Justice has delivered some $30 million in grants to New Orleans alone. In total, the department has made available more than $61 million for law enforcement relief.

"We are going to increase and plus-up that relationship," said Jim Bernazzani, the FBI's special agent in charge of the New Orleans field division. "We're not screwing around. The people of New Orleans deserve a better quality of life."

Leaders are shuffled

A violent crime wave recently prompted thousands of people to march on City Hall. New Orleans has recorded 14 homicides this year. In 2006, there were 162 murders in a city that had its population nearly halved in the aftermath of Katrina.

The nation's top prosecutor also weighed in, saying his forces are here to assist at a time of crisis.

"The people of New Orleans deserve the opportunity to rebuild their communities without the fear of being victimized by violent criminals," Gonzales said Thursday in a statement. "Ultimately, New Orleans' violent crime problem must be solved by local leadership and the hard work of local law enforcement professionals."

The local leadership recently shifted, NOPD said last week. Assistant Superintendent Steven Nicholas will take over the NOPD Bureau of Investigations, leaving his post as commander of the Operations Bureau. Deputy Chief Anthony Cannatella will assume command of the Operations Bureau, leaving behind the Bureau of Investigations.

NOPD's 2nd District will be led by Capt. Kirk Bouyelas. Edwin Hosli has left that district to take the helm at the 8th District, which includes the French Quarter.

FBI agents have already joined the 2nd District, which includes dicey street corners in Gert Town and Hollygrove, said Bernazzani. Two of the added FBI agents will work with the NOPD's cold case homicide squad. The federal effort will zero in on repeat offenders and those on the front lines of the city's drug trade.

"Much like how we fight al Qaida," Bernazzani said. "We're identifying the worst of the worst. We're helping NOPD get in front of this. Where we can find the federal hook, we will."

Regain the public's trust

FBI agents will hit the streets with NOPD patrols, knocking on doors in order to build relationships with residents, he added, determined to end the days when citizens distrust police to the point where they neither want to cooperate with investigations nor testify at trials.

"It's going to break this yoke of the community not cooperating with law enforcement," Bernazzani said. "They will see cops caring. They're going to say, 'That's a crack house over there.' "

Citizen involvement is crucial to solving crimes, the federal contingent said Thursday.

David Harper of ATF said his agency brought back its 24-hour gun hotline, (504) 581-GUNS, or 581-4867, to allow citizens to report illegal use and possession of firearms. Since October, he said, the hotline has taken 1,500 calls, with 117 of them leading to investigations.

"One woman called to say drug dealers had taken over her house and she had to move," said Harper, who declined to release details of the pending investigation. A federal search warrant followed, with agents seizing guns, narcotics and cash from the New Orleans house, which the dealers had wired with a surveillance system to alert them to any cops riding by.

"The victim is back in her house and the drug dealers are out of the neighborhood," Harper said.

"We are bigger, stronger and faster than the scum out in the streets today causing this city heartache," said Col. Terry Ebbert, director of Homeland Security for New Orleans. "You can hold us accountable. We will make a difference."

Not a polished crew

Letten said New Orleans' drug trade is far from being an organized crime syndicate. Instead, he said, the city's impoverished pockets are held hostage by independent drug dealers who are all too trigger-happy and deprived of a decent upbringing.

"They come from a failed educational system and poverty, and turn to drugs at an early age and settle things with guns," Letten said. "We need to get these violent offenders in the federal system."

Louisiana: Federal Officials Pledge Help On Crime (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

Responding to an increase in violent crime in New Orleans, the Department of Justice announced it would assign agents to the Police Department "around the clock" to help identify cases that could be prosecuted by federal officials. In other federal efforts to help beleaguered local law enforcement officials, the department also said it would send more agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, expand the authority of Drug Enforcement Administration agents and extend financing for six additional federal prosecutors temporarily posted to the city.

Ex-Cheney Aide Contradicts Libby (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — A former spokeswoman for Vice President Dick Cheney gave testimony in the trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. on Thursday that directly contradicted Mr. Libby's version of events during a crucial period that is at the center of the perjury case against him.

Cathie Martin, Mr. Cheney's former spokeswoman, testified that she had a clear memory of telling both Mr. Cheney and Mr. Libby that a prominent war critic's wife worked for the C.I.A., days before he contends he first learned it from a reporter.

Ms. Martin was the fourth witness for the prosecution in the trial of Mr. Libby, who is charged with lying during an investigation of who leaked the name of the C.I.A. operative, Valerie Wilson. Unlike the previous three witnesses, who worked at the C.I.A. and State Department, Ms. Martin's testimony may prove especially damaging to Mr. Libby because of her perspective as a former insider in the vice president's office and as a former colleague of Mr. Libby. She repeatedly referred to him as Scooter, his nickname.

She testified that both Mr. Cheney and Mr. Libby were intensely interested in Ms. Wilson and her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV, who had been sent to Africa to investigate reports that Saddam Hussein was trying to buy uranium from Niger for his nuclear weapons program.

Ms. Martin, who no longer works for Mr. Cheney but remains at the White House as a communications assistant to the president, described how Mr. Libby had telephoned a senior Central Intelligence Agency official in her presence sometime in early July and asked about the Wilson trip. She said she was then put on the phone with Bill Harlow, the C.I.A. spokesman, who told her that Mr. Wilson went to Africa on behalf of the agency and that his wife worked there.

She testified that, later that day, in a meeting with Mr. Libby and Mr. Cheney, she related the fact that Mr. Wilson's wife worked at the agency.

Mr. Libby is facing five felony counts that he lied when he told a grand jury and F.B.I. agents that he learned of Ms. Wilson's identity from reporters. Ms. Wilson's identity was first disclosed in a news column by Robert Novak on July 14, 2003, just days after her husband had written a commentary in The New York Times asserting that the Bush administration had distorted intelligence to build the case for invading Iraq.

Ms. Martin's testimony raised difficulties for Mr. Libby's defense in two respects. She bolstered the prosecution's assertion that Mr. Libby was made aware of Ms. Wilson's identity from a number of administration officials. He denied passing her name to two reporters, but those reporters have told a grand jury otherwise.

She also described an incident in which his behavior appeared less than noble. She recounted a senior staff meeting at the White House in which Stephen J. Hadley, the deputy national security adviser, expressed anger after receiving a query from Andrea Mitchell of NBC. Ms. Mitchell had heard that the White House was blaming the C.I.A. for causing the president to inaccurately say in his State of the Union address that the British government had confirmed Iraq's efforts to buy uranium in Africa.

Ms. Martin made it clear earlier on Thursday that it was Mr. Libby who had gone out of his way to take on the task of speaking to Ms. Mitchell about that issue.

But at the July meeting in the White House, she said, Mr. Hadley made a point of turning around and looking directly at her as if to signify he knew she was Ms. Mitchell's source.

Ms. Martin was asked by Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the prosecutor, whether she was, in fact, the source.

"No," she said.

Mr. Fitzgerald asked what Mr. Libby was doing when Mr. Hadley was all but accusing her.

DOJ_NMG_0122235

"He was looking down at the floor," she said.

At the end of the meeting, she said, Mr. Hadley took her and other press aides aside and upbraided them further.

Theodore V. Wells Jr., Mr. Libby's chief lawyer, in his cross-examination of Ms. Martin, tried to challenge her memory, as he has done with other witnesses. He noted that she originally told investigators that she spoke to Mr. Harlow sometime after July 7. But she has since acknowledged it must have been earlier because she recognized Mr. Wilson when he appeared on the NBC news program "Meet the Press" on July 7 to make his charges about the administration.

Over all, however, Ms. Martin was a self-assured witness whose testimony appeared to have frayed Mr. Libby's version of events. She is also a loyal Republican who was recruited to work for the vice president by Mary Matalin, a close friend of both Mr. Libby and Mr. Cheney.

She is married to Kevin Martin, the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, and now works as the deputy director of communications for policy and planning for President Bush.

Her cross-examination will continue when the trial resumes Monday. She will be followed on the witness stand by Ari Fleischer, the former White House press secretary.

Cheney's Key Role In Leak Case Detailed (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

WASHINGTON — In the first such account from Vice President Dick Cheney's inner circle, a former aide testified Thursday that Cheney personally directed the effort to discredit an administration critic by having calls made to reporters in 2003.

Cheney dictated detailed "talking points" for his chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, and others on how they could impugn the critic's credibility, said Catherine J. Martin, who was the vice president's top press aide at the time.

Libby is on trial on charges of obstructing an investigation into how the name of a CIA operative, Valerie Plame, became public. The government says her identity emerged in conversations Libby had with several reporters. It is illegal to knowingly divulge the name of a CIA employee.

Plame's name came up in the conversations because she is the wife of former envoy Joseph C. Wilson IV, the critic whom the administration was trying to attack after he publicly raised questions about the intelligence used to justify the invasion of Iraq.

Martin, who is now deputy White House director of communications for policy and planning, testified as a prosecution witness on the third day of Libby's trial. She became the third witness to testify that they had told Libby of Plame's identity well before Libby spoke with the reporters.

That contradicts Libby's statement that he learned of Plame's identity from one of the reporters, Tim Russert of NBC News. Libby is charged with lying to federal agents looking into the leak of Plame's name.

The events unfolded after a New York Times columnist reported in May 2003 that an unnamed diplomat had been sent to Niger the previous year to investigate reports that Saddam Hussein had tried to buy uranium from Africa, and found that the reports were wrong. President Bush's State of the Union speech in January 2003 contained the uranium assertion.

Libby learned that the unnamed diplomat was Wilson, a former ambassador.

Cheney's active role in the campaign to undermine Wilson has been known, but Martin's testimony was the first inside account of the administration's attempts to manage the affair.

Martin said she learned that Plame worked for the CIA after Libby directed her to call the agency to get more information about Wilson's trip to Niger. Martin said she quickly reported the information about Plame to Libby and Cheney.

She described details of a White House media strategy, designed at the highest levels, that sought to rebut charges that Bush had misled the public in his January 2003 speech.

Martin said Cheney's talking points disputed Wilson's allegation that Cheney had authorized the trip to Niger. They also included information from a secret National Intelligence Estimate.

The vice president ordered press aides to start tracking press coverage closely, while Libby was directed to contact reporters. At one point, the vice president gave a note card to Libby with information to give to a Time magazine reporter covering the case, while Cheney and Libby were returning on Air Force Two from the christening of an aircraft carrier.

Martin also described how she discussed with Libby media "options" to rebut Wilson that included a strategic "leak" to a handful of reporters.

But Martin said that neither Cheney nor Libby had suggested that the identity of Plame be divulged as part of the game plan. She said that she had no knowledge of either actually doing so.

"I recall the vice president telling me to keep track of this story, and keep track of the commentators who were continuing to write on this story and talk about us," Martin testified. "We were paying attention to 'Hardball With Chris Matthews' because he had been talking about it a lot."

She described the reaction inside the administration as questions began to be raised, starting in May 2003. The New York Times column said the administration had engaged in a "campaign of wholesale deceit" and suggested that Cheney was directly involved.

Martin said Libby asked her to call the then-chief public affairs officer at the CIA, William Harlow, to find out about the trip by Wilson.

"So I was saying, 'Who sent him? Who is this guy?' " Martin testified. "I remember Bill Harlow saying his name was Joe Wilson, he was a charge in Baghdad, and his wife works over here."

Martin said she promptly went to see Cheney and Libby with the news.

Wilson published an op-ed column in the New York Times on July 6, 2003, describing his trip. The same day, he aired his concerns on the NBC program "Meet the Press." Almost immediately, Martin said she was huddling again with Cheney about how to respond to a surge in press inquires.

"He dictated to me what he wanted to say," Martin said.

The detailed response covered eight points, including a reference to a sensitive intelligence-community assessment. Martin testified that she was "not sure if I could use that point" because she believed at the time that the report was classified.

Later, she said, she discussed with Cheney and Libby how she had learned from Harlow that two network reporters were writing stories about the case, and how Cheney ordered Libby to call them personally, including one call that Libby made from his private anteroom outside of Cheney's office.

"I was aggravated that Scooter was calling the reporters and that I wasn't," Martin said.

The trial is expected to resume Monday with testimony from former White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer.

Leak case timeline

I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is being tried on five counts related to the leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's name in 2003. Some important events in the case:

2003:

• Jan. 28: President Bush says in his State of the Union address: "The British government has learned that Saddam Hussein recently sought significant quantities of uranium from Africa."

• May 6: New York Times columnist Nicholas D. Kristof reports that a former ambassador, whom he does not name, had been sent to Niger in 2002 to investigate the uranium report. The column says the former envoy reported to the CIA and State Department well before Bush's speech that the uranium story was unequivocally wrong and was based on forged documents.

• May 29: Libby asks Marc Grossman, an undersecretary of State, for information about the ambassador's travel to Niger. Grossman later tells Libby that Joseph C. Wilson IV is the former ambassador.

• June 11 or 12: Grossman tells Libby that Wilson's wife works at the CIA and that State Department personnel are saying Wilson's wife was involved in planning the trip. A senior CIA officer gives him similar information.

• July 6: The New York Times publishes an opinion piece by Wilson titled "What I Didn't Find in Africa," and he appears on NBC's "Meet the Press." Wilson said he doubted Iraq had obtained uranium from Niger recently and thought Cheney's office was told of the results of his trip.

• July 7: Libby meets with then-White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer. Libby notes that Wilson's wife works at the CIA and that the information is not widely known.

• July 8: Libby meets with Miller again and tells her that he believes Wilson's wife works for the CIA.

• July 12: Libby speaks to Time magazine's Matthew Cooper and confirms to him that he has heard that Wilson's wife was involved in sending Wilson on the trip. Libby also speaks to Miller and discusses Wilson's wife and says that she works at the CIA.

• July 14: Syndicated columnist Robert Novak reports that Wilson's wife is a CIA operative on weapons of mass destruction and that two senior administration officials, whom Novak does not name, said she suggested sending her husband to Niger to investigate the uranium story.

• Sept. 26: A criminal investigation is authorized to determine who leaked Plame's identity to reporters. Disclosing the identity of CIA operatives is illegal.

• Oct. 14 and Nov. 26: Libby is interviewed by FBI agents.

• Oct. 28: Libby is indicted on five counts: obstruction of justice and two counts each of false statement and perjury.

2006:

• Sept. 7: Former Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage admits he leaked Plame's identity to Novak and to Bob Woodward of the Washington Post. Armitage says he did not realize Plame's job was covert. Woodward taped his June 13, 2003, interview with Armitage.

Ex-spokeswoman Contradicts Libby Account (AP)

By Michael J. Sniffen

Vice President Dick Cheney's spokeswoman testified Thursday she told I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby that a prominent war critic's wife was a CIA employee earlier than Libby has said he first learned it from a reporter.

On the third day of Libby's trial, Cathie Martin became the first member of Cheney's inner circle to contradict statements by Libby that led to the charges he lied to the FBI and a grand jury investigating who leaked the wife's identity to reporters in 2003.

Theodore Wells, defense lawyer for Cheney's former chief of staff, quickly sought to limit any damage from the testimony of Cheney's former assistant for public affairs.

Wells got Martin to acknowledge that she herself could not recall for sure whether she relayed the information about CIA operative Valerie Plame, wife of Iraq war critic Joseph Wilson, to Cheney and Libby on June 11, 2003, or as late as July 6, 2003.

The date is important because Libby told investigators he first heard of Plame's job from NBC reporter Tim Russert on July 10. Libby claims that because he was preoccupied with pressing national security issues, he simply forgot he had earlier learned about her work at CIA from government officials.

Besides Martin, one State Department and two CIA officials testified earlier to conversations with Libby about Plame before July 10, 2003. The defense tried to show each had imperfect memories

On Thursday morning, a legal argument between Wells and prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald outside the jury's presence increased the likelihood that Libby will testify. Fitzgerald argued that Wells was trying to get the memory defense into evidence "with no guarantee of Mr. Libby testifying" and being subject to cross-examination about his memory.

But U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton warned, "I will not permit the defense to argue the memory defense at closing if Mr. Libby does not testify."

Martin provided an inside look at how intensely Cheney, Libby and other administration officials worked on responding to the firestorm of criticism that developed months after the war began in March 2003 when Wilson called into question President Bush's justifications.

Wilson claimed that questions from Cheney were the reason he was sent by the CIA to Niger in 2002 to investigate reports Iraq tried to buy uranium for nuclear weapons. But Wilson said he debunked the story long before Bush used it in his State of the Union address in January 2003 to help justify the war. Also, the ex-ambassador said he assumed Cheney was aware of his conclusions.

Fitzgerald got Martin to testify that Cheney personally wrote out statements and talking points for Libby and other aides to give to reporters to deny he was behind Wilson's trip or ever learned Wilson's conclusions.

Martin testified Cheney also wanted to tell reporters that U.S. intelligence agencies concluded in a formal National Intelligence Estimate in October 2002 that Iraq did seek uranium.

Plame actually conceived the idea for the trip in response to interest from Cheney and the State and Defense Departments, a CIA witness has testified.

Fitzgerald says Libby discussed Plame's job and role with reporters as part of the White House effort to discredit Wilson.

But under Wells' cross-examination, Martin testified she had no knowledge that Libby ever discussed Plame's job with any reporter. She also said Cheney ordered her to get all the facts out, but she did not think Plame's role was part of the story she had to tell.

"It didn't seem appropriate or helpful for us to get that out," Martin testified. "It gave me some explanation" of the affair, but "we didn't need it as a talking point."

Martin testified that sometime after Wilson's claims first emerged, attributed to an unnamed ex-ambassador, in a New York Times column on May 6, 2003, she called CIA spokesman Bill Harlow to sort out the genesis of the mission.

She said Harlow told her Wilson's wife worked for the CIA. She said she immediately went to the vice president's office and told Cheney and Libby about it. She did not recall their response.

Martin testified that the Harlow conversation occurred no later than July 6 because she was not surprised to see Wilson discussing the affair on NBC's "Meet the Press" on that date. But Wells got her to acknowledge "it makes sense to me" she might have talked about Plame with Harlow on June 11, when government telephone records show they talked.

Cheney Scripted Libby Response, Ex-aide Says (USAT)

By Richard Willing

WASHINGTON — Vice President Cheney personally directed his office's media response to a critic who accused the Bush administration of ignoring evidence that Iraq had not sought uranium in Africa, a former Cheney aide said in federal court Thursday.

In July 2003, Cheney scripted quotes for chief of staff Lewis "Scooter" Libby to read to a reporter asking about a former State Department official's claim that the administration had ignored a report debunking the Africa story, former Cheney press aide Cathie Martin said.

Days earlier, Martin said, the vice president had dictated eight "talking points" for staffers to use to counter stories suggesting Cheney had dispatched former State Department official Joseph Wilson to Africa in 2002 to explore a report that Iraq had bought uranium. In a newspaper column and television appearance on July 6, 2003, Wilson said Cheney had ignored Wilson's conclusion that the report was false.

"It was decided that Scooter would call (reporters) to try to get into the story and correct the false information," Martin said. "That was (Cheney's) decision."

Martin, a press and policy aide for the president, was the fourth witness to say Libby knew Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, was a CIA employee before a conversation between Libby and NBC reporter Tim Russert. Libby told investigators he first learned Plame's identity from Russert.

Libby is charged with perjury and obstruction of justice for allegedly lying to investigators about his knowledge of the leaking of Plame's covert CIA status to the media. Such a disclosure, if made knowingly, can be a crime.

Martin said that in 2003, she and then-CIA spokesman Bill Harlow worked on a media strategy to deflect other critics of the administration's justification for the war in Iraq. Martin said that Harlow told her Wilson's "wife works over here" and that she then told Libby and Cheney.

Martin was the first member of the Cheney inner circle to testify about Libby's knowledge of Plame's identity. Her testimony could help prosecutors prove their contention that Libby made up the Russert story to cover for Cheney. Libby's attorneys have said he merely had a lapse of memory when he told investigators how he first learned of Plame's CIA work.

As he did with earlier prosecution witnesses, defense attorney Theodore Wells tried to show that there were problems with Martin's recollection of the events in 2003. Martin first said that she probably learned of Plame's identity in a phone conversation with Harlow during the second week of July 2003.

Using a notation from a CIA official's desk pad, Wells showed that the call probably occurred June 11.

"You forgot an entire month during which you knew it," Wells said during cross-examination.

Ex-Aide Says Cheney Led Rebuttal Effort (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

Vice President Cheney personally orchestrated his office's 2003 efforts to rebut allegations that the administration used flawed intelligence to justify the war in Iraq and discredit a critic who Cheney believed was making him look foolish, according to testimony and evidence yesterday in the criminal trial of his former chief of staff.

Cheney dictated talking points for a White House briefing in the midst of the controversy that summer, his former press aide, Cathie Martin, testified, stressing that the CIA never told Cheney that a CIA-sponsored mission had found no real evidence that Iraq was trying to buy nuclear materials in Africa.

Aboard Air Force Two, on a trip back from the launch of a warship in Norfolk, Cheney instructed his chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, about responding to a Time magazine reporter who questioned how the faulty intelligence on Iraq had become one of the Bush administration's central arguments for going to war.

In the dramatic replay of events that summer that unfolded yesterday in Libby's federal court trial, Cheney was portrayed as a general on a political battlefield -- enmeshed in tactics, but also deputizing his chief of staff to handle the dirty job of persuading journalists that the war critic was all wrong.

Previously described in court filings and by the news media, Cheney's role was brought to life yesterday by Martin's account. She is the first witness in the case who worked closely with Cheney and Libby as they tried to refute former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, who was sent to Niger by the CIA to determine whether Iraq had sought uranium for a weapons program.

Her testimony was buttressed by previously unreleased documents provided as evidence yesterday, including handwritten notes and margin scribblings Cheney's staffers hastily jotted at their boss's instruction.

Lea Anne McBride, Cheney's current spokeswoman, said yesterday that the vice president's office could not comment on the case or the evidence introduced in the trial.

Libby, 56, is charged with lying to investigators and a grand jury about how the identity of Wilson's wife, CIA officer Valerie Plame, was leaked to reporters days after Wilson went public with his allegations that the administration had twisted his findings to justify the war in Iraq. Libby has pleaded not guilty, contending that he misspoke and that he forgot about conversations he had with journalists amid the crush of his duties. He is not charged with the leak itself.

Martin recalled giving Cheney and Libby information from CIA spokesman William Harlow that Wilson was the person sent to Niger "and his wife works for the CIA." Martin is the fourth witness from the administration to bolster the prosecution's claim that Libby had to be lying when he said he learned about Wilson's wife weeks later from NBC's Tim Russert.

Also yesterday, Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald told the judge he was concerned that Libby's defense team was trying to improperly introduce elements of its "bad memory" defense without putting Libby on the stand, questioning each witness about details that no reasonable person could remember.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton warned the defense that Libby would have to take the stand if he wanted to try to convince the jury that his own memory was flawed.

Martin's testimony also illustrated how doggedly Cheney insisted that the administration had significant evidence that Iraq was trying to acquire weapons of mass destruction -- even after the White House had backed off that claim and admitted it was not solid enough for the president to have cited it in his 2003 State of the Union address.

Cheney told Martin to alert the news media that a highly classified and recent National Intelligence Estimate indicated no doubts about Iraq's efforts to buy uranium. Intelligence analysts have said that the uranium claim was never a key finding of the NIE and that there were doubts about it.

On college-rule paper, in blue ink, Martin scribbled what Cheney told her reporters needed to know about the Niger controversy as they conferred in his Capitol Hill office on July 7, 2003. "As late as last October, the considered judgment of the intel community was that SH [Saddam Hussein] had indeed undertaken a vigorous effort to acquire uranium from Africa, according to NIE [the National Intelligence Estimate]," she wrote.

Martin, who now works on communication issues for President Bush, said Libby also directed her to ask the CIA which journalists were calling with questions about Wilson's Africa trip, then personally telephoned at least one in an attempt to influence the broadcast.

Martin said that Cheney also determined the reply to questions she had received from Time reporter Matt Cooper about the role the vice president's office had played in the Niger trip. While flying back from Norfolk on the vice president's plane, she mentioned to Libby the e-mailed questions from Cooper.

Libby later came to her seat in the back of the plane, holding a handwritten card with notes he said were Cheney's instructions about what to say to Cooper. Libby told her, Martin testified, that Cheney, in a rare move, authorized him to provide a specific quote on the record, with Libby's name attached.

Martin portrayed both Libby and Cheney as concerned that reporters were not telephoning their office directly to get their side of the story about Wilson and his criticism of the administration. She said they directed her and her staff to begin monitoring television reports on the Niger trip and provide daily transcripts along with their usual canvas of printed stories about the vice president's office.

Attorneys for Libby repeatedly pressed Martin to acknowledge that, though she saw Cheney and Libby working overtime to rebut Wilson's criticisms, she had no evidence that either of them tried to leak Plame's name to reporters.

"At no time did Vice President Cheney indicate to you that he considered Valerie Wilson part of the story he wanted to get out," attorney Theodore V. Wells Jr. said to Martin.

"I did not have a conversation with the vice president about that," Martin responded.

Vice President's Spokeswoman Questions White House Aide's Account In CIA Leak Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 26, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Vice President Dick Cheney's spokeswoman testified Thursday that she told Cheney and his chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, that a prominent war critic's wife worked for the CIA days before Libby said he learned it from a reporter.

Cathie Martin's testimony during the third day of Libby's perjury trial described Cheney's personal eagerness to refute war criticism by former Ambassador Joseph Wilson in 2003.

Wilson had gone on a CIA fact-finding mission to Africa, and on the basis of his findings he questioned intelligence President George W. Bush later relied on to go to war. Wilson has contended Cheney's office had asked the agency to undertake the mission.

Witnesses have testified this week, however, that Wilson's wife, CIA operative Valerie Plame, actually conceived the idea for the trip. Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald is trying to show that Cheney's office wanted to make her involvement clear to reporters.

Fitzgerald says Libby learned that fact on several occasions and discussed it with reporters as part of the White House effort to discredit Wilson. When FBI agents began investigating the leak of Plame's identity, Libby lied and said he learned about Plame only from reporters, Fitzgerald said. Libby is on trial on perjury and obstruction charges.

Neither he nor anybody else was charged in connection with the leak.

Since the trial started Tuesday, it has become clear that the jury will have to sort through conflicting statements in a high-profile case that has opened a very public window on the behind-the-scenes Washington practice of leaking sensitive information to the news media.

Martin is the fourth person to describe conversations with Libby about Plame and demonstrated the best recollection of the group. She is also the closest witness to Cheney's inner circle. Defense attorneys, who were to question her later Thursday, have used cross-examination of other witnesses to highlight memory flaws.

Martin said that Wilson's criticism was a direct attack on the president's credibility. Wilson says he debunked claims that Iraq was trying to buy uranium from Niger long before that statement ended up in the 2003 State of the Union speech.

Cheney and Libby were eager to refute that, Martin said. She described calling a CIA spokesman to figure out the genesis of the mission.

"We didn't send him," Martin recalled saying. "If we didn't send him, you must've sent him. Who sent him?"

That's when Martin said the CIA spokesman told her that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA. She said she immediately told Cheney and Libby about it. She couldn't pinpoint the date off the conversation but said it definitely took place by July 6. Libby says he learned Plame's identity days later.

Cheney took a personal interest in the issue, Martin said, and in the following days dictated media "talking points" making it clear that his office was not responsible for the Wilson trip.

The talking points do not refer to Plame, and nobody has been charged with leaking her identity.

Libby says he did not lie about how he learned about Plame, but rather honestly forgot.

In Ex-Aide's Testimony, A Spin Through VP's PR (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

Memo to Tim Russert: Dick Cheney thinks he controls you.

This delicious morsel about the "Meet the Press" host and the vice president was part of the extensive dish Cathie Martin served up yesterday when the former Cheney communications director took the stand in the perjury trial of former Cheney chief of staff I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

Flashed on the courtroom computer screens were her notes from 2004 about how Cheney could respond to allegations that the Bush administration had played fast and loose with evidence of Iraq's nuclear ambitions. Option 1: "MTP-VP," she wrote, then listed the pros and cons of a vice presidential appearance on the Sunday show. Under "pro," she wrote: "control message."

"I suggested we put the vice president on 'Meet the Press,' which was a tactic we often used," Martin testified. "It's our best format."

It is unclear whether the first week of the trial will help or hurt Libby or the administration. But the trial has already pulled back the curtain on the White House's PR techniques and confirmed some of the darkest suspicions of the reporters upon whom they are used. Relatively junior White House aides run roughshod over members of the president's Cabinet. Bush aides charged with speaking to the public and the media are kept out of the loop on some of the most important issues. And bad news is dumped before the weekend for the sole purpose of burying it.

With a candor that is frowned upon at the White House, Martin explained the use of late-Friday statements. "Fewer people pay attention to it late on Friday," she said. "Fewer people pay attention when it's reported on Saturday."

Martin, perhaps unaware of the suspicion such machinations caused in the press corps, lamented that her statements at the time were not regarded as credible. She testified that, as the controversy swelled in 2004, reporters ignored her denials and continued to report that it was Cheney's office that sent former ambassador Joseph Wilson to Niger to investigate allegations of Iraq's nuclear acquisitions. "They're not taking my word for it," Martin recalled telling a colleague.

Martin, who now works on the president's communications staff, said she was frustrated that reporters wouldn't call for comment about the controversy. She said she had to ask the CIA spokesman, Bill Harlow, which reporters were working on the story. "Often, reporters would stop calling us," she testified.

This prompted quiet chuckles among the two dozen reporters sitting in court to cover the trial. Whispered one: "When was the last time you called the vice president's office and got anything other than a 'no comment'?"

At length, Martin explained how she, Libby and deputy national security adviser Steve Hadley worked late into the night writing a statement to be issued by George Tenet in 2004 in which the CIA boss would take blame for the bogus claim in Bush's State of the Union address that Iraq was seeking nuclear material in Africa.

After "delicate" talks, Tenet agreed to say the CIA "approved" the claim and "I am responsible" -- but even that disappointed Martin, who had wanted Tenet to say that "we did not express any doubt about Niger."

Martin shed light on the mystery of why White House press secretary Scott McClellan promised, falsely, that Libby was not involved in outing CIA operative Valerie Plame, Wilson's wife. After McClellan had vouched for Bush strategist Karl Rove's innocence, Libby asked Martin, "Why don't they say something about me?"

"You need to talk to Scott," Martin advised.

On jurors' monitors were images of Martin's talking points, some labeled "on the record" and others "deep background." She walked the jurors through how the White House coddles friendly writers and freezes out others. To deal with the Wilson controversy, she hastily arranged a Cheney lunch with conservative commentators. And when New York Times columnist Nicholas Kristof first wrote about the Niger affair, she explained, "we didn't see any urgency to get to Kristof" because "he frankly attacked the administration fairly regularly."

Questioned by prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald, Martin described how Hadley tried to shield White House spokesmen from the Niger controversy. "Everybody was sort of in the dark," she explained. "There had been a decision not to have the communicators involved."

But Martin, encouraged by Libby, secretly advised Libby and Cheney on how to respond. She put "Meet the Press" at the top of her list of "Options" but noted that it might appear "too defensive." Next, she proposed "leak to Sanger-Pincus-newsmags. Sit down and give to him." This meant that the "no-leak" White House would give the story to the New York Times' David Sanger, The Washington Post's Walter Pincus, or Time or Newsweek. Option 3: "Press conference -- Condi/Rumsfeld." Option 4: "Op-ed."

Martin was embarrassed about the "leak" option; the case, after all, is about a leak. "It's a term of art," she said. "If you give it to one reporter, they're likelier to write the story."

For all the elaborate press management, things didn't always go according to plan. Martin described how Time wound up with an exclusive one weekend because she didn't have a phone number for anybody at Newsweek.

"You didn't have a lot of hands-on experience dealing with the press?" defense attorney Theodore Wells asked.

"Correct," Martin replied. After further questions, she added: "Few of us in the White House had had hands-on experience with any crisis like this."

Time Comes To A Standstill In A Courtroom Journey (NYT)

By Scott Shane

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — The most politically charged criminal trial in the capital in nearly two decades crackles to life each morning in a bland sixth-floor courtroom with a stopped clock.

The clock reads 9:25 when I. Lewis Libby Jr. strolls in with a tight smile and a high-priced bodyguard of lawyers and starts perusing documents, scribbling notes and tapping occasionally on a laptop. It is as if Mr. Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is just the counsel, not the accused.

It reads 9:25 as witnesses from government's inner sanctums dredge from memory the declassified details of how, exactly, the country was thrust into war.

A Central Intelligence Agency briefer, Craig Schmall, describes how he rose in the middle of the night to prepare a fresh list of terrorism threats and global troubles for Mr. Libby's breakfast. A Cheney press aide, Cathie Martin, recounts how she leaked news "exclusives" and arranged luncheons for conservative columnists to counter bad news.

And the clock still reads 9:25 when the fatherly judge, Reggie B. Walton, sends the jury home for the day with the usual reminders about avoiding news coverage of the case, a rule that may prove a particular challenge.

The frozen clock is an apt note in a trial that is a trip back in time, to the days in mid-2003 when the Bush administration first struggled with alarming news on Iraq: insurgent attacks were increasing, the fearsome weapons used to justify the war were nowhere to be found and a drumbeat was growing that the White House had twisted the intelligence.

The trial promises to expose the collision of Washington's power centers: the presidency, the vice presidency, the spy agencies and the news media. The first three days have been the warm-up act; the anticipated high points of the trial — the testimony of Mr. Cheney, Mr. Libby and several news media stars — will come in the weeks ahead.

Each witness so far has shed light on another kind of government tradecraft. Mr. Schmall of the C.I.A. told of returning from briefing Mr. Libby or Mr. Cheney with their many "taskers" — questions they wanted answered right away — and their gripes. Once Mr. Libby complained that C.I.A. officers were leaking to reporters about alleged pressure on the agency from the vice president's office.

Marc Grossman, a former under secretary of state, told of the burden of high-level White House meetings, for which he crammed like a graduate student over fat books of data. "I studied them like mad," he said, "and tried my best to hold onto the information for the time of the meeting."

Ms. Martin of the Cheney press office explained the nuances of "deep background" comments to reporters and explained her 2003 notes on tactics to counter a tide of bad publicity on Iraq intelligence. Putting Mr. Cheney on "Meet the Press" was one option, she wrote, but that would raise the critics' profile. Another was to write, or feed to a friendly columnist, an op-ed article.

And then there was the leak option, she explained. Her notes show she considered David E. Sanger of The New York Times, Walter Pincus of The Washington Post or a "newsmag" like Time or Newsweek.

But if you want to get your views out, asked Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the lead prosecutor, why not give the story to all the press? Ms. Martin explained, as if to a dense pupil, the irresistible lure of the "exclusive."

"If you give it to one reporter, they're more likely to write the story," Ms. Martin said. What's more, she said, "you can be a 'senior administration official,' " hiding behind the anonymous cover that Washington officials so often crave.

Sitting in the courtroom among his lawyers is Mr. Libby, 56, a veteran corporate lawyer known as Scooter, smiling at a passed note or a witness's quip and rarely showing any distress, even when the testimony seems to put him in jeopardy. His thinning hair has passed almost entirely from blond to gray. This once-powerful man turns out to be slight and short, no taller than his wife, Harriet Grant — one more note-taking lawyer herself. She occasionally leans across a rail to whisper to her husband.

On Thursday, Ms. Grant, in a black suit with a pink patterned scarf, sat beside Barbara Comstock, a former Justice Department spokeswoman who is the media consultant for the defense. It is an undemanding position, given the judge's orders to both sides not to discuss the case.

At the table on the left, in front of the 12 jurors and 4 alternates, is the prosecution, led by the rumpled Mr. Fitzgerald, who has a prominent bald spot and a knack for projecting righteous indignation even in the most routine exchanges of legal Ping-Pong.

His team of a half-dozen lawyers is imposing, but on Thursday Mr. Fitzgerald grumbled about the forces arrayed against him.

“There are 3 law firms and 11 lawyers on the other side,” he told the judge. “Paper comes flying at us.”

Lengthy legal wrangles — like one Thursday over whether copies of certain documents provided to the defense were legible — can make it seem as if time has stopped for real. But there are also arresting flashes of candor, as when Robert L. Grenier, a C.I.A. veteran, testified about his growing conviction that the White House was shifting responsibility for the war to the agency, a development he found deeply unfair.

“Yes, there was an attempt on the part of the White House to throw blame on the C.I.A.,” said Mr. Grenier, who at the time was the agency’s top Iraq officer and later headed the Counterterrorist Center.

And there are comic moments. In the midst of a discussion over flawed intelligence, Mr. Grenier misplaced his reading glasses on the witness stand. “I appear to have lost my glasses,” he said.

Proceedings were halted. Prosecution and defense united, for once, in a bent-over hunt around desks until the glasses were recovered and the trial could resume.

(AP) - BUFFALO, New York-An anti-abortion extremist was convicted Thursday of violating the U.S. Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act by shooting and killing an abortion provider.

James Kopp, who is already serving a 25-year-to-life sentence on a state murder conviction in Dr. Barnett Slepian's death, was found guilty of targeting and killing Slepian because he provided reproductive health services.

U.S. law bars people from blocking access to reproductive health services by force or threat of force.

After the 1998 shooting, Kopp fled to Mexico, Ireland and finally France, where he was captured in March 2001 as one of the FBI's Ten Most Wanted fugitives.

A federal jury deliberated about four hours over two days before returning the verdict Thursday.

The jury also convicted him on a weapons count.

Kopp could face life in prison without parole when he is sentenced.

Kopp, who represented himself in the trial, stood with a half-smile as the verdict was read.

Kopp had tried to convince jurors he did not mean to kill Slepian when he fired from woods into the doctor's home. Kopp said he intended only to wound Slepian to prevent him from performing abortions the next day.

"If it happened the way I wanted it to, he would have his arm in a sling," said Kopp, 52, who also is suspected in the non-fatal shootings of three Canadian doctors and one in Rochester, New York.

A federal prosecutor said Kopp's long and careful planning of the shooting and his choice of weapon - a Russian military assault rifle - proved his deadly intent.

Slepian's wife, Lynne Slepian, smiled and hugged prosecutors after the verdict Thursday. She then left to call her sons, declining to talk to reporters.

Federal prosecutors will seek a prison term of life without parole, U.S. Attorney Terrance Flynn said. Sentencing is set for June 19.

"Hopefully, this will give (Lynne Slepian) what she's always wanted, that she will never have to go to any state parole hearings," Flynn said.

Most jurors left the courthouse without commenting Thursday. "He was guilty, and the evidence proved it," a female juror said on her way out.

"We just went by the law," a male juror added.

Former NBC Treasurer Charged With Theft (FINDLAW/AP)

(AP) - NEW YORK-The former treasurer of NBC Universal was arrested Thursday on charges that he stole more than $800,000 from the company.

Jung, who was responsible for the company's collection efforts and for oversight of the company's bank accounts, stole the money by setting up an unauthorized company, NBCU Media Productions LLC, and transferring money into its accounts, according to the indictment against him.

Jung, who was charged with two counts of wire fraud, accused of using some of the stolen money on private flights to Miami, Antigua and the Turks and Caicos Islands, U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said in a news release. During the flights, Jung and his travel companions enjoyed delicacies including shrimp cocktail, Veuve Cliquot champagne and Mondavi wine, the prosecutor said.

If convicted, Jung could face a maximum of 20 years in prison and a maximum fine of $250,000 or twice the gain resulting from the crime.

Jung was to make an initial court appearance Thursday, though it was not immediately clear who would represent him.

Former NBC Treasurer Faces Charges For Embezzling Funds (WSJ)

By Chad Bray

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

NEW YORK -- The former treasurer of General Electric Co.'s NBC Universal Inc. has been charged with stealing more than $800,000 from the company and using the money to fund private jet flights and rent a summer home in the Hamptons on Long Island, prosecutors said Thursday.

In a press release, the U.S. Attorney's office in Manhattan said Victor Jung, NBC Universal's former treasurer, has been charged with two counts of wire fraud. Mr. Jung, 34 years old, faces up to 20 years in prison on each charge of wire fraud. He was arrested by federal authorities about 6 a.m. EST Thursday, prosecutors said.

"He plans to vigorously defend himself against the charges and he looks forward to the opportunity to have a complete hearing on the charges," said Christopher Brennan, Mr. Jung's lawyer.

Mr. Jung, who worked for NBC Universal for about 12 years, entered a not guilty plea to the charges through his lawyer at a hearing before U.S. Magistrate Judge Gabriel W. Gorenstein on Thursday. Bail was set at $250,000 to be secured by $5,000 in cash.

Mr. Brennan said Mr. Jung left the company in the past six months, but declined to comment on the circumstances of Mr. Jung's departure from NBC Universal. Mr. Jung didn't speak to reporters after the hearing.

Prosecutors have alleged that Mr. Jung, who worked at NBC Universal's 30 Rockefeller Plaza offices in Manhattan, engaged in a scheme to steal more than $800,000 from his employer and use it for his personal benefit from about November 2005 to May 2006.

The government claims Mr. Jung, of New York, formed a limited liability company in Delaware called NBCU Media Productions LLC and wired transferred funds from a GE account to two different bank accounts held by the limited liability company he controlled -- about $575,000 in January 2006 and $238,450 in April 2006.

NBC Universal or its parent, GE, didn't authorize the formation of the company and had no affiliation with it, according to court documents.

Prosecutors said about $387,189 of the allegedly stolen funds were used to pay for private jet flights to a variety of locales, including Miami, Antigua, and the Turks and Caico Islands. Prosecutors said that the flights were catered and that Jung and his fellow passengers consumed shrimp cocktails, Veuve Clicquot champagne, Grey Goose vodka and Mondavi wine.

The government said Mr. Jung also used about $56,000 of the allegedly stolen funds to rent a summer home in Southampton, N.Y., and $87,416 to pay off charges to his American Express card.

"NBC Universal is committed to and vigilant about the enforcement of its compliance policies," the company said in a statement. "When we discovered the potential integrity breach, we promptly brought it to the appropriate authorities and are cooperating fully with the investigation. We will continue to monitor the situation to its resolution."

Judge Urges U.S. To Drop Plan To Seek Death Penalty In Case (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

A federal judge, at the close of the death penalty trial of a convicted drug trafficker with ties to the rap music industry, called the government's effort to seek his execution "absurd" and a waste of money and urged prosecutors to ask their Justice Department superiors in Washington to abandon the endeavor.

The jury was not present when the judge, Frederic Block of United States District Court in Brooklyn, made his remarks late Wednesday afternoon during a break in closing arguments at the racketeering and murder-for-hire trial of Kenneth McGriff. Mr. McGriff, who is known as Supreme, is on trial in connection with two killings in Queens in 2001.

"Will you kindly advise Washington that in this judge's opinion, there is no chance in the world there would be a death penalty verdict in this case?" the judge told prosecutors, according to a court transcript, which was obtained yesterday. He said his view was based on the intensity with which the jury listened to the defense summation and all the evidence. "If I'm wrong , I will have egg on my face, but I will not be incorrect."

Under the federal death penalty law, if a jury finds a defendant guilty, a second minitrial is held to determine whether that defendant will face execution or life in prison without parole. The decision to seek the death penalty in cases around the country is made by the attorney general in Washington before the case begins.

The judge said that even if Mr. McGriff, 46, is convicted of the killings, continuing to the penalty phase would be pointless and would waste government resources that could better be spent on probation officers, marshals and other services.

Going forward with the penalty phase, he said, would be "a total misappropriation" of taxpayer funds, "and I advise the government accordingly." He said he was speaking out because he believed he had an obligation to advise the Justice Department in Washington of his assessment of the case.

"And there's just no chance that 12 jurors will vote for the death penalty in this case, and I think it is good for us to save money, if we can do that, judicial resources," he said in remarks that were unusually blunt for a judge to deliver from the bench.

The attorney general can withdraw the notice of intent to seek the death penalty at any time before the jury's vote in the penalty phase, said Kevin McNally, the director of the Federal Death Penalty Resource Counsel Project, which coordinates the defense of federal death penalty cases for federal defenders' offices nationwide.

"I'm not at all surprised that the judge has made this suggestion, and I wouldn't be surprised if it was acted upon," Mr. McNally said in a telephone interview. "I think, from all the information we've received, this is not a case that should have been a federal death penalty trial to begin with."

Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for Roslynn R. Mauskopf, the United States attorney in Brooklyn whose office is prosecuting the case, declined to comment, saying federal rules prohibited the office from doing so during a jury trial.

One of Mr. McGriff's lawyers, David Ruhnke, would not comment on the judge's statements, saying only: "His remarks speak for themselves. We certainly hope the message has been conveyed."

Mr. McGriff's trial is one of three death penalty cases that are currently ongoing or recently concluded in the Brooklyn courthouse. One is the trial of Ronell Wilson, 24, who faces possible execution after having been convicted for the 2003 slayings of two detectives on Staten Island. Mr. Wilson's trial has received daily news coverage, while Mr. McGriff's trial have garnered far less attention.

Prosecutors have charged that Mr. McGriff, a crack kingpin who in the 1980s founded the drug-dealing Supreme Team and served time in federal prison, resumed his drug dealing upon his release and paid $50,000 to have two rivals killed.

At the end of the trial day on Wednesday, the lead prosecutor in the case, Carolyn Pokorny, an assistant United States attorney, expressed concern to the judge that his remarks, if reported in the news media, could influence the jury.

"I know that," he said. "I told them not to read the paper, and the truth of the matter is, is that because of the Wilson trial on the fourth floor, nobody from the press has been here today, and we're flying under the radar screen, for sure."

The judge added: "I have to balance this out. If I feel, as an officer, as a judge, that this is an absurd prosecution based upon what I have heard, I think I have a responsibility to let the authorities know."

Judge Calls Seeking Death Penalty Against Drug Kingpin A Waste Of Time, Money (FINDLAW/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 26, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-A judge at the federal murder conspiracy trial of a crack kingpin with ties to the rap music industry warned prosecutors that pursuing a death sentence would be a waste of time and money.

"There's no chance in the world there would be a death penalty verdict in this case," U.S. District Judge Frederic Block said.

"If I'm wrong, I will have egg on my face," the Brooklyn judge said Wednesday while jurors were on a break amid closing arguments in the guilt phase at the trial of Kenneth "Supreme" McGriff. "But I will not be incorrect."

Block advised prosecutors to contact their superiors in Washington and ask them to reconsider their decision to seek a death sentence. Even if McGriff is convicted in a contract killing conspiracy, going forward with a penalty phase would be pointless, he said.

"There's just no chance that 12 jurors will vote for the death penalty in this case, and I think it is good for us to save money, if we can do that, and judicial resources," he said.

The jury deliberated briefly Thursday afternoon without reaching a verdict. It was to resume Friday morning.

In the 1980s, McGriff founded the Supreme Team, a profitable and ruthless drug crew that became legend on the same Queens streets that later produced rap stars such as Ja Rule and 50 Cent. Authorities allege that after serving time for a drug conviction, McGriff resumed his drug dealing operations and paid $50,000 (â,¬38,526) to have two rivals killed.

His lawyer said that McGriff sought to turn his life around by producing music and movies with the help of Irv "Gotti" Lorenzo, a neighborhood friend who headed the successful Murder Inc. record label. At a trial last year, prosecutors had alleged Lorenzo laundered more than $1 million (â,¬770,000) in McGriff's drug proceeds through the label; Lorenzo was acquitted.

McGriff produced a straight-to-video film, "Crime Partners 2000" that featured Ja Rule, Snoop Dogg and Ice-T. The movie, about two hit men, was released in 2001.

New York Daily News, January 26, 2007

No federal court jury in New York has imposed the death penalty in half a century, and Judge Frederic Block says - openly and in violation of basic standards of judicial impartiality - that he wants to keep the string going for a murdering thug of a druglord.

Block is presiding over the trial of Kenneth (Supreme) McGriff, a notorious Queens crack kingpin charged, in this instance, with ordering hits on two rivals. Jurors have retired to deliberate as to McGriff's guilt. If they convict McGriff, the Brooklyn U.S. attorney's office will then petition panel members to sentence McGriff to death.

There is no weightier decision for any jury, and no legal matter demands more scrupulous adherence to the rules. Yet there was Block, exhorting federal prosecutors to abandon capital punishment proceedings, should they be required. As far as Block is concerned, spending a couple of weeks to take life-or-death testimony as prescribed by the law of the land would be a great big waste of time and money.

Said this Amazing Kreskin of the federal bench: "In this judge's opinion, there's no chance in the world there would be a death penalty verdict...from my observations of the intensity with which the jury is listening to defense summation...and all the evidence that has been presented or not presented - if I'm wrong, I will have egg on my face, but I will not be incorrect."

Block said he believes that McGriff "has been humanized" by the evidence. And several times, he directed prosecutor Carolyn Pokorny to tell the Justice Department in Washington that the death penalty should be taken off the table. When she expressed concern that the jury, which was not present at that moment, might learn Block had reached a judgment and be influenced by it, the judge declared that "nobody from the press has been here today, and we're flying under the radar screen, for sure."

For sure. For sure. Yesterday, after transcripts became available, Block was forced to especially admonish the jury not to read the newspapers. Likely the jurors will follow instruction, but that doesn't make it all right. Actually, Block owes the public a great deal more. Having prejudged the outcome, he really ought to surrender any capital punishment proceedings to a colleague who is not so openly and obviously biased.

By Mike Robinson, The Associated Press

CHICAGO - A federal deputy marshal was indicted Thursday in the leak of highly confidential information about a government witness to a reputed leader of Chicago's organized crime family.

John Thomas Ambrose, 38, was charged in the four-count indictment with theft of Justice Department property, disclosing confidential information and lying to federal agents who questioned him about the leak.

Ambrose already had been accused in a criminal complaint of leaking information about Nicholas Calabrese, the key witness in the government's Operation Family secrets investigation of 18 long-unsolved mob murders.

Because Ambrose already had been charged in the case, the indictment had been expected and little of its contents revealed new information.

But the indictment did accuse Ambrose of lying when he told FBI agents on Sept. 11, 2006 that he did not recall seeing the name of reputed mob boss John "No Nose" DiFronzo in the file that marshals kept on Calabrese.

Michael Marcello told his brother that he had a source within federal law enforcement and that the source was the son of a police officer who was convicted in the Marquette 10 police corruption trial of the 1980s.

Ambrose fit the description. Federal officials said his fingerprints were later found on the Calabrese file.

WASHINGTON -- Retired Rep. Jim Kolbe may use campaign funds to pay for legal expenses related to his role in last year's House page scandal, the Federal Election Commission decided Thursday.

Kolbe, an Arizona Republican who retired at the end of his term last year, racked up the legal bills when the House ethics committee and the U.S. Justice Department examined his role in the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley's salacious communications with former House pages.

FEC board members voted 4-0, with no discussion during their morning meeting, to agree with staff advisers that the legal expenses resulted from Kolbe's "ordinary and necessary" duties as a congressman and thus could be paid with campaign funds. The amount of the legal bills wasn't available.

The ethics panel investigated what Kolbe knew about Foley's interaction with the pages after Kolbe revealed that a former page had once contacted him with concerns about Foley, a Florida Republican who resigned when the scandal broke. Kolbe said he told the proper authorities about the incident.

Federal law enforcement officials also opened a preliminary inquiry into a 1996 Grand Canyon rafting trip that Kolbe took with two former pages.

According to his last campaign finance report, filed in October, Kolbe had $143,586 in his campaign account.

More Willful Indifference (NYT)

Mark Foley fled his seat in the House of Representatives last September when his sexual approaches to teenage pages finally reached the news media after years of a shameful cover-up in the halls of Congress. Now it turns out that the F.B.I. was just as phlegmatic about the scandal as Mr. Foley's Republican colleagues. An inspector general's report excoriates F.B.I. agents for brushing aside "troubling" evidence of the lawmaker's flirtatious message-writing, and then falsely blaming their inaction on the watchdog group that tried to alert the government in the first place.

The report underlines the calculated indifference at the heart of the scandal. In their final hours in power, the Republicans who controlled the ethics committee issued a report that whitewashed the fact that key members of the Republican leadership and their staff members were aware of Mr. Foley's long predatory history. The F.B.I. inspector general's report showed the same indifference among law enforcement officials charged with investigating Mr. Foley's actions. The report describes one F.B.I. supervisor who said he had read Mr. Foley's e-mail notes and thought, "What a freak," but who had then sent the evidence on a fruitless bureaucratic roundabout.

The lug-headed consensus was that there had been no real crime, when — as the inspector general pointed out — agents should have been urgently alerting the page program's supervisors.

When the scandal finally became public, the F.B.I. falsely claimed that a watchdog group — Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics — had been uncooperative and withheld vital information. In truth, it had been entirely forthcoming in passing on full details from a former page who had complained about Mr. Foley's lewd predilections.

The new Congress voted to overhaul protections by mandating that an oversight board of surrogates be enlarged to include a former page and a page's parent. It will have an even balance of House members to end the majority control that helped bury the Foley scandal. The F.B.I. had better take stock, too, and treat Congress with less wariness.

Fmr. State Janitors Get Short Prison Sentences In No-work Scheme (BVND)

By Jan Dennis

The Belleville News Democrat, January 26, 2007

PEORIA, Ill. - Three former Illinois secretary of state's office janitors were handed short prison sentences Thursday for pocketing nearly $200,000 for work they didn't perform, a scheme a federal prosecutor says has left a stain on state government.

David Medvesek, 58, of Springfield, was sentenced to five months in jail and six months of home confinement. Dana Dinora, 53, of Springfield, received six months in jail and four months home confinement. And Steven Boyce, 59, of Chatham, was sentenced to two months in prison and six months home confinement.

The men also were ordered to pay a combined total of more than $148,000 in restitution to the state.

"I don't see any of these defendants as evil men or bad people. I see they made choices that violated the law ... and they have to pay the consequences," said U.S. District Judge Joe B. McDade.

The judge said at Medvesek's sentencing that he could not grant probation because he needed to send a message that corruption in state government would not be tolerated.

"The strongest message I can send is (that) you would do some jail time," McDade said.

Federal prosecutors say the janitors developed a scheme to report late for their nighttime jobs or to leave without taking approved time off, collecting nearly $200,000 in state pay for work they didn't do.

The men developed various methods to cover their absences from 1999 to August 2005, including leaving notes for other workers that said they were working elsewhere, according to prosecutors.

All three faced 15 to 21 months in prison, but received reduced sentences because they cooperated in authorities' case against Cecil Turner, a former high-ranking Secretary of State official convicted in September of helping conceal the six-year scheme.

Turner, 60, of Springfield - former director of the Secretary of State's physical services division - was sentenced Jan. 4 to 30 months in prison on four federal counts of wire fraud and two counts of lying to investigators. He also was ordered to pay more than $49,000 in restitution to the state for money the janitors pocketed.

Assistant U.S. District Attorney Greg Gilmore says the scheme has left a dark cloud over all state employees, the vast majority of whom he said are hardworking and dedicated.

"In a sense, these offenses have put a stain on that, and that's unfortunate," Gilmore said.

Medvesek's attorney, Jay Elmore, agreed the court needed to send a message to stamp out a culture of corruption that he says is "epidemic" in Springfield. But he said McDade could drive home the point without jail time, saying other state workers already have seen Medvesek lose his nearly $40,000 a year job, pension and benefits.

Each of the janitors lost their state pensions and have been ordered to turn over their own retirement contributions - totaling roughly $23,000 each - to help pay restitution.

Assistant U.S. District Attorney Patrick Chesley called Boyce's cooperation "extraordinary," saying he recorded more than 200 conversations with the other janitors that helped crack the case and ultimately link Turner to the scheme.

Turner received no financial kickbacks, but aided in the scheme because Dinora also worked for Springfield's public works department, where he allegedly arranged quick pickups of junk ranging from water heaters to a dog house for Turner and his neighbors, prosecutors said.

Defense attorneys said Turner was unaware of the payroll scam and blamed Dinora, who they contend took advantage of Turner's lack of experience after he was appointed to the $98,000-a-year job by Secretary of State Jesse White in 1999.

Turner and the janitors were fired after an investigation uncovered the scheme in 2005.

The three former janitors each offered brief apologies before they were sentenced.

"There was no excuse," Boyce said. "I know right from wrong."

A spokesman for the secretary of state's office did not return a call for comment Thursday. But White has said the cases send a message that his administration will not tolerate corruption and that workers who cheat will pay the price.

In Philadelphia, Cops And Feds Say, Violent Gangs Are Kid Stuff (PHI)

By Dana Difilippo

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 26, 2007

In other cities, gangs like the Bloods, the Crips and the MS-13 menace their communities with the efficiency of a business organization, with rookie "training," initiation rituals and a leader-soldier structure.

But Philadelphia's typical gang member is a school-skipper just getting his first mustache whose "gang" is his adolescent neighbors and whose crimes spring from turf battles with teenage toughs who live just a few streets over, FBI and city police officials said yesterday at a news conference about their joint gang-busting strategies.

That profile stymies authorities as they try to curb the climbing violent-crime rate in Philadelphia.

"Better than half" of the city's 1,800 shootings and 406 homicides last year were committed by such young neighborhood thugs, said Chief Inspector Joseph Fox, head of the police department's detectives. Last week's shooting outside Sayre High School, in which a 17-year-old student was injured by gunfire in an ongoing feud between teens from 56th Street and others from 60th Street, is a good, recent example, Fox said.

"Philadelphia is just saturated right now with these neighborhood groups whose affiliations are very fluid," Fox said.

Their youth and lack of organization make them "very susceptible to being recruited by more violent and more structured gangs," he added. "We don't want to see this [neighborhood thuggery] mushroom into something more organized."

Besides teenage toughs, the city's crime-fighters say law-breakers in the Latino community have also given them growing headaches.

The FBI is forming a new task force to ferret out and squash violent Latin gangs in Philadelphia, said Ron Hosko, the assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Philadelphia office.

"We know that the bulk of the illegal drugs that end up in Philadelphia comes from Mexico, Central America and South America," Hosko said. "[Latinos] are integral to the drug-trafficking organization, the drugs that get into the hands of people who spread violence in the city."

Three other FBI-led task forces - in which agents partner with city police and other authorities - focus on organized crime, black gangs and violent crime/fugitives, Hosko said.

Federal Prosecutors In Washington State To Review Homer Shootout (AP)

By Dan Joling

AP, January 26, 2007

ANCHORAGE, Alaska - The police shooting of a Kenai Peninsula fugitive last year may have violated Alaska law, and the incident will be reviewed by the U.S. Attorney's office in western Washington.

Jason Carlo Jacob Anderson, 31, of Duluth, Minn., died in the shootout with law enforcement officers in the parking lot of the Homer airport. His 2-year-old son, also named Jason, was critically wounded.

State prosecutors announced Thursday that their office had reviewed the investigation by Alaska State Troopers. Prosecutors shared their findings with the U.S. Attorney General's office in Anchorage and the matter has been assigned to the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Western District of Washington to avoid conflict.

Anderson had been living under an assumed name with his girlfriend and their two young children. He was wanted on a federal arrest warrant for methamphetamine trafficking.

On March 1, Anderson was in a rented car with his two children at the Homer airport. Two federal marshals and four Homer police officers tried to serve a federal arrest warrant on Anderson and a shootout ensued.

Anderson was hit nine times. The 2-year-old was shot in the face and critically wounded.

Dr. Franc Fallico, the state's chief medical examiner, concluded Anderson was mortally wounded by gunfire. He also concluded Anderson shot his son before turning his gun on himself. A 6-month-old girl in the vehicle was not wounded.

Department of Law spokesman Mark Morones said ethics rules prohibit releasing any details of the trooper investigation or the prosecutors' conclusions while the case remains under review.

The Department of Law concluded the Department of Justice was in the best position to take over further review of the shootout, Morones said.

Exec Says Secretary Didn't Have Know-how To Do Coke Theft Alone (MH)

By Johnny C. Clark

ATLANTA - A Coca-Cola executive whose former secretary is charged with conspiring to steal trade secrets from the beverage giant testified Thursday at the woman's trial that he didn't believe she had the know-how to commit the crime on her own.

Under cross-examination by Joya Williams' lawyer, Javier Sanchez Lamelas stated that after Williams was arrested he met with Coca-Cola human resources personnel and told them he believed Williams "didn't have the intellectual capacity" to steal the documents or get them in the hands of a Coca-Cola competitor by herself.

Williams faces up to 10 years in prison if convicted of the single federal conspiracy charge against her. She has pleaded not guilty. Two co-defendants have pleaded guilty to conspiracy, and one has testified that Williams thought of the idea for the scheme.

Williams, Edmund Duhaney and Ibrahim Dimson were indicted in July, accused of stealing new product samples and confidential documents from The Coca-Cola Co. and trying to sell them to Purchase, N.Y.-based PepsiCo Inc.

The alleged plans were foiled after Pepsi warned Atlanta-based Coca-Cola and an undercover FBI investigation was launched.

Williams was fired from her job as an administrative assistant to Sanchez Lamelas, Coca-Cola's global brand director, after the allegations came to light.

Sanchez Lamelas also testified Thursday that Williams was cited on occasion for failing to carry out basic job responsibilities. He told jurors that Williams did not take "feedback" in a positive manner and that the two of them had arguments at times.

U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester, meanwhile, agreed to seal some Coca-Cola documents due to their sensitive nature, preventing the jury from seeing them.

Other government witnesses Thursday included a Coke database administrator, and a company computer forensic manager that investigated Williams' print logs for a month starting June 15, 2006. She and the two other defendants were arrested three weeks later.

Testimony was to resume Friday.

WXIA-TV, January 26, 2007

A Coca-Cola executive testified on Thursday that he didn't think that one of his former employees, Joya Williams, had the intellect to steal Coke trade secrets, and try to sell them to Pepsi by herself.

But now Williams is charged with conspiring to do just that, on trial and facing ten years in prison.

Joya Williams wants the jury to see her as a hard-working, well-meaning, but inept Coca-Cola employee.

Just in over-her-head when she was executive assistant to a Coke vice president in 2005 and 2006 -- not the mastermind of a conspiracy to mine Coca Cola computers at company headquarters, steal Coke trade secrets and then try to sell them to Pepsi for $1.5 million.

On the stand at Williams' conspiracy trial -- Williams' boss, a Coke vice president, Javier Sanchez.

Sanchez was a prosecution witness, but he testified under cross-examination by Williams' attorney, Janice Singer, that he didn't think Williams had the intellect to steal Coke's trade secrets and get them into someone else's hands by herself.

Williams was arrested in July with two ex-cons who later pleaded guilty.

But Williams' boss said that just after the arrests, he was "in shock that Joya could have done something like that."

Question -- Did Williams have any legitimate reason to take the documents home?

Answer -- No.

On Friday, the prosecution expects to show the jury surveillance video and photos of Williams putting into her bag what prosecutors say were Coke trade secrets, and leaving the building with them.

Williams contends the documents she took home from Coke Headquarters were routine work papers for her own files, not Coke secrets.

The prosecution may rest on Monday or Tuesday.

Coke Secrets To Stay Secret, Judge Says (AJC)

By Duane D. Stanford, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 26, 2007

The judge in the Coke secrets trial said Thursday he will seal roughly 750 pages of company documents that the beverage company says contain trade secrets.

The lawyer for defendant Joya Williams has said she may want to use the confidential company documents to prove her case. But prosecutors and Coke lawyers have convinced Judge J. Owen Forrester that allowing the public to see the documents would harm the company.

Man Who Lured Teen Over Internet Gets 5 Years In Jail (SEAPI)

By Brad Wong, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, January 26, 2007

A 46-year-old Coupeville man received a five-year prison sentence Thursday for using the Internet to lure a teenage girl from Illinois to the Seattle area for sex, the U.S. Attorney's Office reported.

During the sentencing in U.S. District Court in Seattle, John Leonard Young received a stern rebuke from Judge Thomas Zilly. "The victim may never be the same," Zilly said. "You've taken her innocence away."

The case unfolded when the 14-year-old girl from the Chicago area attempted to travel to Washington state in January 2005. Young and the girl were planning to meet, prosecutors said.

But she ended up at Dulles International Airport, outside of the nation's capital. Airport police there contacted the FBI.

Young and the girl started using the Internet in late 2004 to communicate with each other, and they met in a chat room. Prosecutors said the two also talked by telephone.

Young described "bold, detailed discussions about sex," according to a prosecutor's statement.

Young also used his credit card to buy an airplane ticket to Seattle for her.But days before that flight, she went to the airport and bought a ticket with her own money.

Officials said she was upset about landing in the wrong Washington.

Young urged the girl to remove her computer's hard drive so her parents and investigators would have a difficult time finding her, prosecutors said.

With court approval, investigators searched Young's home and uncovered computer messages with the girl and child pornography.

At least one of his computers contained about 100 pornographic images of children.

Man, 2 Women Charged In 'Horrific' Case Of Delco Child Porn (PHI)

By Tom Schmidt

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 26, 2007

One suspect, John Worman, 39, of Colwyn, Delaware County, allegedly installed a video camera in his bathroom wall and videotaped four children as they used the toilet, undressed and showered.

Worman, according to an indictment, sexually abused eight other children, including five whom he forced to engage in oral, vaginal and anal sex, from 1997 through 2006.

Three of the children that Worman forced oral and vaginal sex upon were infants, one of them just three months old, authorities said.

He videotaped the assaults and downloaded the images to his computer, they added.

Worman and two women - Dorothy Prawdzik, 43, of Drexel Hill and Concetta Jackson, 44, of Collingdale, both in Delaware County - were charged yesterday in a 53-count indictment with producing child pornography.

The charges were announced by U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan, Delaware County District Attorney G. Michael Green and FBI Special Agent-in-Charge J.P. Weis.

Jackson, authorities said, knew about the camera and helped Worman videotape the four children between 2003 and 2006.

At one point in the investigation, investigators got a search warrant for Worman's home and recovered more than one million images from his computer, including thousands of videos that Worman produced himself committing sexual acts on children.

"This was a long-term, planned and horrific exploitation of young children," Meehan said. "According to the indictment, the defendants allegedly manipulated and abused children, even infants, to satisfy unimaginable perversions, and they did it repeatedly."

Authorities said that during the period covered by the investigation, Worman had relationships with Prawdzik and Jackson, at different times.

The case was brought as part of Project Safe Childhood, which was launched in February 2006 by U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales.

It was described as a nationwide initiative designed to protect children from online exploitation and abuse.

'Preteen' Impostor In Video With Kid (AZREP)

By Tony Lombardo, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, January 26, 2007

The Yavapai County Sheriff's Office would not comment on the contents of the video, but the Associated Press reported it showed 29-year-old Neil Havens Rodreick II engaging in sex with a juvenile.

"I am aware they are trying to identify a child on a video," sheriff's spokesman Scott Reed said.

Rodreick, a registered sex offender from Oklahoma, was arrested last week after trying to enroll at Mingus Springs Charter School in Chino Valley. Between August and November, Rodreick successfully posed as seventh-grader "Casey Price" and attended class at Imagine School at Rosefield in Surprise.

The Dysart Unified School District saw a slight increase in enrollment at its schools this week as word got out about Rodreick's enrollment at Imagine School, Dysart spokesman Tom Herrmann said. Six families pulled their children out of Imagine School but two families have since come back, spokeswoman Rhonda Cagle said.

Surprise police have reported no cases of inappropriate behavior during Rodreick's time there, though the investigation is ongoing. Rodreick has also lived in Payson and posed as a 12-year-old.

Rodreick is in a Prescott jail facing charges that include fraud, forgery and failing to register as a sex offender.

Three men, two of whom reportedly had a sexual relationship with Rodreick, are also facing charges in conjunction with the con.

O'Malley Voices Support Of Bill To End Death Penalty (WP)

By Ovetta Wiggins And John Wagner

Gov. Martin O'Malley (D) said yesterday that he plans to work for the repeal of Maryland's death penalty this legislative session. But he and some lawmakers predict that the measure has tough hurdles to clear before it gets to his desk.

"I've had a pretty consistent position on this," O'Malley told reporters at the State House. "Now that it's salient, I'm certainly not going to try to duck or hide. I would like to see us repeal the death penalty."

O'Malley's comments came in response to an announcement by two lawmakers that they would introduce legislation to abolish the death penalty and replace it with a sanction of life in prison without the possibility of parole. The bills were filed yesterday.

Lisa A. Gladden (D-Baltimore), the lead sponsor in the Senate, said that by her count, the measure was one vote shy of getting out of the judicial proceedings committee.

"I don't think it's totally out of the question that we could pass a repeal bill this year," said Gladden, a public defender, who has introduced similar measures in the past. "I think other legislators don't want blood on their hands."

Gladden was emboldened yesterday by the group of lawmakers, religious leaders and supporters who joined her and Del. Samuel I. Rosenberg (D-Baltimore) at a news conference about the legislation.

The issue has gained prominence in the wake of a court ruling last month that halted executions in Maryland until new regulations on lethal injection are put forward by the Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services. O'Malley said that the process will not start before the conclusion of the legislature's debate on the death penalty bill.

"That debate needs to happen," O'Malley told reporters.

Senate President Thomas Mike V. Miller Jr. (D-Calvert) said he supports the death penalty but thinks there needs to be a "healthy debate" on the subject. He said he would not influence a vote one way or the other.

"I realize the trend is against the death penalty," Miller said, "but I think there are some crimes so atrocious that it's warranted."

House Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel) said he doesn't "have a real strong feeling one way or the other. We'll let the legislative process take place. . . . We've never tried to influence our colleagues on two issues: the death penalty and abortion."

The bill is likely to meet resistance, with some Democrats joining minority Republicans in opposition.

Del. Dereck E. Davis (D-Prince George's) said he could not support a repeal because he had a gun held to his head three years ago.

Anthony J. O'Donnell (R-Calvert), the House minority leader, said he would not support a repeal and said he is certain that many share his position, across party lines. "We need the death penalty for the most heinous cases," he said.

Gladden and Rosenberg said they expected support from O'Malley, who has consistently said he opposes the death penalty. But O'Malley also has said that his views would not prevent him from following the law and signing death warrants.

O'Malley rarely mentioned the death penalty in his primary campaign against then-Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) or in the general election race against Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R).

O'Malley has argued that the death penalty is not a deterrent and that money spent on prosecuting death penalty cases could be better spent fighting violent crime.

Rosenberg said that a sentence of life without the possibility of parole would be an "enormous deterrent" to committing murder.

"The time and effort litigating these cases, that goes into legislating this issue, could be spent on preventative measures that make each and every citizen more safe in their home," Rosenberg said.

The death penalty repeal was not part of the 13-bill legislative agenda that O'Malley issued this week.

"There are good people who have strong feelings on both sides of the issue," he said.

Maryland Considers Repeal Of Death Penalty (WT/AP)

By Brian Witte

The Washington Times, January 26, 2007

ANNAPOLIS -- Maryland lawmakers said yesterday they will introduce legislation to repeal the death penalty, a measure Gov. Martin O'Malley said he would sign if the General Assembly approves it.

State Sen. Lisa A. Gladden and Delegate Samuel I. Rosenberg, Baltimore Democrats, are sponsoring bills that would replace the state's death penalty with a prison sentence of life without parole.

Mr. O'Malley, a Democrat who personally opposes the death penalty, said he "sure would" sign such a bill in favor of life without parole.

"We waste a lot of money pursuing a policy that doesn't work to reduce crime or to save lives, but we could be putting that money into crime reduction," Mr. O'Malley said. "I'm much more in favor of life without parole."

Former Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican, supported capital punishment. He reinstituted the death penalty after taking office in 2003, refusing to uphold a moratorium by former Gov. Parris N. Glendening, a Democrat.

Michael Paranzino, executive director of Throw Away the Key, which supports capital punishment, said a debate on the death penalty is needed.

"It's better to debate this in the open," he said. "We will be educating the lawmakers about the victims of murder. While I think that it's a difficult task, I don't think it's impossible."

Mrs. Gladden and Mr. Rosenberg think support for a repeal has increased, but said more votes are needed to get the measure through both chambers.

Kirk Bloodsworth, a Maryland man who spent two years on death row and was later released from prison because of DNA evidence, said yesterday he was "living proof that the criminal justice system makes serious mistakes."

Mr. Bloodsworth was convicted twice of killing a 9-year-old girl in 1984. He was placed on death row following his first trial. Mr. Bloodsworth was convicted again in a second trial, but received a life sentence instead of capital punishment. He was exonerated by DNA evidence in 1993.

Mrs. Gladden said the Bloodsworth case demonstrated a need for ending capital punishment.

The proposed legislation follows a recent Maryland Court of Appeals decision to stop the use of lethal injection in executions until acceptable procedures are developed with oversight by the Attorney General's Office and the state legislature. The decision came just days after executions were stopped in California and Florida over concerns that lethal injections might constitute cruel and unusual punishment.

No death sentences can be carried out in Maryland until the injection issue is resolved.

Delegate Anne Healey, co-chairman of the joint legislative committee that would hold hearings on the injection protocol, said the governor will decide whether members should take up the review. Mrs. Healey, a Prince George's Democrat, said she hasn't heard from Mr. O'Malley on the issue.

Mrs. Healey, who opposes the death penalty, said she's not sure lawmakers want to wade into such a divisive debate this year.

Senate Minority Leader David R. Brinkley, a Frederick and Carroll counties Republican, thinks the lethal-injection review should be taken up to affirm the use of capital punishment in the state. However, he doesn't think the committee would bother this session, because lawmakers want to focus on budget issues.

"I think it's going to put it on the back burner," he said.

Another issue is a University of Maryland study released in 2003 that found those who murder a white person are twice as likely to get a death sentence than those who murder a black person.

There are six inmates on Maryland's death row.

Official Shot Movers In Self-Defense, Police Say (WP)

By Eric Rich And Ruben Castaneda

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

The movers arrived at Keith Washington's home in Accokeek on Wednesday night for what was to be a simple swap: one Marlo Furniture bedroom set for another.

An argument began between Washington and the two men and escalated quickly, authorities said. It ended when Washington, who is a police officer and a top homeland security official in Prince George's County, drew a 9mm Beretta and opened fire on the unarmed movers, they said.

Police said that they believe the officer, a 16-year veteran, acted in self-defense and that the two wounded men probably will be charged with assault, based on statements from Washington and a family member whom they did not identify. A police spokeswoman, Cpl. Debbi Carlson, said the officer suffered serious injuries -- she declined to describe them -- and required treatment at a hospital.

The movers -- Robert White, 36, of the District and Brandon D. Clark, 22, of Oxon Hill -- remained in critical condition yesterday, and Carlson said police had not heard their accounts.

Clark's live-in girlfriend, Leelee Best, echoing the sentiment of his family members, questioned the police claim that the movers were the aggressors, saying police "need to charge [Washington] for shooting them."

"It's stupid, honestly," Best said of the argument. "All he had to do was just tell them to leave. There are other ways you can handle it than shooting somebody."

Washington, 45, a former driver for County Executive Jack B. Johnson (D), has long been a controversial figure. He was sued in 2000 by a man who claimed to have been arrested and strip-searched for protesting Washington's rough treatment of a motorist; a civil verdict against Washington for that incident was overturned on appeal. Washington also was later temporarily suspended for alleged aggressive behavior during meetings of a homeowners association board on which he served.

Because of that history, Johnson was accused of cronyism and poor judgment when he named Washington in 2004 to be deputy director of homeland security. Johnson brushed off the criticism, saying that he hired Washington in part because he is "mentally tough."

Washington, who was released from the hospital, did not respond to messages seeking comment, and no one answered the door at his home. An attorney who has represented him before did not respond to a phone call seeking comment.

Yesterday afternoon, Best said a Marlo delivery contractor for whom Clark worked knocked on the door of their home at close to midnight Wednesday. "I knew something was wrong," she said, speaking at Prince George's Hospital Center.

Best said the contractor told her that Clark called him from Washington's house Wednesday evening to say that Washington was angry over a bedroom set that was being exchanged.

Michael J. Winkelman, an attorney representing the families of White and Clark, said a Marlo representative and an associate he believes was the contractor visited with the family at the hospital yesterday. The associate told the family that the movers had sought guidance from a supervisor about how to handle the clash with Washington.

"They called from the house and said he was upset, very upset," Winkelman said. He said the movers were told to "give the officer what he wanted."

Marlo officials declined interview requests yesterday. The company issued a brief statement pledging to cooperate with the investigation and adding that its priority is "the welfare of those who have been injured."

In a news release, police said both deliverymen were struck in the upper body. A law enforcement source, speaking on condition of anonymity because the investigation is continuing, said that White was shot in the chest, groin and knee and that Clark was shot in the abdomen. The Washington Post erroneously reported in some editions yesterday that one man had been fatally shot, based on inaccurate information from a government source.

State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey said two investigations of the incident will proceed on separate tracks: One team of police detectives will investigate the use of force by Washington, and a second set of detectives will look into what crimes, if any, occurred during the encounter.

Winkelman said he was not surprised to learn that police expected to charge the unarmed men shot by an officer. "It's the custom of the Prince George's County police to do so," he said.

Clark's girlfriend and father said their anxiety was compounded yesterday by the hospital's refusal to update them on Clark's condition -- or even, for most of the day, to confirm that he was a patient there. Winkelman said hospital officials told the family that "an ongoing police investigation overrides hospital authority."

Attempts to reach members of White's family were unsuccessful. Winkelman said late yesterday that he also could not immediately reach members of the family.

Clark's family described him as a gentle giant, easygoing and slow to anger. He stands 6 feet 4 inches and weighs more than 260 pounds, according to a younger brother, Nathaniel B. Saunders.

"He gets along with everybody," Saunders said. He said Clark graduated from DuVal High School, where he played on the football team.

Washington was a detective when Johnson, then the state's attorney, tapped him to become part of his security detail. He enthusiastically endorsed Johnson's 2002 bid for county executive, contributing to and working for the campaign.

Washington rose fast after Johnson's election. In 2003, Johnson named Washington to his transition team. In August 2004, he appointed Washington deputy director of homeland security.

The appointment came eight months after Washington was placed on administrative leave pending the outcome of an investigation into whether he hit a member of the Simmons Acres Homeowners Association during a meeting. The complaint was later dropped without legal or administrative action.

In 2000, a federal civil jury awarded $260,000 to the plaintiff in the civil rights suit against Washington and county correctional officers. The man, David Paul Maslousky, said he was arrested and strip-searched after he protested Washington's treatment of a man who had been involved in a minor traffic accident. The case was appealed, and Washington prevailed.

James Keary, Johnson's spokesman, said the county executive would not comment on the case. "It's a police matter, and it's under investigation," Keary said.

Panel Urges Leaders To Deal With Prison System 'Tailspin' (LAT)

By Jenifer Warren

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2007

SACRAMENTO — Three decades of tough-on-crime lawmaking has sent California's prison system into a "tailspin" that threatens public safety and could bankrupt the state unless leaders summon the political courage to act, a government watchdog panel declared today.

In a blunt and blistering report, the nonpartisan Little Hoover Commission called the hurricane of problems plaguing the correctional system the largest and most pressing crisis facing the state.

If policymakers are unwilling to make bold changes, the commission said, they should appoint an independent entity – modeled after the federal Base Closure and Realignment Commission – with the power to do it for them.

"For decades, governors and lawmakers fearful of appearing soft on crime have failed to muster the political will to address the looming crisis," the commission said. "And now their time has run out."

The state's 33 prisons are packed to twice their intended capacity, with more than 16,000 inmates bunking in hallways, classrooms and other areas not designed as housing. Prison leaders say they will be out of room for new inmates by summer.

A federal judge, meanwhile, has given the state until June to relieve the crowding or face a possible cap on the inmate population, now standing at about 172,000.

While Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has unveiled an ambitious, $10.9-billion prison building and reform plan, its fate in the Legislature is uncertain and most of the proposed solutions would take years to enact.

Meanwhile, the governor's short-term program to ease crowding – transferring inmates to other states – is sputtering, because few convicts are volunteering to go.

In October, the commission noted, the governor declared a state of emergency in the prisons: "But even that didn't bring action, only more reports to federal judges that underscore the fact that the state's corrections policy is politically bankrupt."

In an interview, Commissioner Dan Hancock said the report's unusually harsh tone was designed to highlight the desperate state of affairs, which extends beyond crowding to medical and mental health care and a criminal sentencing system that the commission called "a haphazard jumble."

Hancock said the crisis has been caused largely by a ceaseless game of one-upmanship by politicians seeking to burnish their reputations as crime-fighters.

"Each has tried to outdo the other on who could be toughest on crime, but nobody was thinking clearly about what the ramifications would be for the state," he said. The result is an incoherent penal code dominated by what experts call "drive-by sentencing laws," often enacted by politicians responding to a single high-profile crime.

The report comes just days after Schwarzenegger and the top Democrat in the Assembly publicly lamented the lack of political will to tackle the prison woes.

In an interview with The Times last week, Schwarzenegger said prisons had not been a priority because they were not a "sexy" topic that affects the lives of voters – and therefore had attracted little interest from lawmakers.

"You talk about prisons, people feel like, 'OK, go out and get the criminal and you send him somewhere, but wherever that is, I don't want to look there, I don't want to know,' " the governor said.

He added that, "When the people are not excited about it, how do you make the legislators excited about it?"

Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez of Los Angeles was more pointed in his comments, blaming legislators for a short-sighted, "lock up everybody" mentality that has wrought painful consequences.

"It's good politically, because you can champion it as you're tough on crime," Nunez said at a press conference Monday. "But in the end, the prisons are overcrowded, we don't do enough rehabilitation, the prisoners get out of jail and go back and commit more crimes, we have the highest recidivism rate of any state in the nation.

"It's a shameful part of the California body politic," Nunez said. "We've got to change that. I think people ought not be afraid."

Whether the rhetoric – or the commission's report -- will have any substantial effect on legislators is unclear. Analysts say the political fear of being tagged as a friend of felons runs deep. And voters rarely fail to embrace ballot initiatives seeking new penalties for offenders, such as the three strikes law of 1994.

"We're always ever so nice to furry animals and very, very mean to criminals," said Shaun Bowler, a professor of political science at UC Riverside. "It's almost reflexive, the voters' desire to be tough. If the prisons are a cross between a sewer and the Roman Colosseum, their answer seems to be, 'Good.' "

But criminologists say that the public has been misled about just what sort of policies make the streets safer. At UC Irvine, Joan Petersilia said it's up to the governor – a Republican – to point out that "what we're doing now with our system is costing us a lot and not giving us much public safety benefit in return."

California, experts noted, spends more than $8 billion a year on corrections, but roughly 70% of the inmates it releases wind up back behind bars.

"Everyone agrees we've got a crisis, but no one is willing to put forth an agenda and lead," Petersilia said. "That's the key ingredient that's been missing."

Hack, Pump And Dump (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The 21-year-old bought 43,000 shares in a small Wisconsin equipment company that makes, among other things, potato harvesters. He sold the shares less than two hours later at nearly double the investment.

But Kamardin's is no success story. Instead, federal authorities say, his methods place him at the front of a wave of techno-criminals who meld computer hacking with identity theft to create nightmares for legitimate investors.

Kamardin and his accomplices allegedly hacked into four online trading accounts of unsuspecting investors, selling off their holdings in higher-valued companies to purchase shares in Thomas Equipment, a firm whose stock that day soared from 26 cents to 80 cents a share, authorities said. The trading volume of Thomas increased tenfold.

Kamardin, allegedly part of an East European ring, repeated this scheme on 13 other occasions in July and August, defrauding investors of $82,960, according to a civil complaint filed yesterday by the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The complaint is one of the first the SEC has brought in response to an emerging trend of the digital era: a modern version of the old pump-and-dump stock scam.

"You wake up in the morning and all your blue chips are gone, and instead you own a microcap stock that is virtually worthless," said John Reed Stark, chief of the SEC's Office of Internet Enforcement. Stark added that he expected more complaints in the coming weeks, saying, "This is an area where we've become increasingly concerned."

The FBI is also investigating the case, which involved at least 27 accounts and 14 companies at brokers E-Trade Securities, Scottrade, TD Ameritrade, J.P. Morgan Chase and Charles Schwab. All the investors have been reimbursed by the brokers, which have been stepping up security and identity authentication measures, SEC officials said.

Kamardin, a U.S. citizen with a liquid net worth of $15,000, according to his E-Trade account application, is believed to have fled to Russia, the SEC said. He has no attorney, authorities said.

On Aug. 21 last year, Kamardin booted up his computer in his apartment in Tampa and logged into his E-Trade account, according to the SEC complaint, which forms the basis for the following account.

At 2:10 p.m. he bought 43,000 shares of Thomas Equipment.

Between 1:29 p.m. and 3:41 p.m., an intruder -- either Kamardin or an accomplice -- hacked into two TD Ameritrade accounts, using those investors' stocks to buy 60,900 Thomas Equipment shares.

At 3:28 p.m., an intruder hit a Charles Schwab account, buying 20,000 shares.

At 3:32 p.m., an E-Trade account was hacked, boosting that investor's portfolio by 68,000 Thomas Equipment shares.

At 3:35 p.m., Kamardin began to sell the Thomas shares.

One minute later, Schwab, evidently onto the fraud, canceled an order to buy 50,000 Thomas shares in a second hacked account.

By 3:53, Kamardin had unloaded all his Thomas shares, netting $13,158.

The SEC is not saying how Kamardin's ring obtained the user names and passwords on the investors' accounts. Typically, authorities said, hackers use keystroke monitoring software placed on a public computer, or they purchase personal data, such as stolen Social Security and credit card numbers, from criminal enterprises.

The fraud affects not only the investors, but the market and companies whose stocks are pumped then dumped.

Hugo Cancio was stunned when trading on his company's stock increased from fewer than 1,000 shares a day to 1.1 million shares last Aug. 24.

"For no reason whatsoever," he said, the share price for Fuego Entertainment, a Miami-based entertainment firm targeting the burgeoning Latino media market, zoomed from 88 cents to $1.28.

"My phone rang off the hook," he said. "We couldn't figure out what was going on."

Allegedly, between 11:51 a.m. and 3:05 p.m. that day, Kamardin had bought and sold 55,000 Fuego shares, raking in $9,164.

In the interim, 10 accounts with Fuego holdings were hacked into at TD Ameritrade, Scottrade, E-Trade and Schwab.

"Wow, wow," Cancio said, upon hearing the allegations. "That's unbelievable."

The following day, Cancio said, his company's share price had plummeted to 13 cents, where it has been ever since. TD Ameritrade, the third-largest online broker by volume, has restricted online trade on the company's stock.

Cancio said that on Aug. 24 he was negotiating a deal to buy 14 television stations, and when he saw the price surge, he began to suspect the stations' owner of insider trading.

The owner denied it, but the deal soured, and with the share price down, Cancio said, the deal is on the rocks. "We were knocking on the door of a multibillion market," he said. "We haven't seen any progress. It's all due to that particular day."

On Aug. 28 and Aug. 29, Kamardin wired proceeds from his E-Trade account to a Wachovia bank account and then transferred the funds to an account owned by his Russian-born roommate. The roommate wired the money to a bank account in Riga, Latvia, the SEC alleges.

E-Trade, which regularly monitors unusual activity, at some point became concerned and alerted the SEC and the FBI of possible fraudulent activities, said sources familiar with the matter.

Florida Man Used E*Trade Account For Illegal Trading (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Bradley Keoun

Bloomberg, January 26, 2007

Jan. 25 (Bloomberg) -- A 21-year-old Florida man hacked into online accounts at E*Trade Financial Corp. and four other brokerage firms in the second case to emerge from a probe of Internet trading fraud, U.S. officials allege.

The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission sued Aleksey Kamardin, claiming he took control of the accounts and netted $83,000 in illegal profits. The regulator said Kamardin bid up 17 stocks and then sold the shares in his own E*Trade account at inflated prices.

The SEC, FBI, U.S. Secret Service and NASD are investigating a wave of online trading fraud that has cost brokerage firms at least $22 million. In December, the SEC said a Russian man made $354,000 in illegal profit by using an Estonian Internet address to hack into accounts at E*Trade, TD Ameritrade Holding Corp. and Scottrade Inc.

``This is typical of what we've seen a lot of lately," John Reed Stark, chief of the SEC's office of Internet enforcement, said in an interview. ``We have other cases like this in our inventory that we expect to be rolling out."

Stark declined to say whether criminal charges would be filed against Kamardin, who he said is believed to have fled the U.S. and gone into hiding in Russia. A contact telephone number provided by the SEC at Kamardin's last known address in Tampa was answered by a woman who said she didn't know him.

Illegal Profit

The illegal trades occurred between July 13 and Aug. 25, according to the suit, which was filed today in U.S. District Court in Tampa, Florida.

Kamardin on Aug. 28 and 29 wired the illegal profit from his online brokerage account at E*Trade to a Wachovia Corp. bank account in the U.S. The money was then transferred to a second account owned by Kamardin's Russian-born roommate, who in turn wired it to a bank account in Riga, Latvia, the SEC said.

A July 2006 application opening an account in Kamardin's name at E*Trade said he was a U.S. citizen with a liquid net worth of $15,000, the SEC said. Stark declined to comment on whether the agency had confirmed Kamardin's citizenship. He said the roommate hasn't been accused of wrongdoing.

Other online brokerage firms whose accounts Kamardin manipulated included Scottrade, JPMorgan Chase & Co. and Charles Schwab Corp., according to the complaint.

`Circumstantial Case'

The SEC named 14 of the 17 stocks it believes were manipulated by Kamardin. They included Gales Industries, a Bay Shore, New York-based manufacturer of aircraft structural parts; Butler National Corp., an Olathe, Kansas-based provider of electronic monitoring of water-pumping stations; and Thomas Equipment Ltd., a Milwaukee-based manufacturer of farm equipment.

Stark said the SEC couldn't link Kamardin directly to the unauthorized use of the accounts. Kamardin probably gained access by stealing usernames and passwords through software that allows outsiders to spy on keystrokes on another person's keyboard, or by buying the logins from Web sites outside the U.S. that traffic in such information, Stark said.

The SEC claimed, for example, that on Aug. 21 between 2:10 p.m. and 2:36 p.m., Kamardin bought 43,000 Thomas shares at about 43 cents each. About the same time, an intruder used unauthorized access to buy 60,900 Thomas shares in two TD Ameritrade accounts, 20,000 shares in a Schwab account and 68,000 shares in an E*Trade account.

The buying -- trading volume was 10 times its daily average -- drove the shares as high as 80 cents, the SEC said.

From 3:35 p.m. to 3:53 p.m., Kamardin sold all 43,000 of his Thomas shares, for a profit of $13,158, the SEC said.

Pump-and-Dump

Federal regulators and law enforcement authorities said in October they were investigating securities schemes on the Internet after New York-based E*Trade reported that it had spent $18 million in the third quarter to reimburse victims of the fraud. In one instance, E*Trade had to take possession of 1 million shares of BoysToys.com, the owner of a San Francisco strip club. Omaha, Nebraska-based TD Ameritrade also had $4 million in expenses related to the schemes.

E*Trade, TD Ameritrade and San Francisco-based Schwab, under policies begun last year, reimburse customers who lose money because of unauthorized trading in their accounts.

Spokesmen for E*Trade, New York-based JPMorgan and St. Louis-based Scottrade declined to comment on the SEC lawsuit. A spokeswoman for TD Ameritrade didn't return a call seeking a comment.

`Unusual Behavior'

``We monitor client transactions using a combination of sophisticated automated and manual surveillance techniques, watching for unusual account behavior," Schwab spokeswoman Sarah Bulgatz said in an e-mailed statement. ``This enables us to intervene preemptively as needed."

Investigators have compared the online fraud with traditional pump-and-dump schemes in which criminals use false statements or advertisements to spur a rally in the prices of stocks they own so they can sell them at inflated prices.

``It's like a boiler room without the boiler room," Stark said of the online fraud. ``Instead of having to convince an investor to buy your stock you just steal that investor's password and username and buy it in his account."

E*Trade shares fell 70 cents, or 2.8 percent, to $23.97 today in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

D.C. Clubs Dreading Proposed Teen Ban (WP)

By Keith L. Alexander And Darragh Johnson

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

District nightclubs, which have become the center of a thriving music scene that attracts fans and performers from across the country, could be devastated by a proposal to bar teenagers from establishments with liquor licenses, according to musicians and club owners who say the business relies significantly on youths.

Saturday's killing of Taleshia Ford, 17, in a Northwest club spurred an often heated, standing-room-only crowd yesterday at a D.C. Council hearing over a multipronged proposal to place new restrictions on nightclubs where alcohol is served.

Nightclub owners said that the District, unlike many cities in the country, has become a popular destination for bands and clubgoers because of its all-ages policies. They allow club owners to admit patrons as young as they choose -- typically a minimum age of 15 to 18 -- even if the establishment serves alcohol that is legal only for those at least 21.

"The artists don't particularly like to play to 21-and-older clubs," said Steve Lambert, talent booker for the Rock and Roll Hotel on H Street Northeast. "A lot of their audiences are college-aged, between 18 and 21, and they depend on those people to buy tickets to the show."

In emotional testimony that lasted almost two hours, about a dozen of Ford's relatives and friends called for better security in clubs that cater to teenagers.

Many at the hearing defended the venues, saying they strictly enforce age limits. "Some clubs, like H2O, 9:30 Club, the Black Cat, Platinum and Envy -- they do it very well," said Ronald Moten, co-founder of Peaceaholics, an organization that works to solve disputes among youth. "They monitor for fake IDs, they have bracelets or stamps they put on people who're underage, and they're very strict on this."

The District's all-ages policies allow nightclubs to attract larger audiences, particularly die-hard teenage music fans. But many teenagers admitted yesterday that part of the growth of area nightclubs is due to the ease with which young people can obtain alcoholic drinks. Several said they either pay club employees an extra $5 or $10 to get a drink or find a club patron who is 21 or older to buy the drink.

Briejon Smith, 14, Ford's cousin, said that at several city clubs, it is "easy" for teenagers to get alcohol. "All you have to do is slip the bartender $10 and you can get a drink. They ask me if I have ID, and I say 'No,' and then they charge me extra. But I can still get in and order a drink if I wanted to," she said.

Some suburban teenagers, who had left school early to testify at the hearing, said they were concerned that the fatal shooting would give officials a reason to expand restrictions on all clubs, even those that already have tight rules.

Maya Gibson-Reinemer, 18, of Arlington said teenagers go to the clubs mainly to listen to the bands. "You can get drunk anywhere. But where can you see music?" she said.

Council member Jim Graham (D-Ward 1) is considering legislation that would establish a minimum age for patrons within the District. In Boston, those younger than 14 are not permitted into nightclubs that serve alcohol. In some other cities, the minimum age is 21. His proposal would also require teenagers, even when accompanied by a legal-aged adult, to leave the establishment after a certain time.

Graham is also considering creating a new license for nightclubs that want to cater to under-21 patrons. It would require them to have minimum-standard security, training and aggressive monitoring during an event for underage drinking. And he wants to restrict the renting of venues to outside promoters. That was the case Saturday morning at Smarta/Broadway, also known as Club 1919, on Ninth Street just off the bustling U Street corridor. Police said that Ford was shot there when the club's bouncer got into a scuffle with a patron carrying a gun. There have been no arrests.

At least one club's advertised rules regarding teen patrons are vague. The Web site for the Black Cat, at 1811 14th St. NW, says: "Black Cat events are all ages. Patrons under 18 should have parental permission, and we prefer them to be accompanied by an adult."

Graham said he did not want to use the fatal shooting as a way to target go-go clubs, popular nightspots mostly frequented by blacks. Instead, he said, he decided to focus on all nightclubs. At the time of the shooting, the Smarta/Broadway was booked as a venue for local go-go bands. Some go-go dances have been marred by violence, but there is a growing movement to change their reputation by promoting peaceful go-gos.

"There needs to be a safe place for these kids to go. There are safe places out there with extra security and where we don't have to be afraid for our kids' safety," Moten said.

Charles A. Burger, chairman of the D.C. Alcoholic Beverage Control Board, said that Smarta/Broadway's liquor license has been suspended since the shooting and that a hearing is scheduled for Monday.

"We're going to get to the bottom of this. This was a troubled establishment doing whatever it needed to do and didn't care one bit about public safety," Graham said.

CIVIL LAW:

Fieger Sues U.S. Attorney General (FREEP)

By NAOMI R. PATTON, FREE PRESS STAFF WRITER

Detroit Free Press, January 26, 2007

Southfield lawyer Geoffrey Fieger filed a complaint against U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Federal Election Commission Chairman Michael Toner alleging they unlawfully investigated Fieger and his law firm.

In the complaint filed Thursday in U.S. District Court Eastern District of Michigan, Fieger alleges that in June 2005 Gonzales illegally directed his office and agents to investigate Fieger and members of his firm, Fieger, Fieger, Kenney and Johnson for violating the campaign finance act.

It is unclear what violations they were investigating, but the complaint contends that, by law, Gonzales' office cannot conduct such an investigation until the Federal Election Commission conducts an investigation, and refers it to the attorney general's office.

The complaint says the FEC never conducted an investigation or referred any violations to the attorney general's office.

Toner is included as a defendant, because the FEC "is tacitly cooperating and conspiring with the Attorney General."

Fieger also contends that investigators required witnesses to identify who they voted for in the 2004 presidential election.

Feiger is seeking a declaration from Gonzales and Stoner that their action was unconstitutional. He also seeks to have all legal fees recouped.

A spokesperson for the Attorney General's Office did not return calls.

Fieger Sues U.S. Attorney General (DEN)

By Paul Egan, The Detroit News

Detroit News, January 26, 2007

Southfield attorney Geoffrey Fieger filed a federal lawsuit today against U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and the Federal Election Commission, alleging a grand jury investigation of Fieger and his law firm is unlawful.

A federal grand jury has been investigating more than $50,000 in political donations from Fieger and his associatesto Democrat John Edwardswhenhe was a candidate for his party's 2004 presidential nomination.

Many of the donations were made on the same day, and prosecutors are investigating whether Fieger unlawfully funneled the donations by having employees make the donations and then reimbursing them.

In his lawsuit, Fieger alleges such a matter can only be referred to the attorney general after an investigation and referral by the election commission. Fieger alleges such a referral never happened. He asks the court for a declaration that the grand jury investigation is unlawful.

Federal officials could not immediately be reached for comment.

Evidence Concludes In Framed Men's Suit (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 26, 2007

As they strolled out of federal court yesterday, Joseph Salvati and Peter Limone said they are happy that a federal judge has now heard all the evidence in a civil trial over whether the government should pay more than $100 million for the wrongful conviction that sent them and two other men to prison for decades for a 1965 murder they didn't commit.

But with a decision in the case not expected until at least mid-March, Salvati, 74, of the North End, said: "Now starts the worst part. Like Yogi Berra said, 'It's not over till it's over.' "

Salvati and Limone, 72, of Malden, attended every day of the 21-day civil trial with their wives, sons, and daughters. The two other men, Henry Tameleo and Louis Greco, died in prison before FBI reports surfaced five years ago indicating that the four had been framed for the slaying in Chelsea of Edward Deegan.

After seeing the reports, a state judge overturned Limone's murder conviction in January 2001, and he walked free after 33 years in prison. She also vacated the conviction of Salvati, who was paroled in 1997 after 30 years in prison. Greco's exoneration came two years ago, when his conviction was posthumously set aside.

Yesterday, hours after evidence concluded in the federal civil trial, state prosecutors filed a motion urging Suffolk Superior Judge Margaret Hinkle to vacate the murder conviction posthumously of Tameleo, who was 84 years old when he died in prison in 1985.

After receiving a petition from Tameleo's family last June and reviewing the other three cases, Suffolk District Attorney Daniel F. Conley "determined that vacating Mr. Tameleo's conviction was the legal, ethical, and moral thing to do," said Jake Wark, a spokesman for Conley's office.

The motion asserts there is "newly discovered evidence indicating that justice may not have been done at Tameleo's trial," Wark said.

In federal court yesterday, US District Judge Nancy Gertner accepted the last of thousands of exhibits and filings just before 11 a.m. in the civil suit for wrongful imprisonment. Lawyers for the four men and the government will file briefs next month, and final arguments in the case will be given Feb. 27. The judge said she will try to reach a decision about two weeks later.

During the trial, lawyers for the four men accused the FBI of making a mockery of justice by failing to tell state prosecutors or defense lawyers about evidence that suggested that notorious hitman Joseph "The Animal" Barboza, who had been recruited by the FBI as a witness against local Mafia leaders in another case, framed Salvati, Limone, Tameleo, and Greco. At the time, Tameleo was the reputed consigliere of the New England Mafia, according to organized crime reports compiled by the FBI.

Deegan was gunned down in a Chelsea alley in March 1965. Local police were unable to solve the slaying until the FBI struck a deal with Barboza, whose testimony resulted in the 1968 convictions of the four men and of two others whose involvement in the slaying has not been disputed.

A Justice Department lawyer asserted during the trial that the FBI cannot be blamed because state prosecutors were responsible for investigating and trying the case. She also argued that the FBI had no obligation to share internal documents with state prosecutors, but also said that agents provided some information about the Deegan slaying to state and local police.

After yesterday's session, Limone, said: "I'm glad it's all over. It was like going to trial again."

Wal-Mart To Pay More Than $33 Million For Overtime Violations (FINDLAW/AP)

By Marcus Kabel, Ap Business Writer

(AP) - BENTONVILLE, Arkansas-Wal-Mart Stores Inc. will pay more than $33 million (â,¬25.5 million) in back wages to thousands of employees after turning itself in to the Labor Department for paying too little in overtime over the past five years, according to an agreement announced Thursday by the U.S. Labor Department.

Wal-Mart said the department's review of its overtime calculations also found it had overpaid about 215,000 hourly workers during the same five-year period. The company said it will not seek to recover any overpayments, which were at least $20 (â,¬15.41) per worker.

Steven Mandel, associate solicitor in the Labor Department's Fair Labor Standards Division, said the case - involving nearly 87,000 employees - resulted from Wal-Mart coming to the department in early 2005 and asking for a review of its overtime calculations.

"They had some concern that some of the practices were not in compliance" with federal wage laws, he told a conference call for reporters

"It's not particularly unusual for an employer to come to us and talk to us about potential payroll violations," Mandel said.

But Mandel said the overtime settlement was one of the largest ever reached by the department's wage and hour division.

Wal-Mart said the settlement includes no fines or penalties and that it has adopted measures to prevent the errors from occurring again.

Last October, Wal-Mart workers in Pennsylvania won a $78.5 million (â,¬60.5 million) judgment for working off the clock and through rest breaks. Wal-Mart denied wrongdoing and is appealing the jury award.

One of Wal-Mart's most vociferous critics, union-backed WakeUpWalMart.com, said the overtime settlement was a sweetheart deal that favored the retailer rather than its workers.

WakeUpWalMart.com spokesman Chris Kofinis said workers were not represented in the settlement talks and added that the idea that Wal-Mart "would negotiate in the best interests of its workers is ludicrous on its face."

Critics had previously denounced a separate Labor Department settlement with Wal-Mart over child labor violations, which was made public last February.

That $135,540 (â,¬104,438) settlement was later found by the Labor Department's inspector general to contain significant concessions for the retailer. The inspector general's report said the settlement was "significantly different" from other such agreements and included far-reaching restrictions on the government's ability to assess monetary penalties.

Regarding the overtime issue, Mandel said the department carried out a national review of all Wal-Mart stores over a two-year period from February 2005 to this year.

The settlement was approved Thursday by a federal judge in the U.S. District Court for western Arkansas, Mandel said.

The highest award to an individual employee was about $39,000 (â,¬30,051), he said.

Wal-Mart Reaches Deal Over Back Pay (WP)

By Amy Joyce And Ylan Q. Mui

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

Wal-Mart must pay nearly $34 million in back wages and interest to employees who were not paid for overtime hours under a settlement announced yesterday by the U.S. Labor Department.

The company said that because of errors in calculation, it underpaid about 87,000 employees nationwide by at least $20 during the past five years. But some are due much more, with one person to receive $39,775.

Wal-Mart approached the Labor Department in 2005 after errors were discovered in an internal audit, according to Steven Mandel, associate solicitor in the department's fair labor standards division. He said employees will receive their pay within 90 days.

"It's not particularly unusual for an employer to come to us to talk about potential payroll violations," said Mandel, who noted that the settlement is one of the largest overtime settlements ever reached. The settlement, filed in U.S. District Court in Arkansas, does not include any fines or penalties.

Wal-Mart rectified several problems in 2005 but was not in complete compliance until Jan. 19, he said.

"The issue has been resolved," said John Simley, a Wal-Mart spokesman. "We are committed to our associates, and we have apologized to them for this error."

About 75 employees are owed more than $10,000, according to Simley. The retailer also said it overpaid about 215,000 current and former workers $20 or more, which amounts to at least $4.3 million. The actual total was not disclosed. Wal-Mart said it would not seek to recover the overpayments.

Wal-Mart found the errors in 2004 during a routine internal review, Simley said. Problems stemmed from "calculation errors and procedural errors" at headquarters, he said, but he declined to say how they occurred. Wal-Mart reviewed data going back to Feb. 1, 2002, the first year for which it has "consistently reliable records," Simley said.

Wal-Mart said it found that some non-exempt salaried employees were expected to work 45 to 48 hours before they earned overtime pay. They did not receive the extra half-time they were owed for hours between 40 and 45 or 48. Other errors also occurred, Wal-Mart said.

The company will still face legal challenges from at least one state.

The California labor commissioner filed suit against Wal-Mart yesterday in Superior Court in Sacramento, alleging miscalculations of overtime pay. The retailer notified the state in December 2005 of payroll errors that resulted in underpayment of about 50,000 workers in the state. About 90 percent are owed less than $20, according to the state Department of Industrial Relations. It estimates that a settlement would exceed $2 million.

"While Wal-Mart has indicated its desire to pay all additional wages owed under California law, we will not agree to any settlement terms until state auditors have the opportunity to verify the accounting records relied upon by [U.S. Labor Department] officials and to examine additional records that relate to those issues that are subject to more stringent California statutes," said Robert Jones, acting state labor commissioner.

State and federal wage-and-hours laws require employers to pay time and a half to workers who put in more than 40 hours a week. Salaried managers and independent contractors are exempt unless their salaries fall below a certain threshold.

Wal-Mart has been involved in other overtime suits. In October, a Pennsylvania jury decided that Wal-Mart forced hourly employees to work through breaks and beyond their shifts without overtime pay. The plaintiffs were awarded $78.5 million. Wal-Mart is appealing.

In 2002, a federal jury in Oregon found that Wal-Mart employees were forced to work off the clock and awarded back pay to 83 workers. In 2004, Wal-Mart settled a similar lunch-break case in Colorado for $50 million.

At least 57 other wage-and-hours cases have been filed across the United States against the world's largest retailer, and many of them are awaiting class-action certification, according to company filings.

Wal-Mart's decision to report the problem is indicative of how visible it has become, according to Harley Shaiken, a labor professor at the University of California at Berkeley. "They realized there was a problem and didn't want to see it become a worse problem," he said. "I think Wal-Mart has really learned that putting it under the rug doesn't make it better."

Trustee: Sen. Clinton's Brother Owes Debts To Carnival Operators (AP)

By Rose French, The Associated Press

Tony Rodham, the brother of Democratic presidential contender Sen. Hillary Clinton, is being asked again to appear in court on debts owed to a Tennessee carnival operator whose owners received presidential pardons from President Bill Clinton.

A bankruptcy trustee asked a federal judge today to schedule a new court date in the case to address Rodham allegedly failing to repay $109,000 in loans from now-defunct United Shows of America Inc.

Edgar Allen Gregory Jr. and his wife, Vonna Jo, owners of United Shows, were convicted of defrauding several banks and were given pardons in 2000 after Rodham asked the president to intervene on their behalf. Ed Gregory died in 2004.

A report by the U.S. House Committee on Government Reform in 2002 concluded United Shows paid Rodham $240,000 for undocumented consulting services, and that the president was interested in the pardons solely because of his contacts with Rodham.

The Gregorys denied paying or promising Rodham for anything related to the pardons. The loans their company gave to Rodham occurred both before and after the pardons were issued.

Edgar Gregory filed for bankruptcy in 2002 for two family businesses, including United Shows, which operates state and regional fairs and carnivals across the Southeast. The company stopped operating in 2004, the same year as Ed Gregory's death.

Nashville-based federal bankruptcy trustee Michael Collins said he has tried to get Rodham to repay the loans for almost two years.

Collins had Rodham's accounts frozen in 2005 after Rodham failed to respond to an initial complaint. A judge ruled that Rodham was in default on the loans, but later unfroze the accounts after Rodham appealed.

Collins said the latest filing seeks to establish "realistic deadlines for the future progression of this litigation."

"It's collecting a receivable that was owed to the company," he said. "Its just like any loan."

Collins says he's seeking the loan money which, with interest, comes to nearly $150,000.

Rodham's lawyers in Virginia did not immediately return phone calls on today seeking comment.

Rodham says he was hired to help bring new business to the Gregorys' carnival operation. But the report by the U.S. House Committee on Government Reform said that without any documentation the episode raises "substantial questions ... as to what Rodham actually did for the Gregorys that was so valuable."

"It appears that the president was interested in the Gregory pardons solely because of his contacts with Tony Rodham," the report says. "It is fair to conclude that, but for Tony Rodham's lobbying efforts, the Gregory pardons would not have been granted."

Rodham refused to appear before the committee. He did, however, at the time tell CNN's Larry King Live he talked about the pardons with President Clinton, but said Clinton made the decision to grant clemency to the Gregorys on the merits of their case.

"If I used any kind of influence, then why did it sit in the Justice Department for 18 months? It's absurd to even say that I used any kind of influence. ... The Gregorys are the type of people the pardon system is made for."

CNN, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- After the investigation into the May 1964 deaths in rural Mississippi of his brother and a friend went cold, Thomas Moore was convinced he would never see justice done.

But when a documentary filmmaker for the Canadian Broadcasting Corp. began to research the case about a year and a half ago, Moore saw a glimmer of hope.

And Thursday, 71-year-old James Ford Seale, who court documents state is a former Ku Klux Klan member, made an initial appearance in court in Jackson, Mississippi, on charges of kidnapping and conspiracy in the abduction and killing of Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee, both 19, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced. (Watch how a 42-year-old cold case heated up)

Seale has pleaded not guilty. He is being held without bail, Gonzales said. (Dee's sister prayed for justice "somehow, some way")

Moore said that after momentum began to build on the case two years ago, he told his late brother he wouldn't give up.

"I promised him in 2005 at his grave in Franklin County ... that I would fight until I die," Moore told reporters in Washington on Thursday shortly after the indictment was announced.

"When I got the word yesterday ... I cried," he continued. "And I felt that my mom and my dad and Charles Moore and Henry Dee said, 'Thank you.' " (Watch Moore savor the day he's been waiting for)

Moore said he returned to Franklin County with CBC producer David Ridgen to help research the case.

At one point, Moore said, he told some friends there it was too bad that one of the suspects -- Seale, who was initially arrested along with Charles Edwards soon after the murders -- had died.

"They said, 'He hasn't passed away,' " Moore said. "They directed us to where he lived. That changed our mission."

Soon after their arrests in 1964, Seale and Edwards were released on bail and were never tried.

According to the CBC, FBI documents stated that Edwards confessed that he had picked up the two young African-American men, beaten and interrogated them.

But he said they were alive when he left.

Edwards, who also is still alive, was not named in the recent indictment.

The allegations in the indictment against Seale say that "Dee and Moore were beaten by their captors, then transported and finally forcibly drowned by being thrown into the old Mississippi River tied to heavy objects alleged to have included an engine block, iron weights and railroad ties," Gonzales said.

"These allegations are a painful reminder of a terrible time in our country, a time when some people viewed their fellow Americans as inferior and as a threat based only on the color of their skin," the attorney general added. (Watch the FBI's top agent describe 'a dark chapter' in history)

After learning that Seale was alive, Moore gave Dunn Lampton, the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of Mississippi, the FBI files on the case that he got from a reporter in Mississippi.

"The really most important factor, in my mind, was Thomas Moore coming to see me," Lampton said. "And at that time, I had not really looked at the file. And the case had lain dormant for years. And I thought that there was nothing we could do about it."

"I took the file home with me and read it," Lampton said. "I was a district attorney for 20 years; I've tried a lot of murder cases. I read the file and I thought that perhaps something could be done either on the state side or on the federal side."

Lampton said he helped form a task force and that the end result -- the indictment -- was a joint effort.

"Nineteen months ago was the start of a journey," Moore said. "Had no idea what it would lead to, but we had hoped and we tried and we continued to push.

Man Pleads Not Guilty In 1964 Race Case (AP)

By Emily Wagster Pettus, The Associated Press

JACKSON, Miss. (AP) — A reputed Ku Klux Klansman accused in the 1964 slayings of two black men pleaded not guilty Thursday, and in a measure of how things have changed across the South, the judge he stood before was a black woman.

With his wrists and ankles shackled, 71-year-old James Ford Seale repeatedly addressed the judge as "ma'am," a social courtesy whites typically denied to blacks in Mississippi 43 years ago.

Seale was arrested Wednesday on federal charges of kidnapping and conspiracy. Prosecutors said Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee, both 19, were seized and beaten by Klansmen, then thrown into the Mississippi River to drown.

A second white man long suspected in the attack, reputed KKK member Charles Marcus Edwards, 72, has not been charged. People close to the investigation who spoke on condition of anonymity said Edwards was cooperating with authorities.

Seale and Edwards were arrested in the case in 1964. But the FBI — consumed by the search for three civil rights workers who had disappeared that same summer — turned the case over to local authorities, who promptly threw out all charges.

The U.S. Justice Department reopened the case in 2000. But it was not until a few years ago that authorities even realized Seale was still alive.

"Forty years ago, the system failed," FBI Director Robert Mueller said in Washington. "We in the FBI have a responsibility to investigate these cold-case, civil rights-era murders where evidence still exists to bring both closure and justice to these cases that for many, remain unhealed wounds to this day."

On Thursday, U.S. Magistrate Linda R. Anderson asked Seale whether he understood the charges, which carry up to life in prison.

"Yes, ma'am, I think so," Seale said in a calm voice.

Seale was jailed for a bail hearing on Monday. His court-appointed attorneys said he is suffering from cancer. His trial is scheduled for April 2.

Suspect Pleads In 1964 Slayings (USAT)

By Jerry Mitchell And Ana Radelat

USA Today, January 26, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. — A 71-year-old reputed Ku Klux Klan member pleaded innocent Thursday to charges linked to the killings of two black teens in Mississippi almost 43 years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0122270

James Seale is charged with two counts of kidnapping and one count of conspiracy to commit kidnapping in connection with the May 2, 1964, abduction, beating and drowning deaths of Henry Dee and Charles Moore, both 19. If convicted, Seale could face up to three life sentences.

Seale, now in custody in the Madison County Jail near Jackson, faces a hearing Monday on whether he will be released on bond. His court-appointed public defenders are likely to argue Seale should be freed because he has cancer.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Linda Anderson asked Seale on Thursday whether he understood the charges.

"Yes, ma'am, I think so," replied Seale, his wrists and ankles shackled.

Six years ago, in an interview with the Jackson, Miss., Clarion-Ledger, Seale scoffed at the idea he would ever be arrested in the case.

The charges were announced in Washington on Thursday by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Dunn Lampton, U.S. attorney for the Southern District of Mississippi, and Robert Mueller, head of the FBI.

"This was a horrible crime inflicted with stunning disregard for the suffering of these victims," Mueller said. "These tragic murders are straight from the darkest page of our country's history."

Lampton said prosecutors were able to bring the case largely due to the efforts of Moore's brother, Thomas Moore, who pressed authorities to investigate the deaths.

Thomas Moore, 65, traveled to Washington on Thursday with Dee's sister, Thelma Collins. Looking back on the years since his brother's death, he said his hopes surged any time someone took an interest in the case.

"Every now and then, people would get my hopes up, and then it would fade away," he said.

The indictment said Seale and other Klansmen who abducted Dee and Moore thought the two had information about local gunrunning and thought Dee might be a civil rights activist.

The teens eventually were driven to Parker's Landing in Mississippi, according to the indictment, where the Klansmen tied a Jeep engine block, iron weights and railroad rails to them and then threw them into the Mississippi River.

Seale, along with Charles Edwards, now 72, was arrested once before, on Nov. 6, 1964, in connection with the slayings. The FBI, consumed by the search for three civil rights workers who had disappeared that same summer in Philadelphia, Miss., turned the case over to local authorities, who threw out the charges.

Edwards has not been charged, and Gonzales declined Thursday to say whether there will be more charges in the case.

Race Former Deputy Charged In Civil-Rights Murders (NPR)

By Wade Goodwyn

NPR's All Things Consider, January 26, 2007

A federal grand jury charges a Mississippi man with the 1964 killings of two black men, in the latest in a series of charges involving racially motivated killings from the civil-rights era. The two men had been hitchhiking when they went missing. Their bodies were found in the Mississippi River, shackled to an engine block.

James Ford Seale, 71, pleaded not guilty to the charges in Jackson, Miss. The former sheriff's deputy and reputed Klansman was one of two suspects originally charged in the deaths decades ago. But the FBI turned the case over to local authorities — at the time, the agency was consumed with the search for three missing civil-rights workers.

James Ford Seale, a 71-year-old reputed Ku Klux Klansman, is escorted into the federal courthouse by marshals in Jackson, Miss., on Thursday. The former Sheriff's deputy, once thought to be dead, faces charges for his alleged involvement in the kidnapping and slaying of two black teenagers in 1964 in one of the last major unsolved crimes of the Civil Rights era. AP

More than 40 years ago, two black hitchhikers were found dead in Mississippi. Thursday, a reputed Ku Klux Klan member — James Ford Seale, 71 — will be charged with kidnapping, but not murder. Reporter Jerry Mitchell of The Clarion-Ledger newspaper in Jackson, Miss., discusses the case with Steve Inskeep:

SI: Would you remind us exactly what happened in 1964, and what James Seale's alleged role was.

JM: This was a case of forgotten killings, really. These two teenagers, African-American teenagers, were hitchhiking. And the Klan believed that there was gunrunning in the county [Franklin County, Miss.] and believed they might know something about it, or did know something about it. [They] took them out into the woods, beat them, then hauled them out to the Mississippi River and tied them to a Jeep motor block and dumped them alive into the Mississippi River.

SI: And James Seale, was he a member of the KKK at that time?

JM: [He was] reputed to be. He denied being a member when I talked to him in 2000. And, of course, he went on to deny that he knew anybody in the Klan. But, of course, his brother was in the Klan, and his dad was supposedly in the Klan. So, I found that kind of interesting.

SI: You mentioned that you talked to him in 2000. It was your newspaper that got this old case reopened. Can you describe to me what evidence led you to James Seale?

JM: Basically, federal authorities had reopened another case, the Chester White killings that the Klan did in '66 in Mississippi. It had taken place on federal property, in the Homochitto National Forest. And the name rung a bell. So, I was like, "it seems like there was something else that took place there." And, sure enough, Henry Hezekiah Dee and Charles Eddy Moore were both beaten in that forest. So that's what led them to reopen that case at that point.

SI: And what led you to Seale? Had he been a suspect at the time?

JM: Yes. He had been arrested along with a guy by the name of Charles Marcus Edwards. But the case never went anywhere.

SI: You mean the Mississippi authorities never did…

JM: [The] never did a thing with it. It was on the state side. The state never prosecuted. In fact, they've dismissed the charges.

SI: Based on what you've seen, how strong is the evidence connecting him to this crime, and what is the evidence?

JM: The case against him, I think, is probably similar to what it would have been in '64, if authorities had been able to put the case together. And this is laid out in FBI documents. Mr. Edwards confessed to authorities his involvement in the case, and identified Mr. Seale as being one of the fellow participants. But Mr. Edwards also said he didn't take part in anything beyond that.

SI: This other suspect confessed to a role in the beating, not the killing. And he leads you, then, to James Seale, the man who's been arrested now?

JM: Correct. I was able to, you know, [use] old records and other things [that] led me to him. And [I] actually had help from people that knew him [that] helped me track him down.

SI: These two men were 19 when they were killed. Are their parents still alive?

JM: No, they're not. But the brother of Charles Moore, Thomas Moore, really deserves a tremendous amount of credit for this case being re-prosecuted. He's been working with a CBC documentary filmmaker, and he's the one who approached the U.S attorney in 2005 and I think really deserves the credit for this case finally going forward.

SI: After more than 40 years, he was still going after the killers of his brother, and he's part of the reason we're hearing about the case again now.

CBC News, January 26, 2007

An elderly Mississippi man could spend the rest of his life in prison in connection with the 1964 slayings of two African-American teenagers afterÂ interestÂ in theÂ cold case wasÂ rekindled by a CBC documentary maker andÂ one ofÂ the victim'sÂ brothers.

James Ford Seale, a 71-year-old reputed Ku Klux Klansman, is escorted from the federal courthouse in Jackson, Miss., on Thursday. Seale pleaded not guilty to federal kidnapping charges tied to the 1964 slayings of two black teenagers.

Seale faces two counts of kidnappingÂ and one count of conspiracy to commitÂ kidnapping in the case of Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee, both 19,Â Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said ThursdayÂ in Washington.

Each count carries a maximum sentence of life in prison.

In a news conference attended by Moore's brother Thomas Moore and Dee's sister Thelma Collins, Gonzales said the case was "a painful reminder of a terrible time in our country."

Gonzales wouldn't comment on why aÂ second suspect, church deacon and reputed KKK member Charles Marcus Edwards, now 72, was not charged.

"Forty years ago, the system failed," Mueller said bluntly with Gonzales and Dunn Lampton, the U.S. attorney for southern Mississippi, at his side. 'My son don't have an uncle. I don't have a brother'

Moore, who joined CBC documentary filmmaker DavidÂ Ridgen on seven journeys toÂ Mississippi,Â said heÂ cried tears ofÂ joy when he heardÂ Seale was in custody, butÂ still struggles withÂ his brother's death.Â

Thomas Moore and CBC documentary filmmaker David Ridgen discovered James Ford Seale, the suspect in Moore's brother's slaying, was still alive in Mississippi.

"I will continue to feel bad," Moore said after the news conference. "My son don't have an uncle. I don't have a brother to call. So I've struggled for 42 years."

Collins said she didn't think she would live toÂ see progressÂ in her brother's case.

"I thank the Lord that I got to see it at my age," she said. "I'm 70 years old. I did see some good come of it."

For years, Seale's family told reporters that he had died. But in JulyÂ 2005, Moore andÂ Ridgen found Seale alive and residing a fewÂ kilometres from where the kidnapping took place.

"When I first met Thomas Moore, heÂ knew more about the case than I did,"Â said Lampton, who headed the task forceÂ launched after the discovery.

"We thought that there was nothing we could do with it."

On May 2, 1964, Moore and Dee, both 19, disappeared whileÂ hitchhiking near Meadville, in southwestern Mississippi.

According to the FBI, they were interrogated and tortured in a nearby forest, locked in a trunk, driven to Louisiana, chained to a Jeep motor and some train rails, and dropped alive into the Mississippi River, whereÂ they drowned.

TheirÂ mangled torsos were discovered more than two months later during the search for Michael Schwerner, Andrew Goodman, and James Chaney â€" three civil rights workers who disappeared June 21 the same year.

Those three bodies were found in Mississippi a short time later, and the case was made famous in the 1988 film Mississippi Burning. Case never went to trial

Seale, then 28, and Edwards, then 31, were arrested in the original investigation, but released soon thereafter on a $5,000 bond. No grand jury or trial was ever held.

FBI documents allege Edwards admitted that he and Seale picked up Moore â€"Â who was on his way home after being expelled from Alcorn A&M University for taking part in a student protest â€" and Dee, who worked at a lumberyard.

According to the documents, EdwardsÂ said he and Seale took the two men to a wooded area, where they were whipped with beanpoles and interrogated.Â Edwards insisted that when he left, the two men were still alive.

He later denied making the statement. None of the allegations have been proven in court.

The FBI turned over Edwards' statement and other files on the investigation to local authorities, and a justice of the peace dismissed all charges.

Gonzales said Seale was not charged with murder because prosecutors examined the evidence and determined a murder case would be too difficult to prove.

"These are very difficult cases to make," Gonzales said, citing the death of witnesses and oldÂ evidence that is no longer available.

TheÂ Justice Department was slow to act on evidence and pursue those responsible for the crime,Â according to Jerry Mitchell,Â an investigative reporter for the Jackson newspaper the Clarion-Ledger who hasÂ worked onÂ the case and numerous other civil-rights slayings.

"It could have been done years ago," Mitchell told CBC News Thursday. With files from the Associated Press

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, January 26, 2007

In court, after 42 years

A judge will decide Monday whether to free on bond reputed Klansman James Ford Seale, who pleaded not guilty to federal kidnapping and conspiracy charges in connection with the 1964 slayings of two black teenagers.

Assistant U.S. Attorney John Dowdy said Thursday the 71-year-old former crop-duster should stay behind bars. Seale is charged in the May 2, 1964, abduction of Henry Hezekiah Dee and Charles Eddie Moore, who were hitchhiking in Meadville when they were grabbed, beaten and thrown into the Mississippi River, where they drowned, according to FBI reports.

Jackson lawyer Kathy Nester of the federal public defenders' office said Seale, who suffers from cancer, should be freed because he is in poor health.

Seale's trial on two counts of kidnapping and one count of conspiracy is set for April 2, although that date likely will be pushed back.

The clash between past and present became apparent when the reputed Klansman stood in front of U.S. Magistrate Judge Linda R. Anderson, the first African-American magistrate in Jackson. Shackled in chains and wearing an orange jumpsuit, he responded to many of her queries with "yes, ma'am" or "no, ma'am."

Seale now faces a trial before U.S. District Judge Henry Wingate, the first African-American district judge in Jackson. If convicted, Seale could face up to three life sentences.

His arrest is the 28th in connection with a civil rights-era slaying since 1989, when Mississippi reopened its investigation into the 1963 assassination of NAACP leader Medgar Evers in Jackson.

Since then, authorities in seven states have re-examined 29 killings from the civil rights era, leading to 22 convictions, most recently in 2005 when a Mississippi jury convicted Edgar Ray Killen of manslaughter for orchestrating the Klan's killings of civil rights workers James Chaney, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner.

In a Thursday news conference in Washington, FBI Director Robert Mueller called the killings of Dee and Moore "tragic murders ... straight from the darkest page of our country's history."

It's been an emotional roller coaster for Moore's 65-year-old brother, Thomas, who began his quest in 1998 to get authorities to prosecute the killings.

"Every now and then, people would get my hopes up, and then it would fade away," said Thomas Moore, who was in Washington for the news conference.

Dee's 70-year-old sister, Thelma Collins, who also traveled to Washington, "cried and sat down and cried again" after hearing of Seale's arrest.

In most criminal cases, defendants waive the reading of the indictment, but Seale sat Thursday and listened to Dowdy read the entire five-page document.

It says Seale and other Klansmen thought Dee might have information about gunrunning in Franklin County, and that's why they abducted him and Moore.

Taking the two teens to Homochitto National Forest, Seale pointed a sawed-off shotgun at Dee and Moore while fellow Klansmen beat the teens with switches and tree branches, the indictment says.

Dee and Moore fabricated a confession there were guns hidden in a Roxie church, which Klansmen and the local sheriff searched, only to find no guns, the indictment says.

Klansmen used duct tape to bind Dee and Moore, weighted them down with a Jeep engine block, iron weights and railroad rails before throwing them into an old Mississippi River channel, where they drowned, the indictment says.

Dowdy read the details of the crime and then said the Klansmen "met to discuss the murders of Dee and Moore and the need to maintain secrecy among the co-conspirators."

He looked straight at Seale, who showed no emotion.

Seale had been arrested for the slayings in 1964, too, along with Charles Marcus Edwards, who admitted he was involved in the beatings but said the teens were alive when he last saw them. No charges are expected against Edwards.

Authorities confronted Seale in 1964, telling him they knew he and others had taken Dee and Moore "to some remote place and beat them to death," FBI records say.

"You then transported and disposed of their bodies by dropping them in the Mississippi River," the records say. "You didn't even give them a decent burial. We know you did it. You know you did. The Lord above knows you did it."

"Yes," Seale was quoted as replying. "But I'm not going to admit it. You are going to have to prove it."

Asked in a 2000 interview with The Clarion-Ledger if he had anything to do with the crime, Seale replied, "I ain't in jail, am I?"

Charges against Seale have renewed attention on other unsolved cases. A bill now in Congress would create a cold-cases unit in the Justice Department to track down unpunished civil rights-era killers.

"I think today is a step in the right direction, and I think it will contribute to the passage of the Emmett Till Unsolved Civil Rights Crime Act," said Alvin Sykes, whose work helped lead to the reopening of the 1955 killing of Emmett Till.

When he saw Seale in court Thursday, he said he felt sadness "to see such an old man, but if it's true what he's alleged to have done, he has wasted his life with hatred when he had an opportunity to live a life more fruitful. If he did the crime, he has to do the time. It doesn't matter how old he is."

Reputed Klansman Pleads Not Guilty To Civil Rights Era Murders (WLBT)

By Marsha Thompson

WLBT-TV, January 26, 2007

Fast moving developments in a civil rights era cold murder case. A reputed K.K.K. member is behind bars after facing a federal judge Thursday. James Ford Seale was arraigned in federal court in Jackson Thursday morning, charged with conspiracy charges and the kidnapping of Charles Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee 43 years ago.

United States Attorney General Alberto Gonzales commented on this case, saying authorities are dedicated to tracking down criminals, even if the case dates back decades.

As Seale's wife, brother and family members left the federal courthouse, they ignored the media's questions. The feds say they are out to prove James Ford Seale and other K.K.K. members pretended to be sheriff's deputies when they picked up Charles Moore and Henry Dee near Mendenall May 2, 1964.

The indictment alleges the teenagers were taken to the Homochitto National Forest beaten and their bodies later weighted down and dumped in the Mississippi River. Those seeking justice in forgotten civil rights era cases said they view the arrest of James Seale one step closer to justice.

Alvin Sykes, the president of Emmett Till Campaign Justice says, "In Washington federal officials including Mississippi's U.S. Attorney said it's time for justice."

FBI Director Robert Mueller said, "This was a horrible crime. Indicted with stunning disregard for the suffering of the victims."

Thomas Moore, the brother of Charles Moore believed Seale was dead, until he tracked him down in Roxie, Mississippi. His tenacity persuaded the feds to reopen the decades old case.

U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said, "Thomas Moore uncovered the fact he was alive and well. He came to see me. The case had lain dormant for years."

A grisly reminder of the darker days in Mississippi during the so-called "Summer of Freedom." The 43 year old cold case is no longer dormant, but active with a living suspect.

Feds Get Indictment In Cold Case (ABC)

By Stephanie Sy

ABC News, January 26, 2007

Suspected former Ku Klux Klan member James Seale was indicted for his alleged role in the kidnapping and murder of two black teenagers, 40 years ago. U.S. attorney Alberto Gonzales said Seale faces two counts of kidnapping resulting in death, and one count of conspiracy.

The charges fall just short of murder.

"In late spring of 1964, Henry Dee and Charlie Moore, both age 19, both

And then, while still alive, their bodies were tied with weights, pushed

Outside the courthouse, Seale's family kept silent. For years, his son had led reporters to believe he was dead. Seale entered a not guilty plea. If convicted, the 71-year old could spend the rest of his life in prison.

At the time, authorities say they knew it was murder. But such was the power of the Klan in the 1960s, that Seale was never charged.

The case went cold until a few years ago when Charles Moore's brother, along with a documentary filmmaker, started digging deeper.

"I promised him in 2005 at his grave in Franklin that I would fight until I die," said Thomas Moore. "I got the word yesterday. And I cried."

In 1999, another man implicated in the case spoke to ABC's 20/20. Even though Charles Edwards' allegedly gave a partial confession, he still hasn't been charged. But the ABC report led investigators to obtain the evidence they needed to indict Seale, four decades after the crime.

This posting has been altered from its original version, in which Seale was referred to as a former sheriff's deputy. ABC News later confirmed that Seale was never a police officer or deputy sheriff as previously reported.

US Charges Suspect In 1964 Civil Rights Murders (VOA)

By Jim Malone

Voice of America, January 26, 2007

An elderly white man in the southern state of Mississippi faces federal charges of kidnapping and conspiracy in connection with the 1964 murders of two African-American men. The case is the latest in a series of prosecutions brought by the government to solve racially-motivated crimes from the civil rights era of the 1950s and 1960s. National correspondent Jim Malone has more from Washington.

James Ford Seale, 71, a reputed Ku Klux Klansman, is escorted into the federal courthouse by marshals in Jackson, MississippiThe suspect now under arrest is James Seale, 71, from Mississippi. Prosecutors say Seale was a reputed member of the white supremacist organization known as the Ku Klux Klan and was part of a group of whites that kidnapped two 19-year-old black men in May of 1964.

The two victims, Henry Dee and Charles Moore, were taken to a nearby forest, tied to a tree and beaten.

"Dee and Moore were beaten by their captors, then transported and finally forcibly drowned by being thrown into the old Mississippi River, tied to heavy objects that allegedly included an engine block, iron weights and railroad ties," he said. "These allegations are a painful reminder of a terrible time in our country, a time when some people viewed their fellow Americans as inferior."

The bodies of the two men were found months later and James Seale and another man were initially arrested by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), on murder charges in November of 1964. But local authorities declined to prosecute the two suspects and the case was dropped.

The case was reopened in 2000 after previously uncovered documents indicated the murders of the two black men took place on federal land, allowing the FBI and the Justice Department to once again pursue the case.

A brother of one of the victims, Thomas Moore, pressed federal investigators to reopen the case after he found out that the main suspect, James Seale, was still alive. Seale's family had claimed for years he was dead.

FBI Director Robert Mueller notes that the kidnapping and conspiracy charges against Seale are only allegations at this point that must be proven at trial.

But Mueller says federal officials remain committed to prosecuting civil rights era murder cases that have remained unsolved for decades.

"These tragic murders are from among the darkest page of our country's history," he said. "And while sadly we cannot right the wrongs of the past, we can pursue justice to the end, and we will, no matter how long it takes until every living suspect is called to answer for their crimes."

In recent years, authorities in Mississippi and Alabama have won convictions in several notable civil rights cases from the past including a 1963 church bombing in Alabama that killed four black girls and the 1964 murders of three civil rights workers in Mississippi.

Ex-policeman Charged Over 1964 Killing Of Black Teens (UKIND)

By Andrew Buncombe In Washington

The (UK) Daily Independent, January 26, 2007

A former sheriff's deputy and alleged member of the Ku Klux Klan has been charged over the killing of two black teenagers more than four decades ago - one of the very last of the civil rights-era cases authorities are likely to seek to bring to justice.

James Seale, 71, once believed to be dead, appeared in court in Jackson, Mississippi, yesterday morning where he was charged over the deaths of the two 19-year-olds who were beaten, tied to weights and then thrown alive into a river. Their remains were found several months later by federal authorities who were hunting for the bodies of three civil rights workers who were also murdered by members of the Klan.

According to a three-page indictment laying out the accusations, Mr Seale and several accomplices abducted Henry Dee and Charles Moore as the pair were hitchhiking near an ice-cream stand in the town of Meadville in south-west Mississippi and drove them to Homochitto National Forest. There they allegedly beat the teenagers with tree branches, questioned them at gunpoint and bound them with tape.

Mr Dee was apparently tied to an engine block from a car while Mr Moore was tied to iron weights from a railroad track. Both men were then thrown into the Mississippi river. "It was a horrible crime committed with stunning disregard for the victims," said the FBI director Robert Mueller.

When the case was initially investigated, Mr Seale and another suspect were arrested. But the FBI - perhaps distracted by the "Mississippi Burning" case involving the deaths of three civil rights workers - passed the case to the local authorities and a judge promptly threw out the charges.

For many years, Mr Seale's family told reporters that he was dead. But two years ago Mr Moore's brother, Thomas, and a Canadian filmmaker discovered he was still alive and living in rural Franklin County, close to the scene of the crime.

Thomas Moore put pressure on federal authorities to reopen the case. Mr Seale was arrested on Wednesday.

Yesterday, he was charged with two counts of kidnapping and one count of conspiracy to commit kidnapping. The Attorney General, Alberto Gonzales, said authorities had decided to proceed with these charges rather than murder after examining all the available evidence. He declined to say why an alleged accomplice of Mr Seale's was also not charged, though reports said that the man - a church deacon now aged 72 - has been co-operating with authorities.

In court in Jackson, Mr Seale pleaded not guilty to the charges. The court ordered he be held in custody until Monday when a bail hearing is scheduled to take place. His court-appointed lawyer said his client was suffering from cancer.

The case is the latest in a flurry of crimes and killings dating from the civil rights era that authorities have belatedly sought to prosecute.

In recent years, they have secured convictions against two former Klan members, Thomas Blanton and Bobby Cherry, for the murder of four black girls killed in the bombing of a church in Birmingham, Alabama, in 1963, and Edgar Killen, for the murder of the three civil rights workers in 1964. Killen, a former Klan recruiter, has appealed against his conviction.

Penny Weaver, of the Southern Poverty Law Centre, a civil rights and anti-racism group, said: "It's extremely important [that these cases are brought to trial]. All you have to do is look at the comments of the family members. It's a great relief. They are overwhelmed... by a sense that after all these years someone is taking their loved ones' deaths seriously."

Anthony Collins, the grandson of Thelma Collins, the sister of Henry Dee, said his grandmother had for decades suffered from depression over the death of her brother.

He told The Independent: "Right now, she is happy that there is going to be some resolution. It's been a long time trying to make sure justice is served."

Thomas Moore, a brother of the other murdered man, said: "I'm very satisfied at this point ...I never thought it would happen. I never forgot my brother or Henry Dee."

Man Pleads Not Guilty In 1964 Race Case (ABC)

By Harry Phillips

Jan. 25, 2007— By all accounts, it was a typically sultry afternoon in tiny Meadville, Miss., on May 2, 1964, the day that two 19-year-olds, Henry Dee and Charles Moore, vanished while walking along a highway on the edge of town.

As far as anyone knew, Dee and Moore had no enemies, nor had they any connection with the burgeoning civil rights movement. They'd never done anything to pique the ire of the notoriously racist and violent White Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, many of whom lived in the rural settlements across Franklin County.

But these were not average times in Mississippi. The civil rights struggle had become a virtual war, defined by the white supremacist KKK taking on anyone who would seek to end racial discrimination.

Ratcheting up the tension, civil rights organizations had recently announced "Freedom Summer" for 1964, a bold initiative to bring activists into the Deep South and register black voters for the coming presidential and congressional elections. Mississippi was, in fact, bracing for the worst summer in a most painful chapter of American History.

In 1964, young men like Henry Dee and Charles Moore knew that to stay safe, they needed to avoid doing anything that might be viewed by the KKK as activism. They also knew to avoid any contact with Klansmen. And so, on that early May afternoon, when a Volkswagen Beetle pulled to a stop beside them, Dee and Moore knew enough to respectfully decline the white driver's offer of a ride.

More than two months later, investigators got their first clue about what happened to the two young men when the partial remains of a black man surfaced in a remote section of the Mississippi River some 90 miles from Meadville. A college identification card found in a pants pocket helped identify the remains as those of Charles Moore.

For another two months, FBI investigators conducted a fruitless investigation of the case until they received a call from an anonymous informant who said he had information about Dee and Moore's disappearance.

The informant was so terrified of the KKK that he insisted on anonymity. The FBI gave him a code name: JN-30R.

Over the ensuing weeks, JN-30R provided the FBI all the information they would need to identify five Klansmen as prime suspects in a horrifying tale of how Henry Dee and Charles Moore were murdered for little reason beyond the color of their skin.

In dozens of pages of reports to the FBI, JN-30R described in gut-wrenching detail how Dee and Moore were kidnapped and taken deep into the Homochitto National Forest and beaten with bean-poles until their bodies were broken and bleeding profusely.

They were then stuffed into the trunk of a car and driven 90 miles to a Mississippi River bank where they were bound and tied to a Jeep engine block and dumped into the river alive.

Brother Wins Arrest In '64 Case (MH)

By Allen G. Breed

The Miami Herald, January 26, 2007

As a deacon at Bunkley Baptist Church, Charles Marcus Edwards was responsible for opening up for Sunday school. And so on that sultry Mississippi morning, he and his wife were the first to arrive at the tiny brick chapel.

A minivan pulled into the gravel drive behind them. A black man got out of the van and approached, followed by a younger white man carrying a video camera. Betty Edwards gave them a friendly wave.

"Mr. Edwards," the black man said, extending a hand with a sealed manila envelope. "I have something for you, sir."

"What is this?" the 72-year-old deacon asked, bemused.

Inside were pages from an unfinished story.

Edwards limped quickly toward the church and climbed the three steps. At the top, he stopped and turned.

"What's your name, fella?" the elderly white man asked.

DOJ_NMG_0122278

"My name is Moore," the stranger replied. "Thomas James Moore."

The reputed former Klansman moved to enter the sanctuary, then paused and turned again.

"I'm going to tell you, fella," he said, gesturing down at Moore with the church keys in one hand and his Bible clutched in the other. "I DID not kill your brother. I didn't have, I didn't have anything to do with that."

As Edwards disappeared inside the darkened church, his wife jiggled the door handle to make sure it was locked, then slammed it behind her. As the cameraman filmed, Moore walked back to the van, a satisfied grin on his face.

The old man hadn't confessed. But tucked under his arm, along with the black-covered Bible, was the manila envelope, with those chilling documents for the deacon to ponder.

The Sunday morning drama, which happened last year, would become a turning point in the quest for justice in the long-dormant Dee and Moore killings.

Just this week, another document was added in the case: a three-count federal indictment.

In the summer of 1964, they were two black teenagers hitchhiking near an ice cream stand in Meadville, Miss.

A car picked up Henry Dee and Charles Moore and drove them into the woods, where Ku Klux Klan members tied them to trees and whipped them. Still alive, the two 19-year-olds were bound, weighted down and thrown into a river, where their bodies were later found.

Their deaths never drew the kind of attention garnered by the nearby murders of three young civil rights workers that same summer. In that, Dee and Moore were more like scores of victims who died in obscurity when the young civil rights movement met the South's last gasp of raw racism.

At the time, both their community and the justice system failed them, as it did many victims of racially motivated slayings. But on Thursday, Dee and Moore found a measure of justice. For that, it is never too late.

Federal authorities arrested and charged James Seale, 71, a former sheriff's deputy and reputed Klan member, in connection with the murders.

Seale was a suspect in 1964, but the case was dropped by local authorities. For years, the case lay dormant. Then, in 2000, The Clarion-Ledger of Jackson, Miss., uncovered documents that gave federal authorities a new hook. And in 2005, while Seale family members insisted Seale was dead, Thomas Moore, the brother of one of the victims, found Seale living not far from the murder scene. Moore persuaded authorities to take another look.

Since 1989, authorities have won 22 convictions in cold cases revived from the civil rights era. Some came in murders where suspects, now old men, had bragged that they'd never be punished for their crimes.

To the nation's credit, changing times and values continue to prove them wrong.

LOS ANGELES - The fourth member of a Hispanic street gang convicted of hate crimes in a bloody campaign to drive blacks from their neighborhood was sentenced Monday to life without parole in federal prison.

Porfirio Avila, 32, and three other members of the Avenues were found guilty in August in what authorities charged was a conspiracy to attack blacks over six years in the Highland Park area, east of downtown Los Angeles.

Gang members killed one man, Christopher Bowser, who was waiting for a bus in 2000 and another, Kenneth Wilson, who was looking for a parking spot a year earlier, authorities said.

Avila was implicated in the shooting death of Bowser. His three co-defendants were sentenced to two consecutive life terms for their role in the conspiracy and for Wilson's murder.

"Today's sentence, as well as the sentences handed down last November, demonstrate how seriously we take these incidents," said Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general for the civil rights division.

Defense attorneys had claimed police concocted the conspiracy charges by tying together random attacks committed largely by unknown perpetrators. They also questioned the credibility of two former members of the gang who became government witnesses.

Avila has been serving a life sentence in state prison for the murder of Bowser and another black man. A fifth defendant, Merced Cambrero, is a fugitive.

Avila's sentencing punctuates a month that has some residents of another neighborhood and activists fearing a race war between gangs.

Police say a 34-year-old black man was shot without provocation by a Hispanic man in the Harbor Gateway area Saturday - just south from where a 14-year-old black girl was shot to death after she entered an area claimed by a Latino gang last month.

Prison Sex Suit Can Go Forward (DEN)

By Ronald J. Hansen, The Detroit News

Detroit News, January 26, 2007

DETROIT -- A federal judge has overturned a Michigan law intended to write prison inmates out of the state's civil rights act.

The ruling means a lawsuit alleging rampant sexual abuse of female inmates by state prison employees may proceed with its civil rights claims. That lawsuit echoes many of the same abuse problems identified by similar suits and a federal probe of Michigan's prisons more than a decade ago.

U.S. District Judge John Corbett O'Meara said the March 2000 decision to exempt inmates "essentially permits the state to discriminate against female prisoners without fear of accountability under Michigan's civil rights law.

"Given the state's abhorrent and well-documented history of sexual and other abuse of female prisoners, the court finds this amendment particularly troubling," O'Meara wrote. "It appears that the state legislature has not attempted to deter frivolous lawsuits, but rather preclude meritorious ones."

Rusty Hills, a spokesman for the Michigan attorney general, whose office is defending the lawsuit, said, "We're recommending appeal to the (prison) agency because we think the judge is incorrect." The state has argued that inmates still had ample federal civil rights protections and could sue in federal court.

Deborah LaBelle, an Ann Arbor lawyer who is suing the state, said the ruling should send a message to state officials to help end inmate abuse rather than fight lawsuits.

"Instead of addressing the degrading and intolerable abuse of women and girls held in Michigan's prisons, the Department of Corrections thus far has focused its energies on denying the reality of the abuse and silencing women and their families through shutting down legal avenues," LaBelle said.

An April 2005 memo to the Corrections Department from a state lawyer suggests the abuse problem has continued, LaBelle said. "The failure of the Department to take action against this employee is compelling support that the Department is aware of the sexual misconduct of its officers but allows it to continue," the state lawyer wrote.

In 1999, the state settled a U.S. Justice Department investigation of sexual abuse by promising sweeping changes. At the same time, lawmakers made it more difficult for inmates to pursue abuse claims, in part by eliminating state civil rights protections.

A 2005 Detroit News investigation found that sexual abuse complaints by the women were higher a decade after federal officials first noted Michigan had a problem in 1995.

O'Meara's ruling came a day after the U.S. Supreme Court held that the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which covers Michigan cases, was overly aggressive in throwing out inmate lawsuits.

The Paradox Of Supermax (TIME)

By Jeffery Kluger

There's no such thing as a good day for a prisoner at the highest level of security within the Ohio State Penitentiary, a 504-bed supermax prison in Youngstown, Ohio. Every inmate lives alone in a 7-ft. by 14-ft. cell that resembles nothing so much as a large, concrete closet, equipped with a sink, a toilet, a desk and a molded stool and sleep platform covered by a thin mattress. The solid metal door is outfitted with strips around the sides and bottom, muffling conversation with inmates in adjacent cells. Three times a day, a tray of food is delivered and is eaten alone. The prisoner may spend 23 hours a day in lockdown, emerging to exercise once a day. The lights in the cell never go off, although they may be dimmed a bit at night.

If there's not much to like about the conditions in Youngstown, there's not much to like about the people confined there either. These are the men corrections folks like to call "the worst of the worst," the kind of felons who dealt drugs or led gangs or killed on the outside and continued to do so in prison. For them, maximum security would not be enough--only supermax would do. And say what you will about the draconian environment, it keeps them under control.

But that level of control may be counterproductive. It's possible that the very steps we're taking to keep society safe and such prisoners in check are achieving just the opposite. The U.S. holds about 2 million people under lock and key, and 20,000 of them are confined in the 31 supermaxes operated by the states and the Federal Government. That may represent only 1% of the inmate population, but it's a volatile 1%. Push any punishment too far and mental breakdown--or at least a claim of mental breakdown--is sure to follow. When that happens, a constitutional challenge can't be far behind.

In December, officials in Texas and California conceded that the suicide rates in their prisons are on the rise, with the majority occurring among inmates in solitary. This prompted an outcry against both systems. Lawyers for accused terrorist facilitator Jose Padilla challenged his fitness last month to stand trial, arguing that his 312 years in solitary lockdown at a South Carolina military brig have rendered him unable to assist in his own defense. Around the same time, convicted bomber Eric Rudolph began corresponding with a reporter for a Colorado newspaper, describing his days in his 7-ft. by 12-ft. cell as a form of confinement "designed to inflict as much misery and pain as constitutionally permissible."

But is it constitutionally permissible? And even if it is, is this the kind of open-ended mental-health experiment the government should be running? "We have to ask ourselves why we're doing this," says psychiatrist Stuart Grassian, a former faculty member at the Harvard Medical School and a consultant in criminal cases. "These aren't a bunch of cold, controlled James Cagneys. We're taking criminals who are already unstable and driving them crazy."

The origin of solitary confinement in the U.S. is actually benign. It was the Philadelphia Quakers of the 19th century who dreamed up the idea, establishing a program at the city's Walnut Street prison under which inmates were housed in isolation in the hope of providing them with an opportunity for quiet contemplation during which they would develop insight into their crimes. That's not what has happened.

By the 1830s, evidence began to accumulate that the extended solitude was leading to emotional disintegration, certainly in higher numbers than in communal prisons. In 1890 the U.S. Supreme Court weighed in, deploring solitary confinement for the "semi-fatuous condition" in which it left prisoners. The case was narrow enough that its effect was merely to overturn a single law in a single state, but the court's distaste for the idea of solitary was clear. "The justices saw it as a form of what some people now call no-touch torture," says Alfred W. McCoy, a professor of history at the University of Wisconsin at Madison and author of the book A Question of Torture. "It sends prisoners in one of two directions: catatonia or rage."

Modern science has confirmed this, with electroencephalograms showing that after a few days in solitary, prisoners' brain waves shift toward a pattern characteristic of stupor and delirium. When sensory deprivation is added--as when Padilla was seen being led from his cell wearing a blindfold and sound-deadening earphones--the breakdown is even worse. As long ago as 1952, studies at Montreal's McGill University showed that when researchers eliminate sight, sound and, with the use of padded gloves, tactile stimulation, subjects can descend into a hallucinatory state in as little as 48 hours.

All of this is providing legal traction for constitutional lawyers. The most obvious point of attack is the Eighth Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishment. One suit involving prisoners in a Wisconsin supermax has led to rulings requiring that mentally ill inmates be kept out of such facilities. The state is challenging the decisions, and arguments will be heard in February, but at least six other states have fought similar suits, and all of them have failed. "So far, the prisoners are batting a thousand on the issue of mentally ill inmates," says David Fathi, a senior staff counsel with the A.C.L.U.

Another approach--one that's a bit of a constitutional bank shot--is to rely on the 14th Amendment's requirement of a due-process hearing before the state denies an inmate a "liberty interest," something courts define as a reasonable expectation of a freedom or right. People confined to prison have few liberty interests left and thus have little ground to challenge assignment to a strict level of security. Confinement to supermax, however, may be so qualitatively different that it does require a hearing. That's the argument Ohio inmates made in 2005, and that's the argument a unanimous Supreme Court bought, with Justice Anthony Kennedy writing that supermax isolation imposes such an "atypical and significant hardship" that prisoners must have a formal opportunity to make their case against the assignment before prison officials decide.

The eventual ruling on Padilla's fitness could liberalize things further, and similar suits are sure to follow. Even so, no one thinks the supermax system is going away soon. For all the debate the prisons generate, it may not take much to make them more palatable to civil libertarians. TVs or radios, reading material and clocks, as well as a bit of natural lighting--which provides critical time-of-day orientation--would help stabilize inmates. So would human contact with guards or other prisoners.

"Just how sterile do you have to make that cell?" asks retired prison expert Chase Riveland, who spent his career as an official in the Colorado, Wisconsin and Washington prison systems.

What's more, inmates aren't the only ones hurt by extreme incarceration. People like Padilla or the GuantÃ¡namo Bay detainees are, in theory, resources for information about the extremist groups with which they are putatively associated. "To an overwhelming degree, such people are not threats behind bars. They're opportunities," says Grassian. "We hurt ourselves by destroying their sanity." Closer to home, prisoners serving sentences for more mundane crimes do sometimes get released. Demolish their psyches while they're in prison, and nobody's safer when they get out.

Part of the reason we build prisons at all has always been the retributive urge. Those who do very bad things while they walk among us should lead very hard lives after they have been removed. That makes a lot of emotional sense. Whether it always makes practical sense is something else entirely.

By Tamar Lewin

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

With Michigan's new ban on affirmative action going into effect, and similar ballot initiatives looming in other states, many public universities are scrambling to find race-blind ways to attract more blacks and Hispanics.

At Wayne State University Law School in Detroit, a new admissions policy, without mentioning race, allows officials to consider factors like living on an Indian reservation or in mostly black Detroit, or overcoming discrimination or prejudice.

Others are using many different approaches, like working with mostly minority high schools, using minority students as recruiters, and offering summer prep programs for promising students from struggling high schools. Ohio State University, for example, has started a magnet high school with a focus on math and science, to help prepare potential applicants, and sends educators into poor and low-performing middle and elementary schools to encourage children, and their parents, to start planning for college.

Officials across the country have a sense of urgency about the issue in part because Ward Connerly, the black California businessman behind such initiatives in California and Michigan, is planning a kind of Super Tuesday next fall, with ballot initiatives against racial preferences in several states. He is researching possible campaigns in Arizona, Colorado, Missouri, Nebraska, Nevada, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah and Wyoming, and expects to announce next month which states he has chosen.

Ann Korschgen, vice provost at the University of Missouri, said in a recent interview, "Just this morning, we had a conversation along the line of how we would continue to ensure diversity at our campus if we could not consider race."

The issue is already heating up in Colorado. This month, two Republican representatives in Colorado asked the state to examine the University of Colorado's spending on diversity, after a libertarian group questioned the expenditures.

Mr. Connerly said that a decade ago, when California passed its ban, Proposition 209, he thought the state was ahead of its time, but that now, he believes "the country is poised to make a decision about race, about what its place in American life is going to be — and I really believe the popular vote may be the way to achieve that."

Both defenders and opponents of affirmative action say the lesson of last fall's campaign in Michigan — where Proposition 2, banning race and gender preferences in public education, employment and contracting, passed by 58 percent to 42 percent despite strong opposition from government, business, labor, education and religious leaders — is that such initiatives can succeed almost anywhere.

"Certain things become popular as state initiatives, like the ban on gay marriages, and restrictions on affirmative action could become one of those things," said Terry Hartle, senior vice president for government and public affairs at the American Council on Education.

If so, he said, private universities, with their wide discretion in admissions and financial aid, could have a competitive advantage regarding diversity, reshaping the landscape of higher education.

"Private universities can do whatever they want, consistent with federal law and the Supreme Court," Mr. Hartle said. "Where minority students have a choice between selective public universities that cannot use affirmative action, and selective private universities with strong affirmative action programs, the private universities may seem like the more hospitable places, which would give them an advantage in drawing a diverse student body."

To many educators, that would be a troubling turnabout.

"You'd think public universities are charged with special responsibility for ensuring access, but it could come to be exactly the opposite, if there are a lot of these state initiatives," said Evan Caminker, the dean of the University of Michigan Law School, adding, "in terms of public values, it's a big step backward."

Mr. Connerly is unbothered: If black and Hispanic students are rare at selective universities, the solution is better academic preparation, not special treatment in admissions. "Every individual should have the same opportunity to compete," he said. "I don't worry about the outcomes."

Legally, affirmative action has been a moving target. In 2003, the Supreme Court ruled in cases involving the University of Michigan that race could be one of many factors in admissions, although admissions offices could not give extra points to minority candidates. Many colleges nationwide then moved to "holistic" review, considering applicants' ethnicity, but not awarding a set number of points. In states that could face a ballot initiative campaign, though, that standard could fall.

Nationwide, after 30 years of debate, and litigation, over affirmative action, universities have made strikingly little progress toward racially representative student bodies. And recently, with growing awareness that affluent students are vastly overrepresented at selective colleges, the longstanding focus on racial diversity has been joined by a growing concern about economic diversity.

Currently, four states with highly ranked public universities — California, Florida, Michigan and Washington — forbid racial preferences, either because of ballot propositions or decisions by elected officials.

Texas banned affirmative action for seven years. The University of Texas resumed consideration of race after the 2003 United States Supreme Court ruling. "We need every tool we can get," concluded Dr. Bruce Walker, the university's director of admissions.

In California and Texas, the first two states to ban racial preferences, underrepresented minorities at the flagship universities declined — even though both states, and Florida, adopted plans giving a percentage of top high school graduates guaranteed admission to state universities.

In Texas, students admitted through the Top 10 percent plan swamped the flagship Austin campus. But the plan, now being rethought by the Legislature, never brought in many minority students. Last fall, with both race-conscious admissions and the Top 10 plan, blacks made up an all-time high of 5 percent of the freshman class, and Hispanics 19 percent.

A decade after the California ban, only 2 percent of this year's freshmen at the University of California, Los Angeles, are black: a 30-year low. Hispanic representation at U.C.L.A. has dropped, too. At Berkeley, the number of blacks in the freshman class plunged by half the year after the ban, and the number of Hispanics nearly as much.

Systemwide, blacks make up only 3 percent of U.C. freshmen, although about 7 percent of the state's high school graduates are black. Most top black students choose private institutions over state campuses. Over all, of the top third of all students offered admission to the University of California class of 2005, most enrolled and only 19 percent went instead to selective private colleges. But among blacks in that group, 51 percent chose selective private colleges. Meanwhile, up the coast,

Stanford University is enrolling more underrepresented minority students. Among this year's freshmen, 11 percent are African-American, up from 8 percent in 1995; Hispanic enrollment has risen, too.

The University of Michigan, with other state institutions, tried to win a delay of the ban so it would not hit in the middle of this year's admissions cycle. But the courts rejected this effort, so officials have stopped considering race and gender as factors in admissions, and worry that next year's entering class will be less diverse. Many officials worry that they will lose top minority candidates to selective private universities.

"We know from colleagues in Texas and California that if we can't take race into account, we're at a competitive disadvantage," said Julie Peterson, a spokeswoman for the University of Michigan, where two-thirds of the applicants are from out of state.

Since most of Michigan is overwhelmingly white, said Mary Sue Coleman, the university's president, a plan guaranteeing admission to a percentage of top high school graduates would have little impact, and nothing short of affirmative action will maintain the university's racial diversity.

"Of course, you want to look at family income, and being the first in the family to attend college and those kinds of factors, of course we do that, but it doesn't get us to a racially diverse student body," Dr. Coleman said.

At the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, a program guaranteeing that low-income students can graduate debt-free helped to increase the percentage of blacks in the freshman class to 12 percent, and to increase both economic diversity and the enrollment of underrepresented minority students. Other states have started similar programs.

In Detroit, Wayne State University Law School recently adopted a new admissions policy. Jonathan Weinberg, the professor assigned last year to draft a contingency policy, looked at other states with race-blind admissions and found that instead of race, they look to "a set of broader diversity concerns that go to socioeconomic status."

Last month, the faculty adopted his policy, eliminating any mention of race, but broadening the factors the admissions office may consider. Those include being the first in the family to go to college or graduate school; having overcome substantial obstacles, including prejudice and discrimination; being multilingual; and residence abroad, in Detroit or on an Indian reservation.

Frank Wu, the law school's dean, said Wayne State's effort to comply with the law could bring a legal challenge.

"There's a new fight building," Mr. Wu said, "and that's going to be whether the mere fact that you're striving for diversity means you're somehow trying to get around the ban and find proxies, or pretexts, for race, and that that's impermissible. It's ironic, but in some quarters our effort to adopt a new policy to comply with Prop 2 has been interpreted as an effort to circumvent it."

Roger Clegg, president of the Council for Equal Opportunity, which opposes racial preferences, said policies like Wayne State's do raise questions.

"I have a real problem when schools adopt what on their face are race-neutral criteria, if they are doing so to reach a predetermined racial and ethnic goal," Mr. Clegg said. "Both in law and in common sense, the motivation matters."

At Ohio State University, where admissions are increasingly selective, officials are looking for a long-term answer. "When we saw what was coming down the road, we started looking to other models, but no other model results in as much diversity," said Mabel Freeman, assistant vice president at Ohio State. "The only long-term solution is to do better in the pipeline and make sure all kids get the best education possible, K-12."

ANTITRUST:

Senate Hearing On Airline Mergers Highlights Delta Issues (FCDR)

By Philippa Maister, Fulton County Daily Report

Fulton County (GA) Daily Report, January 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0122284

US Airways' contention that bigger airlines are better for the public got unexpected support Wednesday from a senior official in the U.S. Department of Transportation testifying at a Senate hearing on airline mergers.

Since Sept. 11, the declining health of network carriers has created a growing need to subsidize air service to smaller communities, Andrew B. Steinberg, assistant secretary for aviation and transportation affairs, told the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation -- many of whose members represent largely rural states like Alaska, West Virginia and Minnesota.

"Contrary to what may have been suggested, having fewer, larger network carriers could result in having more services to smaller communities as they try to serve the entire country," Steinberg said.

While US Airways CEO Doug Parker supported Steinberg's statement, Delta Air Lines CEO Gerald Grinstein, who also testified, countered that a merger would only improve service if it involved airlines where there is not a significant amount of overlap, as there is in the Delta-US Airways case.

The Committee's hearing comes as two key deadlines in the first and second weeks of February loom for Delta as it struggles to take control of its future.

The first deadline is Feb. 1, the self-imposed date on which Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways' offer to buy Delta will expire -- unless Parker chooses to extend it. Although some bankruptcy lawyers and financial analysts are questioning its chances for success, a group of creditors holding billions of dollars in claims wants Delta to look at it more closely.

The second deadline is Feb. 7, when the U.S. Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of New York will hold a hearing on Delta's revised disclosure statement -- essentially a prospectus that provides creditors and other interest-holders with the financial information they need to help them decide whether to go along with Delta's reorganization plan.

As the deadlines approach, both sides have stepped up their public relations campaigns. Delta's unions and employees have rallied to their company's cause in displays of support, as have Georgia Sens. Johnny Isakson and Saxby Chambliss. Meanwhile, US Airways has placed ads in two Capitol Hill publications, Roll Call and The Hill, to persuade legislators that its offer, which it valued at $12.7 billion to $15.4 billion, is best for the traveling public and the companies' employees.

In a letter to Parker, Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., raised "serious concerns" about the merger, which he said "could cast a huge shadow over upstate [New York] air service." Schumer demanded answers to questions about how a merger with Delta would affect routes, fares and employees in his state.

The Senate can't block the merger; only the U.S. Justice Department has that authority. Still, it has influence. Schumer claimed credit in his letter for foiling an attempted hostile takeover of Independence Airline by Mesa Airlines in 2003. Schumer said his request that the Department of Justice investigate Mesa's possible anti-competitive behavior caused Mesa to drop its plan.

Paul Burke O'Hearn, a partner in Burr & Forman's Atlanta office, predicted that a bankruptcy court-appointed unsecured creditors' committee is likely to support Delta's stand-alone plan. O'Hearn is a past chairman of the American Bar Association's Subcommittee on Lender Liability and of the State Bar of Georgia's Bankruptcy Section. He is not involved in the Delta bankruptcy case.

According to Delta's revised disclosure statement, unsecured creditors of Delta subsidiary Comair will get stock in the new Delta projected to be worth 76 percent to 100 percent of their claims. Delta's unsecured creditors will get a 62 percent to 78 percent projected recovery of their claims.

"That's a pretty good deal, assuming all the valuations are right," O'Hearn said. He noted that valuations are performed by investment banks and involve sophisticated analysis of business plans.

But O'Hearn acknowledged there are other players who may not support Delta's reorganization plan.

One group that may not is an unofficial committee of unsecured creditors made up largely of hedge funds that want Delta to take another look at US Airways.

The Unofficial Committee of Unsecured Claimholders, formed Dec. 7, is represented by Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison. It includes 18 hedge funds and investment management companies that hold $2.35 billion worth of creditors' claims against Delta and its subsidiaries. On Jan. 10, the group called on Delta to allow US Airways to do due diligence on the merger and to postpone the Feb. 7 disclosure hearing so that the proposal could be fully evaluated.

O'Hearn said hedge funds -- or, as he termed them, "vulture funds" -- buy up stock and debt in troubled companies at significant discounts and can make a 300 percent return on a six-month investment when the claims are settled.

Another player is the federal Pension Benefits Guaranty Corp., which holds $2.2 billion in claims against Delta. O'Hearn said the PBGC may be attracted to the US Airways buyout offer -- but may also be concerned that, if the merged company failed, it could wind up with an even larger number of pension obligations.

Delta's fate could become clearer after the Feb. 7 disclosure hearing. Creditors could object to approval of Delta's disclosure statement, claiming it doesn't accurately value the US Airways offer and the official and unofficial creditors committees could square off.

If approved, the statement will be submitted to a vote of all creditors.

Hatch Urges Caution In Merger (DESERET)

By Suzanne Struglinski, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON — The potential merger of US Airways and Delta Air Lines concerns Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, according to a letter he sent to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales Thursday.

Hatch and Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., urged the Justice Department to "carefully and thoroughly consider the substantial competitive impact of this merger" should it get to the point of being reviewed."

"From what we are able to glean from publicly available information, there appears to be even more overlap between the US Airways and Delta route networks," Hatch and Kohl wrote. "These two airlines are strong domestic competitors in the East and Mountain West. Their merger would appear to result in a significant increase in concentration — especially on routes serving smaller communities — and could adversely affect Delta's hubs, as well as lead to a reduction in capacity and higher overall fares."

Delta has a hub at the Salt Lake City International Airport that some Delta employees fear would close under a merger, although US Airways has said it would do no such thing.

The senators said their letter does not "express a firm position on a potential transaction" but that they felt the need to "underscore our firm expectation that the Department will investigate this or any other merger among airlines of all sizes with all due care and vigor."

Kohl is chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Antitrust, Competition Policy and Consumer Rights where Hatch is the top Republican.

Microsoft Executive Wanted To `Whack' Dell Over Linux (Update6) (BLOOM)

By Bob Van Voris And Dina Bass

Bloomberg, January 26, 2007

Jan. 25 (Bloomberg) -- A Microsoft Corp. executive said he wanted to ``whack" computer maker Dell Inc. over its relationship with Red Hat Inc., the same week a judge ordered the company not to retaliate against sellers of competing software.

In a series of e-mails in November 2002, Microsoft executives discussed how to respond to Dell, then the world's biggest personal computer maker, to discourage its collaboration with Red Hat, the biggest distributor of Linux software. The e- mails came several days after U.S. District Judge Colleen Kollar- Kotelly in Washington approved a consent decree to end the Justice Department's antitrust suit against Microsoft.

``We should whack them, we should make sure they understand our value," said Paul Flessner, then the leader of the division that sells Microsoft server software, in an e-mail that was disclosed in a private antitrust class action case against Microsoft currently on trial in Des Moines, Iowa, state court.

The Iowa suit was filed on behalf of a statewide class of consumers who bought Microsoft products from May 1994 to June 2006. They claim Microsoft, the world's biggest software maker, illegally used its market muscle to hobble competitors and charge inflated prices. The consumers claim $329 million in damages, which may be tripled under Iowa law.

Didn't Retaliate

Kollar-Kotelly's order approving the 2002 decree came at the end of a landmark antitrust lawsuit by the U.S. government, one that had threatened Microsoft with a judicially ordered breakup.

The judge's order prohibited the software giant from retaliating against computer makers by ``altering Microsoft's commercial relations,'' or holding back money from manufacturers who partner with companies that produce competing operating systems.

``What counts at the end of the day is what actually happened,'' said Microsoft spokesman Jack Evans. ``We didn't take any retaliatory action against Dell. In fact, we very clearly increased our investment with Dell.''

Robert Lande, who teaches antitrust law at the University of Baltimore law school, said ``on its face it looks like this is anti-competitive.''

``You're allowed to do almost anything to sell your own product,'' Lande said. ``What you can't do is say if you buy from our competitors, we'll whack you.''

Forwarded Message

One of about a dozen Microsoft executives who received the e-mails forwarded Flessner's message to the company's legal department, according to Microsoft Associate General Counsel Richard Wallis.

Wallis declined to disclose the identity of the e-mail recipient who forwarded the message to the legal department, or advice provided as a result, citing the need to preserve privileged communications between attorney and client.

``If anything, this is evidence that our compliance process worked,'' said Evans, the Microsoft spokesman. Microsoft plans to introduce additional e-mails in the trial to show it took appropriate, legal steps to address its relationship with Dell, he said.

As part of the Iowa case, the consumers are trying to prove that Microsoft, whose Windows operating system runs almost 95 percent of the world's personal computers, abused its monopoly in software markets after it settled the Justice Department case.

Dominant Position

Lawyers for the consumers claim Microsoft used its dominant position to stifle competition from Linux, an open-source operating system. In her opening statement in December, Roxanne Conlin, one of two lead lawyers for the plaintiffs, told jurors she will call Red Hat executive Michael Tiemann to testify.

The e-mails show that ``if Microsoft can leverage its market power to its advantage and to disadvantage a competitor, it will do so,'' said Richard Hagstrom, the other lead consumer lawyer.

The e-mail exchange began with a Nov. 7, 2002, message in which Bill Veghte, Microsoft's vice president for Windows Server, discussed an industry conference he had attended the week before, which included a panel discussion of Linux.

``Each company's position was quite predictably slamming us but the one that really got me animated was Dell,'' wrote Veghte.

A Dell vice president on the panel said his company was the No. 1 Linux distributor among computer makers and that the company was committed to selling even more, according to Veghte.

At the time of the e-mail exchange, Microsoft viewed Linux as one of the top threats to its business software revenue as some customers considered the program a cheaper alternative to Microsoft's Windows server software.

`Job One'

Microsoft Chief Executive Officer Steve Ballmer, in an interview the month before the e-mails were sent, said he had told his sales force that derailing Linux was ``job one.'' To keep some customers from choosing Linux, Microsoft offered free support and price cuts.

``I can disagree with your statement that Dell's behavior won't change,'' Veghte wrote in an e-mail to Microsoft's Flessner. ``If it won't change, then we should just throw in the towel and settle for 50 percent market share at best.''

``I want them to think very, very carefully about when and which forums they decide to push Linux,'' wrote Veghte in another e-mail. ``Today, they do not. When they do, you can bet, behavior will evolve.''

High Court Upholds Extradition (FT)

By Nikki Tait, Law Courts Correspondent

Financial Times, January 26, 2007

Ian Norris, former chief executive of Morgan Crucible, the engineering group, yesterday lost his appeal against extradition to the US over alleged white collar crimes, which could have wide implications for the business community.

The 63-year-old businessman is the first foreign national to be sought byUS authorities on antitrust charges. His case is also the latest high-profile extradition sought by the US under controversial new fast-track arrangements between the UK and US.

Two High Court judges yesterday dismissed his lawyers' arguments that the price-fixing charges Mr Norris faces in the US did not amount to a criminal offence in the UK at the time and could not constitute an "extradition offence".

Instead, they found the common-law offence of conspiracy to defraud could en-compass cartel activity if an element of dishonesty were present. The judges acknowledged that no price-fixing case had been prosecuted as one of dishonesty in England and that it was not until the 2002 Enterprise Act that a statutory criminal cartel offence was introduced.

But they said: "Although previous competition law did not of itself criminalise cartel activity, it does not follow that it was not previously chargeable as conspiracy to defraud where circumstances might have justified and required it."

Mr Norris's lawyers will appeal to the House of Lords. "We continue to believe that the issues raised in this case need to be heard by theUK's highest court," said Alistair Graham, partner at White & Case.

"The question of whether price-fixing can be characterised as the old English common-law offence of conspiracy to defraud is an absolutely critical point of law, not only in this case and, therefore, for future potential extradition requests, but also for UK competition law and UK businesses in general," Mr Graham said.

"Any decision in this matter has significant ramifications for large numbers of UK businessmen and women, who will be potentially exposed to price-fixing charges in relation to the period prior to 2002."

Mr Norris is being sought by the US authorities for his alleged involvement, while at Morgan Crucible, in an international carbon products cartel, as well as on separate obstruction of justice counts. According to the charges, which he denies, the offences occurred be-tween 1989 and May 2000.

A furore erupted last year when three former NatWest bankers were sent to the US to face Enron-related fraud charges.

Yesterday, in an effort to defuse the controversy, Lord Goldsmith, attorney-general, unveiled a protocol for UK and US prosecutors dealing with cross-border cases. It focuses on early liaison and exchange of information.

"The fundamental issue is that British citizens can still be extradited to the US without prima facie evidence of an offence. The government has not addressed the concerns of business that this is unfair treatment," said Richard Lambert, director-general of the Confederation of British Industry.

Northrop Completes Buyout Of Essex Firm (AP)

Northrop Grumman Completes Buyout of Cybersecurity Company Essex Corp. for $580 Million

LOS ANGELES (AP) -- Military contractor Northrop Grumman Corp. said on Thursday it completed a multibillion-dollar buyout of cybersecurity company Essex Corp., a day after federal regulators granted antitrust approval.

The Los Angeles company will acquire all outstanding shares of Essex for $580 million, or $24 per share, including assumed debt.

The purchase price represents a 0.2 percent premium to Essex's Wednesday closing price of $23.95 on the Nasdaq Stock Market. Based on the 21.8 million outstanding shares held by Essex, the deal will close at roughly $522.7 million.

The defense firm announced plans in November to acquire Columbia, Md.-based Essex to expand its defense and intelligence offerings. Essex is a provider of signal, image and information processing and other services.

Essex will operate as a business unit within Northrop Grumman's Mission Systems unit, considered to be one of the more highly classified areas of the defense company.

Earlier this month, industry insiders speculated there could be a delay on the proposed deal, after Northrop announced plans to refile its merger notice with the Federal Trade Commission to extend the 30-day regulatory waiting period and provide further review by antitrust authorities.

Essex shareholders approved the acquisition in December by more than two-thirds of the majority vote.

Shares of Essex gained 2 cents to $23.99 in aftermarket trading, after gaining 2 cents to close at $23.97 on the Nasdaq. Northrop gained 1 cent to $71.31 in aftermarket trading, after dropping 50 cents to finish at $71.30 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Siemens Touts Purchase Of Texas Company (AP)

Siemens Says Texas Company Fills Key Hole in Its Lineup

DALLAS (AP) -- The leader of UGS Corp. says his company had to grow to survive in the fast-changing business of making software to manage products through their life cycle -- and that being acquired by conglomerate Siemens AG accomplishes the same goal.

"It takes us from being a small player with limited resources to being a major player," said Tony Affuso, the chairman and chief executive of UGS.

Late Wednesday, Siemens announced it would buy UGS from private equity firms Bain Capital, Silver Lake Partners and Warburg Pincus for $3.5 million, including debt that officials for Siemens and UGS put at about $1.4 billion.

Siemens will run UGS as part of its automation and drives group, which is based in Nuremberg, Germany, and managed by Helmut Gierse.

In a phone interview, Gierse said the software company would fit nicely with Siemens' factory-automation business, one of the German conglomerate's biggest and most profitable units.

"It opens up a fascinating possibility for us as the key automation supplier in the world, and UGS will widen our footprint in the United States," he said.

UGS is in the still-young business of PLM, or product lifestyle management. Its customers include automakers as well as aerospace and defense companies in the United States and Europe.

Although UGS lost $7.4 million in the Sept. 30 quarter, and $22 million in 2005, the company has reported 13 straight quarters of year-over-year sales growth and annual revenue of more than $1.1 billion.

Affuso said the company took on more than $1 billion in debt when Electronic Data Systems Corp. sold it to the private equity firms for $2.05 billion in 2004, and added more to buy back preferred shares.

Since then, he said, the company has built up its sales organization and invested in products and marketing, he said. Executives kept reviewing a checklist for taking the company public, but never got close to an IPO, he said.

Gierse said the negotiations to buy UGS took less than six months. He said Siemens hopes to complete the purchase before midyear. The deal will require approval of regulators in the United States and Europe, but Gierse said there was virtually no overlapping business and he didn't expect antitrust concerns to arise.

For Siemens, the UGS purchase is part of a restructuring strategy that has included several large acquisitions. The company is trying to shed an unprofitable telecommunications equipment division while buying companies in other lines, including medical diagnostics and water treatment.

The Munich-based conglomerate is also dealing with regulatory problems and investigations. On Wednesday, European Union regulators ordered Siemens to pay $517 million for helping fix prices for heavy equipment used by power utilities. Authorities are also investigating suspected bribes to win contracts.

On Thursday, Siemens reported that its profit in the Dec. 31 quarter fell 16 percent because of the price-fixing fine, but would otherwise have jumped 51 percent, to $2.1 billion.

U.S.-traded shares of Siemens rose $4.90, or 4.9 percent, to close at $105.09 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Siemens Profit Falls 17%, Hit By Price-Fixing Fine (WSJ)

By Joon Knapen

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

MUNICH -- Siemens AG posted a 17% decline in fiscal first-quarter net profit because of a European Union fine for price fixing, though its operating profit improved after a turnaround at its information-technology unit.

Net profit in the three months ended Dec. 31 fell to €739 million ($957.8 million) from €886 million a year earlier, weighed down by a €423 million charge tied to the EU fine.

Sales rose 6.1% to €19.07 billion from €17.98 billion, while new orders were up 3.9% to €24.58 billion. Sales and new orders were boosted by double-digit percentage growth in power generation and transmission and automation and drives.

The company posted a 51% rise in operating profit, which excludes expenses such as the EU fine.

The quarterly results were disclosed just hours after the German engineering and technology giant announced a sweeping portfolio revamp: It agreed to buy U.S. software firm UGS Corp. for $3.5 billion, while planning to sell a minority stake in its Siemens VDO Automotive car-parts division through an initial public offering.

The information-technology-services unit, SBS, posted profit of €24 million, compared with a loss of €232 million, while earnings climbed at other units, such as medical equipment and transportation systems.

Chief Executive Officer Klaus Kleinfeld has disposed of the loss-plagued cellphone arm, unveiled job cuts and made several big purchases since taking the helm in early 2005. He also vowed to bring profit margins in line with peers such as General Electric Co. by April.

Mr. Kleinfeld still has his work cut out to raise the profitability of four of the conglomerate's 10 divisions in the current quarter in order to meet that April deadline.

Meanwhile, Siemens has been haunted by several issues, with the latest blow coming Wednesday from a €423 million penalty imposed by the European Commission for price fixing among providers of gas-insulated electric-power switchgear. The company also is a target of investigations by Munich prosecutors in a wide-ranging bribery probe, with several former executive-board members of the company among the suspects.

"In terms of underlying performance of our business, the first quarter got the fiscal year off to a strong start," Mr. Kleinfeld said, adding that Siemens remains committed to achieving the divisional profit margin targets by April.

Meanwhile, the CEO continues to overhaul Siemens's industrial holdings that make items including steam turbines, high-speed trains and light bulbs, in a drive to boost the company's profitability.It is in the process of transferring its telecommunications equipment unit into a joint venture with Nokia Corp., as the initial starting date was delayed due to the bribery investigations. Mr. Kleinfeld yesterday said that he still expects the deal to be completed in the current quarter.

Kroes: EU Probe Has Uncovered Problems (AP)

EU Official Says Probe Into World Body's Banking Sector Has Uncovered Antitrust Problems

DAVOS, Switzerland (AP) -- A yearlong investigation into the European Union's banking sector has uncovered antitrust problems, according to the bloc's Antitrust Commissioner, Neelie Kroes.

The European Commission, the EU's executive arm, is slated to publish its final report on the banking probe on Jan. 31.

Kroes told Dow Jones Newswires on the sidelines of the World Economic Forum's annual meeting that "some segments of the market are anticompetitive."

"I'm not against profit, but there are some cases where there are firms making too much," she said, declining to elaborate.

People familiar with the study say individual companies won't face antitrust charges at this point, but the report will show credit card companies such as Visa International and MasterCard Inc. and the retail banks that issue the cards are charging too much for their services.

The commission's efforts to lower credit and bank-card fees are aimed at integrating the EU's banking sector, which remains fragmented despite the advent of the euro.

By 2010, the commission hopes to have a framework to allow businesses and customers to make cross-border electronic payments as easily and at the same cost as within their own country.

Some electronic-payment companies are monopolies, a situation the commission's report is expected to criticize in broad strokes. For instance, Belgium's Banksys -- formed as a partnership of the country's largest retail banks and now owned by French information technology company Atos Origin SA -- handles all the country's electronic payments. Banksys issues the card readers that stores and restaurants use to process credit and bank-card payments and also controls the country's automated teller machines.

Since taking office in November 2004, Kroes has initiated two main investigations: a wide-ranging look at the financial-sector and a similar study of Europe's energy market.

Earlier this month, Kroes' final report on the energy-sector probe showed the EU's gas and electricity prices are unreasonably high because of limited cross-border integration and overly dominant former state-owned monopolies.

The report didn't name-and-shame monopolies, but some sections showing market shares in specific countries pointed to companies such as Electricite de France SA and Germany's E.On AG.

When the report was published, Kroes said she is prepared to order the breakup of some monopolies if they don't change their business practices.

Cardinal, Refocusing On Core, Sells A Unit (WSJ)

By Heather Won Tesoriero

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

Reversing a decade-long campaign of diversification, Cardinal Health Inc. is selling its drug manufacturing and packaging division for $3.3 billion to the private-equity powerhouse Blackstone Group.

The deal is the latest move by Cardinal's new chief executive, R. Kerry Clark, to refocus the Dublin, Ohio, company on its core business of drug distribution, and on products to promote the safe use of drugs and to control medication dispensing.

• The News: Drug distributor Cardinal Health will sell its drug manufacturing and packaging unit to Blackstone Group for $3.3 billion.

• Why: The unit, roughly 10 years old, had underperformed in recent years.

"We're looking at all our businesses and making sure they have a strategic fit," Jeff Henderson, Cardinal's chief financial officer, said in an interview. The unit "didn't fit with the direction we're headed."

The divestiture is a marked departure from the path charted by Mr. Clark's predecessor, Robert Walter, who was the architect of Cardinal's growth through the acquisition of smaller drug distributors and, ultimately, companies that provide services such as manufacturing and packaging to pharmaceutical makers.

Separately, the company disclosed that Mr. Walter, who remains executive chairman of Cardinal's board, and four other former officers and employees received Wells notices from the Securities and Exchange Commission, stemming from a years-old accounting probe. A Wells notice indicates that the SEC staff intends to recommend action against the recipient.

Cardinal spokesman Jim Mazzola said that the notice "pertains to an individual and not the company. It doesn't impact settlement discussions with the SEC." Mr. Mazzola said Mr. Walter wasn't available for comment.

As a result of the Blackstone deal, expected to close by June, the drug distributor would shed a unit that aimed to be a one-stop outsourcing center for drug makers. The unit contracted with pharmaceutical companies to manufacture a host of prescription and over-the-counter products, including Advil Liqui-Gels for Wyeth and Tamiflu for Roche Holding AG. Cardinal even built a showroom in New Jersey, home to many major drug manufacturers, to entice companies to use its services.

But the business proved disappointing for Cardinal. It "had become a distraction for them," said Larry Marsh, a drug-distribution analyst with Lehman Brothers. "It wasn't really generating the kinds of returns that they wanted," he said. Mr. Marsh said that based on the unit's acquisitions and capital spending costs over the years, he doesn't think the company profited much from the sale. However, based on depreciating the assets and some write-offs, its tax basis allows for a slight gain, which Cardinal noted.

Drug distributors have been roiled by shrinking margins and consolidation in recent years. Roughly 90% of all drugs in the U.S. are distributed by three companies. Through the 1980s and early part of the 1990s, Cardinal and rivals McKesson Corp. and AmerisourceBergen Corp. grew robustly through acquisitions and business expansion. Of the three, Cardinal took the most divergent path by entering into medical technology and contract manufacturing with the goal that such services would give it a competitive edge in attracting and keeping its drug distribution business. Products from Cardinal units include medical-device software and computerized medicine cabinets that help hospitals control and monitor drug inventory.

Now, all of the so-called "Big Three" are reassessing their businesses and making efforts to return to their roots. McKesson announced plans to sell its medical-supply business later this year. And AmerisourceBergen has beefed up its drug distribution business in Canada.

Cardinal announced its intention to sell its manufacturing arm in November. Morgan Stanley was slated to handle an auction of the unit, but Blackstone stepped in and offered $3.3 billion, which was higher than some analysts' estimated price tag of $2.1 billion to $3 billion.

Blackstone Senior Managing Director Chinh Chu said the Cardinal unit was very attractive and could see robust sales with "more capital to accelerate growth and pursue acquisitions."

Also yesterday, Cardinal reported earnings for its fiscal second quarter. For the quarter ended Dec. 31, revenue increased 13% to $21.8 billion and earnings from continuing operations rose 10% to $316 million, or 77 cents a share.

Finally, the company also announced an agreement to acquire SpecialtyScripts Pharmacy to broaden its specialty pharmaceutical service offerings for pharmaceutical manufacturers. Terms weren't disclosed.

Cardinal shares rose 3.4%, or $2.39, to $72.42 in New York Stock Exchange 4 p.m. composite trading.

Blackstone Raises Ante In Battle For Equity Office (NYT)

By Terry Pristin

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

The biggest leveraged buyout ever got bigger yesterday.

The Blackstone Group, a private equity firm, increased its bid for Equity Office Properties to $54 a share. Equity Office is the nation's largest office landlord, with nearly 600 buildings across the country.

The new offer represents an 11 percent premium over the price that Equity Office and Blackstone had agreed on in November when they announced the deal. With the assumption of $15.3 billion in debt, the deal would have a value of $38.3 billion, Equity Office said in yesterday's announcement.

In exchange for raising its bid, Blackstone got Equity Office to increase the breakup fee — the amount it would receive if its bid failed — to $500 million, from $200 million.

Last week, a group of real estate investors led by Vornado Realty Trust made an informal bid of $52 a share in cash and stock for Equity Office, a real estate investment trust founded by the Chicago real estate magnate Samuel Zell. Equity Office has since allowed the Vornado team access to its books and has set a deadline of next Wednesday for a formal offer.

A spokeswoman for Vornado, a REIT with a diversified portfolio that includes office buildings, retail space and showrooms, said yesterday that the company would respond to the latest offer "at the appropriate time."

Shares of Equity Office rose 8 cents, to $54.90, and Vornado shares rose $1.11, to $125.76.

Blackstone, controlled by Stephen A. Schwarzman, bought interests in more than $28 billion worth of real estate from 2001 to 2006, 38 percent more than next largest buyer, according Dan Fasulo, director of market analysis for Real Capital Analytics, a New York investment firm.

Blackstone says its offer has advantages over the Vornado bid aside from price. It is all cash, and could be completed three days after a vote by Equity Office shareholders, set for Feb. 5. If Vornado prevailed, a deal might need approval of its shareholders, analysts said.

Kathy Shanley, a corporate bond analyst, for Gimme Credit, an independent research company in Chicago, said the new offer had shifted the odds in Blackstone's favor. "They have all their financing locked up, they could close quicker, and there's a lot less uncertainty," she said.

But, she added: "Vornado has said they don't anticipate any problems, and they have some heavy hitters on their side. At some level, it all depends on who blinks first."

Barry Vinocur, the editor of REIT Wrap, a daily newsletter about real estate investment trusts, said Vornado and its partners in the deal, the Starwood Capital Group and Walton Street Capital, two real estate investment funds, were almost certain to raise their bid.

Vornado has said that if its bid is successful, it will retain the Equity Office buildings on the East and West Coasts, including the Verizon building at 42nd Street and the Avenue of the Americas in the red-hot Midtown Manhattan market.

Starwood — whose chief executive, Barry S. Sternlicht, founded the Starwood Hotel and Resorts chain — and Walton Street Capital would take Equity Office buildings in markets like Miami, San Jose and Seattle, where real estate values are expected to rise in the next couple of years. Neil G. Bluhm, the president of JMB Realty, a Chicago development company, is a co-founder of Walton Street.

Mr. Vinocur said Mr. Zell and his investment bankers had done a "masterful" job of steering the acquisition process by setting the breakup fee low enough so that other bidders would enter the contest.

"This is chess at its highest level," he said.

Fox Subpoenas YouTube Over Pirated TV Shows (WSJ)

By Nicole Urbanowicz

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

News Corp.'s Twentieth Century Fox has subpoenaed Google Inc.'s YouTube video-sharing site to unveil the identity of a user who uploaded pirated copies of recent episodes of "24" and "The Simpsons."

The subpoena filed Jan. 18 in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California requests that YouTube disclose information sufficient to identify the subscriber so that Fox can stop the infringing immediately.

According to the subpoena's declaration made by Jane Sunderland, vice president of content protection for Twentieth Century Fox, the four-episode season premiere of "24" appeared on the site ahead of its TV broadcast, and 12 episodes of the Simpsons were being distributed on the site by a subscriber identified as "ECOtotal."

On Jan. 8, Fox said it officially notified YouTube about the infringed episodes and requested immediate removal or to disable access to the service. News about the subpoena filed surfaced on the blog, Google Watch.

The same group of episodes were uploaded under the username of Jorge Romero on the video site LiveDigital, to which Fox also issued a subpoena.

A spokesman for LiveDigital said the material was taken down right away and LiveDigital intends to comply with the subpoena immediately.

A recent YouTube search revealed only a prequel to Season 6 of "24" and several clips from The Simpsons episodes.

This isn't the first time the Twentieth Century Fox has had a piracy issue involving YouTube; a young user was identified in a case in which a Family Guy episode was posted on YouTube ahead of its premiere. However, in this recent case, Fox noted in the subpoena it has been unable to discover through its own investigation the identity of the subscriber.

The issue of piracy has sparked concern among entertainment companies and music and video-sharing sites, along with legal implications of whether the sharing sites should be financially accountable.

Excluding damages related to piracy of TV episodes, the Motion Picture Association estimates that major global movie studios lost about $2.3 billion to Internet piracy in 2005.

It is unknown whether YouTube has responded to the subpoena at this point and calls to YouTube weren't immediately returned.

Energy Mandates Fuel A Rift (WSJ)

By JOHN J. FIALKA

Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Raising the federal mandate for using renewable and alternative energy sources may mean bigger government incentives for efforts to turn coal into diesel-engine fuel. But President Bush's push for domestic alternatives to imported oil has ignited a battle between coal interests and environmentalists -- and underscored tension between the goals of increasing U.S. energy security and curbing global warming.

Greater use of liquid fuels made from coal, the nation's most plentiful energy source, would reduce reliance on imported oil. But making the liquid fuels and burning them in automobile engines would release additional carbon dioxide, a greenhouse gas thought to accelerate climate change, environmentalists say.

The president's proposal, described in his State of the Union address, would require blenders of gasoline to include 35 billion gallons of renewable and alternative fuels by 2017. The 2005 energy law includes incentives for renewable fuels, such as ethanol, but not for alternatives, such as coal-based fuel.

James Connaughton, who heads the White House Council on Environmental Quality, says the president's proposal is designed "to create an opportunity for a variety of other approaches," which, he said, could include such fuels as methanol and diesel oil made from coal. The goal, he says, is to create a technological horse race that will make it easier for promising ideas for alternative fuel to find investors. Currently, there are no commercial-size coal-liquefaction plants in the U.S.

While administration officials have assured coal-industry lobbyists that coal-to-liquid fuels are embraced in the president's proposal, Mr. Bush has kept the focus on more environmentally popular options, such as corn-based ethanol and ethanol produced from farm wastes, including corn stalks. But even before Mr. Bush's speech, leaders of 11 environmental groups wrote lawmakers last week that they would oppose "any effort to support coal-based transportation fuels."

"The more you scratch this, the dirtier it gets," says Anna Aurilio, director of the Washington office of the U.S. Public Interest Research Group. She worries that oil made from abundant shale formations in Colorado and Utah might also get support. Environmentalists are backed by the ethanol industry, which doesn't want the coal industry muscling in on a fuel mandate that ethanol producers now have to themselves.

The divergence over the fuel mandate opens up gaps that some politicians may find difficult to straddle. Sen. Barack Obama, an Illinois Democrat and White House hopeful, is a sponsor of the Coal-to-Liquid Fuel Promotion Act, which provides more tax incentives and federal loan guarantees for companies interested in making coal-based fuels. Mr. Obama also supports ethanol subsidies. He has said that the nation's continued use of fossil fuels such as coal is "condemning future generations to global catastrophe" posed by climate change.

Tommy Vietor, a spokesman for the senator, says Mr. Obama's "vision" is that "any coal-to-liquids production would have to operate within the framework of a bipartisan Senate proposal to reduce greenhouse-gas emissions across all major sectors of the U.S. economy."

Rep. Rick Boucher, a Virginia Democrat who is chairman of the subcommittee that will put together the package of fuel incentives, says "I think coal-to-liquids should be a part of the mix of alternatives going forward." Mr. Boucher, who represents a coal-mining area, says that a process of deriving diesel oil from coal was used by both Germany and Japan during World War II to make up for shortages of imported oil, and may be the most proven alternative to gasoline.

Coal companies say that problems for makers of ethanol-based fuels render coal-based fuels more competitive. They see an annual production ceiling on corn-based ethanol of about 15 billion gallons annually; above that point, food experts say, demand for corn will raise food and meat prices to unacceptable levels. Coal-industry spokesmen also say that the technology to make ethanol from farm wastes, called cellulosic ethanol, hasn't been proven commercially.

Vic Svec, a senior vice president for Peabody Energy Corp., the nation's largest coal producer, says the company already is scouting for sites to build a coal-to-liquid plants "We are very encouraged by the bipartisan support that's been expressed on this, from President Bush to Senator Obama," says Mr. Svec, who notes that governors and officials from 16 Southern states also support new incentives for coal-based liquids.

Bob Dinneen, president of the Renewable Fuels Association, which represents ethanol manufacturers, says his group will fight to keep such alternative fuels out of any new federal mandate for renewable fuels. "Doing this ecumenical approach of all alternative fuels, I think, will just confuse the investment community," he says.

It isn't clear who will win the competition to produce new domestic fuels. Ethanol-industry experts predict that at least two companies will commit to building cellulosic ethanol plants this year. But DKRW Energy LLC, of Houston, already has the permits and partners for a plant that makes diesel oil from coal that could begin production by 2010.

Robert Kelley, DKRW's chairman, says the facility will be built near Medicine Bow, Wyo., and will produce 13,000 barrels a day. DKRW has two partners in the project, Arch Coal Inc., which owns a nearby mine, and Sinclair Oil Corp., which will market the diesel fuel. Mr. Kelley says the diesel oil produced won't harm the environment because the production turns the coal into a gas, from which carbon dioxide will be removed and sold to oil companies. And the oil companies will inject the carbon dioxide generated in the process back into the ground to produce more oil.

David Hawkins, a climate-change expert for the Natural Resources Defense Council, says the diesel fuel still contains carbon dioxide, which will be released into the air when it is burned in the engines of cars and trucks. "This issue is the classic example of why you need to have an integrated policy on both global warming and energy," he says.

ANTICIPATING Tuesday's State of the Union speech, Al Hubbard, President Bush's national economic adviser, spoke of "headlines above the fold that will knock your socks off in terms of our commitment to energy independence." The address that Mr. Bush delivered certainly was bold. But by choosing energy independence as his main policy target, Mr. Bush missed opportunities to improve energy security and to combat climate change.

The president was on firmest ground with his call for stricter fuel economy standards. His administration has already increased the standard for light trucks by executive order, but it lacks the authority to do the same for cars; he has asked Congress to step forward. The standards that the president supports are weaker than they could be because they aim to improve the fuel efficiency of each category of car rather than also prodding manufacturers to build smaller cars in greater numbers. Still, Mr. Bush called for an improvement of 4 percent per year in the miles-per-gallon rating of new vehicles. If enacted without loopholes, this would reduce the nation's vulnerability to oil shocks and slow global warming.

Mr. Bush also used his speech to propose a shift away from gasoline toward alternative fuels. The nation's cars and trucks already burn about 4 billion gallons of non-gasoline fuel per year, and current law requires fuel blenders to boost that quantity to 7.5 billion gallons by 2012, which they will do by stepping up the use of corn-derived ethanol. This replacement of oil with corn ethanol reduces oil imports but cuts carbon emissions only slightly. Mr. Bush now proposes to shoot for fully 35 billion gallons of alternative fuel to be used annually by 2017. Where could this extra fuel come from?

Corn-based ethanol can't provide more than 15 billion gallons to fulfill the mandate, since there's a limit to the land available to plant corn, and livestock farmers are already complaining that the price of corn feed has been driven up by the ethanol mandate. In an ideal world, the other 20 billion gallons of alternative fuel might come from ethanol distilled from switch grass and other plant material; this "cellulosic" ethanol has the potential to cut carbon emissions far more substantially than the corn-based variety. But cellulosic ethanol remains an unproven technology. Unless that changes, Mr. Bush's alternative fuel standard could open the door to oil derived from coal -- an option that's known to work but that would be far worse for global warming than burning traditional gasoline.

The president's other energy proposal was to double the size of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve, which insures against the risk of an oil supply disruption. This is where the focus on energy independence obscures true energy security. In the face of the danger of oil price shocks, what matters is not the size of oil reserves in the United States but the size of such reserves globally. U.S. energy security depends, for example, on whether India has a reserve that it could tap in the event of a sudden shortage: If it doesn't, India will respond to a shortage by buying more oil on world markets, forcing up global oil prices and hitting motorists on the Beltway. Mr. Bush's unilateral solution -- build a bigger oil reserve at home -- is hugely expensive and less likely to be effective than an effort to energize existing diplomacy aimed at bringing the Indians and Chinese into the system of strategic oil reserves coordinated by the International Energy Agency.

Congress should embrace Mr. Bush's call for higher fuel efficiency standards and treat his other ideas cautiously. In particular, it should not use his alternative-fuel target as an excuse to throw yet more subsidies at corn-based ethanol -- a policy that farm-state members will find tempting as they write this year's farm bill. Instead, Congress should press ahead with legislation aimed squarely at slowing climate change. That, not independence, should be the top priority for energy policy.

Column: Energy Independence? (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

Washington Post, January 26, 2007

Is there anything more depressing than yet another promise of energy independence in yet another State of the Union address? By my count, 24 of the 34 State of the Union addresses since the oil embargo of 1973 have proposed solutions to our energy problem.

The result? In 1973 we imported 34.8 percent of our oil. Today we import 60.3 percent.

And what does this president propose? Another great technological fix. For Jimmy Carter, it was the magic of synfuels. For George Bush, it's the wonders of ethanol. Our fuel will grow on trees. Well, stalks, with even fancier higher-tech variants to come from cellulose and other (literal) rubbish.

It is very American to believe that chemists are going to discover the cure for geopolitical weakness. It is even more American to imagine that it can be done painlessly. Ethanol for everyone. Farmers get a huge cash crop. Consumers get more supply. And the country ends up more secure.

This is nonsense. As my colleague Robert J. Samuelson demonstrated this week, biofuels will barely keep up with the increase in gasoline demand over time. They are a huge government bet with goals and mandates and subsidies that will not cure our oil dependence or even make a significant dent in it.

Even worse, the happy talk displaces any discussion about here-and-now measures that would have a rapid and revolutionary effect on oil consumption and dependence. No one talks about them because they have unhidden costs. Politicians hate unhidden costs.

There are three serious things we can do now: Tax gas. Drill in the Arctic. Go nuclear.

First, tax gas. The president ostentatiously rolled out his 20-in-10 plan: reducing gasoline consumption by 20 percent in 10 years. This with Rube Goldberg regulation -- fuel-efficiency standards, artificially mandated levels of "renewable and alternative fuels in 2017" and various bribes (er, incentives) for government-favored technologies -- of the kind we have been trying for three decades.

Good grief. I can give you 20-in-2: Tax gas to $4 a gallon. With oil prices having fallen to $55 a barrel, now is the time. The effect of a gas-tax hike will be seen in less than two years, and you don't even have to go back to the 1970s and the subsequent radical reduction in consumption to see how. Just look at last summer. Gas prices spike to $3 -- with the premium going to Vladimir Putin, Hugo ChÃ¡vez and assorted sheiks rather than the U.S. Treasury -- and, presto, SUV sales plunge, the Prius is cool and car ads once again begin featuring miles-per-gallon ratings.

No regulator, no fuel-efficiency standards, no presidential exhortations, no grand experiments with switch grass. Raise the price, and people change their habits. It's the essence of capitalism.

Second, immediate drilling to recover oil that is under U.S. control, namely in the Arctic and on the outer continental shelf. No one pretends that this fixes everything. But a million barrels a day from the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge is 5 percent of our consumption. In tight markets, that makes a crucial difference.

We will always need some oil. And the more of it that is ours, the better. It is tautological that nothing more directly reduces dependence on foreign oil than substituting domestic for foreign production. Yet ANWR is now so politically dead that the president did not even mention it in the State of the Union or in his energy address the next day.

He did bring up, to enthusiastic congressional applause, global warming. No one has a remotely good idea about how to make any difference in global warming without enlisting China and India, and without destroying the carbon-based Western economy. The obvious first step, however, is an extremely powerful source of energy that produces not an ounce of carbon dioxide: nuclear.

What about nuclear waste? Well, coal produces toxic pollutants, as does oil. Both produce carbon dioxide that we are told is going to end civilization as we know it. These wastes are widely dispersed and almost impossible to recover once they get thrown into the atmosphere.

Nukes produce waste as well, but it comes out concentrated -- very toxic and lasting nearly forever. But because it is packed into a small, manageable volume, it is more controllable. And it doesn't pollute the atmosphere. At all.

There is no free lunch. Producing energy is going to produce waste. You pick your poison, and you find a way to manage it. Want to do something about global warming? How many global warming activists are willing to say the word nuclear?

So much easier to say ethanol. That it will do farcically little is beside the point. Our debates about oil consumption, energy dependence and global warming are not meant to be serious. They are meant for show.

Potomac Watch If The Cap Fits (WSJ)

By Kimberley A. Strassel

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

Washington this week officially welcomed the newest industry on the hunt for financial and regulatory favors. Big CarbonCap may have the same dollar-sign agenda as Big Oil or Big Pharma, but don't expect Nancy Pelosi to admit to it.

Democrats want to flog the global warming theme through 2008 and they'll take what help they can get, even if it means cozying up to executives whose goal is to enrich their firms. Right now, the corporate giants calling for a mandatory carbon cap serve too useful a political purpose for anyone to delve into their baser motives.

The Climate Action Partnership, a group of 10 major companies that made headlines this week with its call for a national limit on carbon dioxide emissions, would surely feign shock at such an accusation. After all, their plea was carefully timed to coincide with President Bush's State of the Union capitulation on global warming, and it had the desired PR effect. The media dutifully declared that "even" business now recognized the climate threat. Sen. Barbara Boxer, who begins marathon hearings on warming next week, lauded the corporate angels for thinking of the "common good."

There was a time when the financial press understood that companies exist to make money. And it happens that the cap-and-trade climate program these 10 jolly green giants are now calling for is a regulatory device designed to financially reward companies that reduce CO_2 emissions, and punish those that don't.

Four of the affiliates -- Duke, PG&E, FPL and PNM Resources -- are utilities that have made big bets on wind, hydroelectric and nuclear power. So a Kyoto program would reward them for simply enacting their business plan, and simultaneously sock it to their competitors. Duke also owns Cinergy, which relies heavily on dirty, CO_2-emitting coal plants. But Cinergy will soon have to replace those plants with cleaner equipment. Under a Kyoto, it'll get paid for its trouble.

NOTE

We reintroduce today the weekly Potomac Watch column from Washington. It will appear on Fridays and be written by Kimberley Strassel, a member of the Journal editorial board. Ms. Strassel joined the Journal in 1994 and has worked as a reporter in Europe and as an editor and editorial writer in New York.

DuPont has been plunging into biofuels, the use of which would soar under a cap. Somebody has to cobble together all these complex trading deals, so say hello to Lehman Brothers. Caterpillar has invested heavily in new engines that generate "clean energy." British Petroleum is mostly doing public penance for its dirty oil habit, but also gets a plug for its own biofuels venture.

Finally, there's General Electric, whose CEO Jeffrey Immelt these days spends as much time in Washington as Connecticut. GE makes all the solar equipment and wind turbines (at $2 million a pop) that utilities would have to buy under a climate regime. GE's revenue from environmental products long ago passed the $10 billion mark, and it doesn't take much "ecomagination" to see why Mr. Immelt is leading the pack of climate profiteers.

CEOs are quick learners, and even those who would get smacked by a carbon cap are now devising ways to make warming work to their political advantage. The "most creative" prize goes to steel giant Nucor. Steven Rowlan, the company's environmental director, doesn't want carbon caps in the U.S. -- oh, no. The smarter answer, he explains, would be for the U.S. to impose trade restrictions on foreign firms that aren't environmentally clean. Global warming as foil for trade protectionism: Chuck Schumer's dream.

What makes this lobby worse than the usual K-Street crowd is that it offers no upside. At least when Big Pharma self-interestedly asks for fewer regulations, the economy benefits. There's nothing capitalist about lobbying for a program that foists its debilitating costs on taxpayers and consumers while redistributing the wealth to a few corporate players.

This is what comes from Washington steadily backstepping energy policy into the interventionist 1970s, picking winners and losers. In ethanol, in biodiesel, in wind farms, success isn't a function of supply or demand. The champs are the ones that coax out of Washington the best subsidies and regulations. Global warming is simply the biggest trough yet.

Both Republicans and Democrats understand this debate is increasingly about home-state economics, even as they publicly joust about environmental rights or wrongs. The softening Republican stance on a mandatory program is one result. New Mexico's Pete Domenici appeared to undergo an epiphany about global warming in 2005, voting for a Senate resolution supporting caps. The switch might have more to do with remembering that his state is nuclear-power central, and will win big under a new program. Just ask his fellow New Mexican, Jeff Bingaman, who introduced the resolution.

Economic interests also motivate those Democrats who won't play nice. The senators who have voted against previous bills represent those industries that will suffer most under Mr. Immelt's agenda. Louisiana's Mary Landrieu (oil); Montana's Max Baucus (coal); West Virginia's Robert Byrd (ditto). House Energy & Commerce Chair John Dingell remains a skeptic, since the last thing his Michigan auto makers need is yet another reason for people to not buy their cars.

Which is fine with Ms. Pelosi. The Democratic leadership ran out of the winner's circle last November promising to tackle climate. And much was made this week of Madam Speaker's decision to wrest control of the debate away from Mr. Dingell's purview, handing it instead to a new "select" committee on climate change.

But read the fine print. The new vaunted committee will have no legislative authority, but exists solely to hold hearings and to "communicate with the American people." Ms. Pelosi and Harry Reid want to talk about this issue . . . and talk, and talk and talk. But not necessarily anything more.

That's because Democrats want global warming as an issue through 2008. With Al Gore getting his Oscar nod, they've got a "problem" that captures the public imagination, as well as an endless supply of cash from thrilled environmental groups. No need to spoil it with a solution. And a Democratic president in 2009 would be more open to any ultimate legislation.

Best yet, they've got the "support" of the business community, or at least the savvier elements of it. Welcome, Big CarbonCap; we're likely to be hearing a lot from you.

New Dem Leader Challenges GOP Over Religion (POL)

By Mike Allen

Many of the models displayed at the Washington Auto Show have brought couples together over the years. Did it work for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and Energy and Commerce Chairman John Dingell, D-Mich.?

The Politico heard differing accounts of the success of the auto date and a subsequent meeting at Pelosi's office in diffusing an escalating battle over the select committee on climate change. (Pelosi wants to create it. Dingell opposes it on the grounds that it would impinge on his committee's jurisdiction.)

A Democratic aide close to Pelosi suggested that the meeting, which also included Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., had been a turning point: "We no longer anticipate a floor battle," the aide said.

But Dingell wasn't so sure. In a memo to his committee members this afternoon, he noted progress in diffusing the dispute:"I am pleased to report that the Speaker agreed to work closely with us when drafting the resolution to create the Select Committee …we will continue working in good faith to find a solution that will satisfy the concerns of our Members while preserving the overall objectives of the Speaker. I am confident this is possible."

But, he added, he's still keeping his firepower at the ready: "If we are unable to satisfy the concerns of this Committee, however, I reserve all options available under the Rules of the House and will request a caucus of the Democratic Members of the Committee to weigh those carefully." Translation: Nancy, I reserve the right to make this ugly for you.

Still, it's unclear whether Dingell has the muscle to win this one on the floor. He'll have some help from Republicans eager to deliver a loss to Pelosi, but a Republican leadership aide conceded that "25 to 35" moderate Republicans likely would break ranks and side with her. So Dingell can only count on around 170 Republican votes, which is a long way from 218 even if every one of the 31 Democratic members of the Energy and Commerce Committee vote with him, which they won't. (Committee member Anna Eshoo, D-Calif., a Pelosi confidante, declared in a closed-door meeting last week that she "doesn't worship at the altar of jurisdiction," according to a Democratic aide.)

By DAVID N. GOODMAN, The Associated Press

AP, January 26, 2007

DETROIT (AP) — A waste treatment company that came under scrutiny after a major oil spill in 2002 that sent a slick as far as Lake Erie was indicted, along with three former employees, on charges of violating federal clean water laws and conspiracy.

The indictment was not based on the April 2002 spill, for which no one was ever charged.

A federal grand jury in Detroit issued the indictments Wednesday against Comprehensive Environmental Solutions Inc. of Dearborn and the ex-employees, the U.S. Justice Department said in a news release.

In the aftermath of the 2002 spill, FBI and Environmental Protection Agency agents searched the company's offices.

A Comprehensive Environmental Solutions spokesman said Thursday that the company was not responsible for the 2002 spill and has replaced the top management and upgraded its facilities since then.

The company "added a new management team, including two full-time onsite chemists, and voluntarily installed millions of dollars to complete an aggressive campaign to improve operations and engage in more environmentally friendly practices," said spokesman Robert Moll.

Moll said the company "fully cooperated with the investigation" of the 2002 spill and continues to believe it was not involved.

Those charged Wednesday were former president and chief executive Bryan Mallindine, 50, of Carlsbad, Calif.; former president and general manager Michael Panyard, 44, of Pleasant Ridge; and former plant manager Charles D. Long, 41, of Wayne County's Brownstown Township, the Justice Department said.

All three were charged with conspiracy and violating the Clean Water Act. Mallindine also was charged with obstruction of justice, and Panyard was charged with making false statements.

The obstruction of justice charge carries up to 10 years in prison; conspiracy or making false statements, up to five years; and violating the Clean Water Act, up to three years.

A message seeking comment was left Thursday for Mallindine. There was no phone listing for Panyard, and Long's telephone number was unlisted.

Former plant manager Donald Kaniowski, 37, of Dearborn, reached a plea agreement to a charge of violating the Clean Water Act, the Justice Department said.

The 2002 spill released an estimated 255,000 gallons into the Rouge River, from which it entered the Detroit River and Lake Erie. The investigation and cleanup cost at least $5 million.

Comprehensive Environmental Solutions acquired a Dearborn waste treatment facility in 2002. Company officials "continued to accept millions of gallons of liquid wastes which it could not treat or store," the Justice Department said.

"The defendants often bypassed treatment processes and discharged untreated wastes directly to the sewer," part of the Detroit water and sewer system, the statement said.

Comprehensive Environmental Solutions has about 20 employees, is privately held and does not release financial details of its operations, Moll said.

When Superfund Expenses Go Mega (LAT)

By Marla Cone

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2007

FORT EDWARD, N.Y. — After the winter thaw, a huge enterprise — so expensive and risky that it ranks among the most ambitious environmental projects on Earth — will rise up from an abandoned cornfield in upstate New York.

Not far from Saratoga, where Americans defeated British soldiers in the Revolutionary War, 40 miles of the Hudson River will be excavated to remove hazardous compounds discharged by General Electric. The project, expected to cost more than $700 million, will rival the price of the new Yankee Stadium and remove enough toxic mud to fill the stadium twice.

Yet, despite 50,000 tests of the river sludge and three decades of review, there are no guarantees that this cleanup will succeed.

The Hudson River is one of 154 places across the country — 16 in California — dubbed Superfund "mega sites" because eliminating their toxic chemicals is such a big and costly job. And like this project, in which dredging could stir up even more chemicals, many of them involve huge investments in uncertain outcomes.

Mega cleanups — those expected to cost more than $50 million — usually last for decades. For some, there's no end in sight.

In Southern California, off the Palos Verdes Peninsula, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency is trying to decide the best way to immobilize a huge ocean-floor deposit of the pesticide DDT that has been poisoning fish and other marine life for decades.

Near Redding, on a mountain fractured by a huge copper and silver mine that opened in 1879, the EPA has constructed a dam and diverted a creek to try to contain a continuous flow of acids and metals that will probably go on forever.

In Butte, Mont., one mega site is so notorious that it has become a tourist attraction. At a viewing stand above an old copper mine, visitors peer into a 900-foot-deep pit of toxic waste. When migratory birds land on this brew of acids and metals, mistaking it for a watering hole, they die.

'Blight on communities'

Yet EPA officials say tackling such engineering challenges is justified because doing nothing at these super-sized toxic sites poses an even worse threat to human health, the environment and the economy.

"Usually, they are a blight on communities. In our case, the stigma of the contamination is hurting the economy of the upper Hudson," said David King, the EPA's Hudson River project manager.

Twenty-six years after Congress passed the Superfund law to clean up the nation's most dangerous dumping grounds, the list of mega sites keeps growing as more mines, landfills, military bases and factories qualify.

Superfund's national priority list includes more than 1,200 chemical sites, but only one of every eight rises to "mega" status. New Jersey leads with 18, but California's 16 megas will soon more than double, with 18 others expected to meet the $50-million mark.

"State programs can deal with garden-variety sites, but mega sites are ones that nobody but the federal government can deal with," said Katherine Probst, a senior fellow at Resources for the Future, an environmental think tank in Washington, who has researched Superfund for 15 years.

Mega cleanups averaged $140 million each in 2000, 10 times the standard Superfund project, according to Resources for the Future. California's 16 mega sites' cost estimates range from $100 million to $450 million, said Elizabeth Adams, the EPA's regional Superfund cleanup chief in San Francisco.

"Today, a real mega site is well over the $100-million mark. Sadly, $50 million may not be what it once was," Probst said.

Funding lags behind

Yet federal funding for Superfund oversight has not kept up with the surge in mega sites, and many cleanups remain in the early stages. At 22% of all sites, human exposure to chemicals is not under control, the EPA says.

Polluters pay for most cleanups, but Superfund's annual budget, which supports EPA analyses, has remained at about $1.2 billion since 1987. With inflation, that is a 40% decline.

"The Superfund program's real purchasing power has decreased dramatically at the same time that large, complex and expensive sites — often referred to as mega sites — make up an increasing proportion of the program's workload," Probst said at a congressional hearing in June.

What makes a site such a headache that it becomes a mega? "It's the number of contaminants, the size, how far the contamination has spread and how remote it is," Adams said.

Some, such as the Hudson River, involve one company and gigantic volumes of a single pollutant. Others, such as a Monterey Park landfill that towers over surrounding hills, have multiple chemicals and sources.

In the Northeast, many megas are old factories. But around Los Angeles, the worst are immense underground basins in which water supplies, polluted by industrial solvents, have had decades of pumping and treatment. The San Gabriel Valley aquifer is the state's most expensive mega cleanup, expected to reach at least $450 million.

"A lot of these industries came in during the '40s, and these underground plumes are now miles long — sometimes six or seven miles," Adams said. "It's a huge effort, and very costly, to make sure everything meets drinking-water standards."

The trickiest megas — 11 including the Hudson River — are underwater. Dredging them risks uncovering more polluted layers or leaving toxic residue.

"It's not like vacuuming your carpet," said Richard Luthy, Stanford University's chairman of civil and environmental engineering and a member of a National Research Council committee on mega sites. "You are, in every case, left with some material on the bottom that you haven't completely picked up. Just because you can dredge doesn't mean you can get everything."

At a small cleanup in San Francisco Bay's Richmond Harbor, DDT-laden sludge was dredged in 1997. But high concentrations resurfaced a year later. A sloped bottom and barge debris complicated the work.

With problems at small sites, Luthy said, "you have to wonder about the big sites. You might actually make them worse."

The most unusual underwater site is half a mile deep in the Pacific, a mile off the Palos Verdes Peninsula. For 25 years, a pesticide plant near Torrance released DDT into sewers. Now the EPA is trying to decide whether to use clean sand to cap part of the deposit, which covers several square miles of ocean floor.

Decades of analysis often occur before the EPA decides whether to dredge, cap, dam, pump — or some combination. At many, the EPA wrestles with remedies that might be ineffective — or worse.

Hazards of cleanup

In the Hudson River Valley, the debate over dredging has gone on for three decades, predating Superfund.

Two GE plants discharged as much as 1.3 million pounds of polychlorinated biphenyls, or PCBs, into the river for 30 years beginning in 1947. Used to insulate large electrical equipment, the PCBs, which are likely human carcinogens and can disrupt immune systems and brain development, rendered the river's fish inedible.

GE maintained that removing PCBs from the Hudson was too risky, and in 1984, the EPA agreed. The agency reversed course in 2001, concluding that dredging could be done safely and setting performance standards. Finally, in a November court settlement, GE agreed to dredge 10%. If an independent panel approves the results, GE can voluntarily dredge the rest or face a likely EPA order.

The main risk, King said, is unleashing buried PCBs. To reduce that threat, clamshell buckets will tightly seal as they bring mud to the surface. Work will stop if water standards are violated.

"Technically, it's not anything exotic; it's the size and the logistics that make it a challenge," he said. "I can't recall anything of this scale before."

The dig will remove 2 million cubic yards of PCB-contaminated mud. Another PCB cleanup along Wisconsin's Fox River could dredge a record 7 million cubic yards. "That makes them the largest by volume and us the largest by cost. Both are dubious honors," King said.

This spring, before the first bucketful is scooped in 2008, workers will descend on Fort Edward, a town of 6,000, to build a treatment plant, rail tracks, a wharf, marina, rail yard, utility lines and filtering presses. That alone is "like constructing a small city," said John Haggard, GE program manager.

Dug up by mechanical dredgers, the mud will be transported by barges and tugs to the plant, where the PCBs will be extracted, squeezed through presses, then hauled by 81-car freight trains to a landfill.

The dredging is expected to last six to eight years, but after decades of delay in the start-up, Hudson River Valley residents are skeptical about when the toxic mud will be gone.

In Fort Edward's museum, a sign reads: "The roots of the present lie deep in the past." For residents of mega-site communities, the past, present and future are defined by a toxic legacy.

"We could come back two decades from now, and it will still be going on," said Peter Berle, New York's former environmental commissioner. "Hopefully, someday, we'll be free of PCBs."

Concerns, Finger-pointing Greet Audit Of Sewage Spills (LAT)

By Sharon Bernstein And Tony Barboza, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2007

A county report that says most incidents aren't acted on sparks calls for new measures.

Southern Californians love their beaches.

So to keep the beaches and ocean unfouled, government agencies have over the last decade passed strict pollution laws and spent millions of dollars trying to reduce sewage spills and urban runoff.

But a county audit released this week determined that all of the regulations and disclosure requirements have created a communications breakdown that has left Los Angeles County health officials in the dark about numerous sewage spills.

The audit found that the county had records for just 19 of the 208 major sewage spills since 2002, which dumped nearly 10 million gallons of untreated waste onto streets and into creeks and other tributaries that lead to the sea.

How much of this raw sewage reached the ocean is unknown, but experts said the sheer volume makes it highly likely that some did.

But either because cities and water agencies didn't notify the county health department about their spills or the department didn't follow up on notifications it did receive, beaches were not tested or closed, leaving beachgoers possibly exposed to effluent.

The findings alarmed county leaders and environmental groups, who called Thursday for immediate creation of a clearinghouse for information about sewage leaks that could flow into the ocean, causing dangerous increases in bacteria levels.

"There was a total communication breakdown," said Anjali Jaiswal, an attorney for the Natural Resources Defense Council, an environmental group that has been active in Santa Monica Bay pollution issues. "There would be spills and they wouldn't be reported properly. The public wasn't notified."

Part of the problem is that various ocean pollution laws require different types of notification.

State law requires county health officials to act when a raw sewage spill reaches the ocean adjacent to a public beach, but gives local health departments leeway in determining whether a spill is big enough to reach the beach. One law requires agencies to inform the state Office of Emergency Services, while another requires them to contact county public health agencies.

Meanwhile, local water agencies and the county health department were pointing fingers about where the communications breakdown took place and whether it affected water quality.

County officials say they typically log all communications with their offices, and that there are no indications that the cities and water agencies that spilled most of the sewage phoned to report it.

Dr. Jonathan Fielding, the county's public health director, said that one or two calls might have been lost by county operators, but every call routed to the health department was logged, and the spill investigated.

But the cities, including Los Angeles, which dumped the most sewage into the bay, have meticulous records documenting the size and time of the spills.

It is not clear whether the cities' records include references to phone calls made to report the spills.

But Barry Berggren, division manager for the city of Los Angeles' wastewater collection system, said he personally phoned the county Department of Public Health to report high-volume leaks that occurred in Glassell Park on Jan. 9, 2005.

On that day, a heavy rainstorm sent more than 1 million gallons of raw sewage into the storm drain system, which directs runoff into the Los Angeles River and Long Beach Harbor.

Berggren says that's not true.

"For some reason, they believe they weren't notified. I don't know why that is," Berggren said.

Neil Miller, public works director for Manhattan Beach, said his department immediately reports every sewage leak that reaches a storm drain. Because the city is so close to the ocean, any spill could pollute the water very quickly, so it is in the city's interest to report them so the county can close the beaches before swimmers are exposed, he said.

"Especially in the coastal communities, if sewage has a chance of reaching the ocean they need to do extra testing to see if it's safe for swimming," Miller said.

County Supervisor Don Knabe, who ordered the audit after a massive release of raw sewage by Culver City last year went unreported for two days, said there is no doubt in his mind that the system is broken.

"I knew we had some issues but I had no idea they were so severe," Knabe said.

The audit recommended several reforms, some as simple as providing county operators with the names and telephone numbers of officials to be contacted if a spill occurs after business hours.

The report also recommended a centralized program to field reports of spills and track their cleanup, size and costs.

At the Board of Supervisors meeting Tuesday, Knabe plans to introduce a motion to implement the recommendations, along with a request that a specialist in public health be appointed to the Los Angeles Regional Water Control Board, at the Board of Supervisors meeting scheduled for Jan. 30. He is also asking for new standards for maintaining sewer systems so leaks are less frequent, and requesting additional research into what went wrong with the reporting of a particularly egregious spill during the heavy rains of 2005.

Regional water quality control officials support Knabe's efforts and are considering making the board's reporting requirements more stringent.

"We require them to report back within 24 hours of a spill, but apparently that's not being followed," said board Chairwoman Fran Diamond.

The Pacific Palisades resident, who said she was "horrified" by the information in the audit, said she will press to reduce the reporting time to two hours. "We're talking about tremendous public health consequences and tremendous economic consequences," Diamond said. "We have a $2 -billion coastal economy.... This is a real setback."

State Sen. Sheila Kuehl (D-Santa Monica), whose district includes shoreline communities, urged state water regulators to investigate the leaks to determine whether the cities and water agencies that released the sewage were in violation of their permits when the incidents occurred.

Diamond said she would support such investigations.

The audit's findings disturbed beachgoers interviewed Thursday — though none appeared surprised.

"Everybody knows it's filthy here," said Heidi Phillips, 26, who was with her two children, ages 3 months and 3 years. "But for them to be so careless is disgusting. I would never let my kids swim at this beach."

Phillips, who lives in Canoga Park, said the study only confirmed her lack of confidence in the city and county's ability to keep Santa Monica Bay clean.

Matt Sylvester, 26, said he comes to Venice Beach to surf twice a week with friends. He said he knows that the ocean near a big city would not likely be pristine, but expects to be notified if there were a huge sewage spill.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Officer Indicted In Steroid Probe (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy And Suzanne Smalley, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 26, 2007

Faces distribution and perjury charges

A federal grand jury is investigating allegations of steroid abuse among Boston police officers and yesterday indicted veteran Officer Edgardo Rodriguez on charges of selling steroids, perjury, and attempting to thwart the probe.

"There's an ongoing grand jury investigation," Assistant US Attorney John T. McNeil told US Magistrate Judge Robert B. Collings at a hearing. "We are taking a hard look at steroid use among officers in the Boston Police Department."

Rodriguez, 37, was charged with six counts: conspiracy to distribute anabolic steroids last year, distribution of anabolic steroids in 2003, obstruction of justice, and three counts of perjury before a federal grand jury.

The 12-year department veteran was suspended without pay yesterday. He had been placed on administrative duty last summer after three other Boston officers were indicted in July for allegedly guarding large shipments of what they believed to be cocaine.

The suspected ringleader in that case is accused of trafficking steroids, and one of the other officers was a regular customer, said an FBI affidavit. After the steroid abuse allegations emerged, Mayor Thomas M. Menino vowed to try to require steroids testing for officers as part of negotiations on a new contract. Department spokeswoman Elaine Driscoll said last night that the proposal is still part of the negotiations.

The department is also dealing with other illegal drug use. In statistics it released last July, it said that 75 officers failed drug tests -- 61 of them for cocaine -- after the department started annual testing in 1999.

Police Commissioner Edward F. Davis last night pledged to strengthen training to help supervisors detect patterns of behavior suggesting an officer is abusing drugs, including steroids. "I have instructed the Bureau of Internal Investigations to develop and conduct extensive training for all Boston Police supervisors to better enable them to detect, expose, and identify illegal substance abuse," the statement said.

Yesterday, McNeill said that a number of Internal Affairs complaints had been filed against Rodriguez alleging "abusive, aggressive and violent behavior," which the prosecutor characterized as conduct "consistent with steroids use."

But Rodriguez's attorney, Philip A. Tracy Jr., said his client is not addicted to steroids and passed two drug tests he was given by the department in July and August.

McNeil also told the magistrate that Rodriguez had tried to discourage another Boston police officer four or five times from testifying before the grand jury. That officer later testified about Rodriguez's interference, McNeil said.

Prosecutors yesterday asked the judge to ensure that Rodriguez, a Jamaica Plain native and a former Marine who served in the first Persian Gulf War, does not associate with any other Boston police officers because they could be witnesses in the ongoing probe.

"We don't want to disclose who we are looking at," McNeil said. "We don't want any interference."

The indictment alleges that last Oct. 5, Rodriguez lied when he told a grand jury that he had not sold steroids to another Boston officer, who is not identified.

Just after testifying, Rodriguez met an officer in the hallway outside the grand jury room and tried to persuade him not to testify, McNeil also alleged.

However, Rodriguez's attorney told the magistrate that his client was merely warning the officer not to testify without an attorney.

Collings ordered Rodriguez not to have contact with any other Boston police officers, except for anticorruption investigators, but said at Rodriguez's arraignment on Tuesday there will be a hearing on whether to modify the order.

Collings said that because of the obstruction-of-justice charge, he was ordering Rodriguez to post a $50,000 bond, secured by a second mortgage on his Hyde Park home. Rodriguez was also ordered to surrender a handgun he keeps in his home and any department equipment still in his possession.

Rodriguez's attorney argued that it was unfair to ask his client to not talk with other officers because Rodriguez's social life revolves around the department.

Tracy said Rodriguez has been unfairly tarred by his alleged association with the three officers indicted on drug conspiracy charges.

"These charges have no relation to a much more serious conspiracy of three other officers," Tracy said. "These allegations can usually be handled internally or with less severe consequences than a federal indictment."

A source close to the probe said yesterday that prosecutors had offered Rodriguez a deal ensuring no jail time if he would resign from the department. Rodriguez rejected the deal, the source said, and was indicted.

In a statement issued with the indictment, US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan suggested Rodriguez is being charged because of how he behaved during the investigation, not just because of steroid use.

"This case is not just about steroids use by law enforcement officers," Sullivan said in the statement. "It is about an officer allegedly distributing steroids to another officer, perjuring himself, and then attempting to obstruct the grand jury's investigation."

Fourth Officer Indicted In BPD Drugs Probe (BOSH)

By O'Ryan Johnson

Boston Herald, January 26, 2007

A fourth cop was indicted yesterday as part of a long-term federal undercover probe of corruption and drug peddling inside the ranks of the Boston Police Department.

Edgardo Rodriguez, 37, faces charges including possession with intent to distribute anabolic steroids, perjury and obstruction of justice. Rodriguez, a nine-year Boston police veteran, had been on administrative duty since July for his alleged involvement.

He was put on unpaid leave yesterday, police said. His lawyer, Philip A.Tracy Jr., said Rodriguez "has nothing to do and is not connected with any more serious charges against other Boston police officers." Rodriguez was freed after arraignment yesterday.

According to the indictment, Rodriguez lied to a federal grand jury about officers, including Roberto Pulido, about possession and distribution of steroids.

Pulido and two other Boston cops, Nelson Carrasquillo and Carlos Pizarro, were arrested in July for guarding FBI-staged drug deals in exchange for cash. The agents investigating Pulido allegedly uncovered steroid use by Boston cops, police guarding illegal after-hours sex parties, and ID theft, according to a federal affidavit.

According to the indictment unsealed yesterday, when Rodriguez was called before a grand jury investigating "the unlawful activities of a number of Boston police officers and others" in October, he denied selling steroids to or buying steroids from a person identified as "Boston Police Officer A."

Prosecutors said those statements are false. Rodriguez could face 35 years in prison if convicted on all charges.

BPD Patrolman Indicted On Fed Corruption Charges (CBS4BOS)

By Maggie Mulvihill

CBS 4 Boston, January 26, 2007

(CBS4) BOSTON In another embarrassing blow to the Boston Police Department, veteran patrolman Edgardo Rodriguez was indicted on federal corruption charges late Thursday stemming from alleged steroid distribution and other potential crimes within the force.

"It is a gross betrayal of an officer's duty," said U.S. Attorney Michael J. Sullivan in a statement after perjury and obstruction of justice charges were handed down by a federal grand jury.

Calling it a "sad time" for the department, Police Commissioner Ed Davis announced he was suspending Rodriguez without pay as the department continues to root out any other officers who may be involved in drug use.

The BPD is already reeling from two other scandals - missing drugs from the Hyde Park evidence warehouse and the corruption case federal prosecutors are building against three other officers accused of protecting cocaine shipments and other alleged crimes.

The I-Team reported earlier this month that Rodriguez had been warned by police brass to quit the force as federal and department investigators continued to scrutinize his role in the on-going drug-related criminal probe that has engulfed his fellow officers.

Roberto E. Pulido, Nelson Carrasquillo and Carlos A. Pizarro denied any wrongdoing after they were arrested in July by undercover FBI agents in Miami and accused of protecting massive cocaine shipments coming into Boston.

Investigators learned Rodriguez was allegedly using and distributing steroids during their 2 1/2 year probe of the trio, while other Boston officers have been notified their voices have also been picked up on federal wiretaps, the I-Team has reported.

Rodriguez, an 11-year-veteran, has worked in Dorchester, Roxbury, East Boston and the Mobile Operations Unit.

Rodriguez is accused of in the six-count indictment of lying to a federal grand jury about whether or not anyone else in the department has possessed or distributed steroids.

Rodriguez is also accused of three counts of perjury and one count of obstruction of justice. If convicted of all charges he could face a maximum of 35 years in prison. His attorney, Philip A. Tracy, did not immediately return a telephone call seeking comment.

Feds Help Crack Big Cocaine Ring (LN)

LANCASTER COUNTY, PA - Investigators said they have disbanded a multimillion-dollar cocaine operation in eastern Pennsylvania with indictments against 20 suspected smugglers.

Nine Lancaster County residents were among those indicted, investigators said, and seven of them were arrested this week.

As of Thursday night, Pablo Beltran and Tellin Cintron, both of Lancaster city, were the only suspects yet to be apprehended among the 20 indicted.

The charges are the culmination of a two-year investigation by the Drug Enforcement Administration, Pennsylvania State Police and the Lancaster County Drug Task Force.

The operation was importing 30 to 40 kilograms of cocaine into Lancaster, Dauphin, York and Lebanon counties each month, investigators said.

Assistant United States Attorney Christy Fawcett said each kilogram sold for an average of $22,000, then re-sold at a higher price.

Fawcett, lead prosecutor in the case, said it was one of the largest stings in recent memory. “This was expensive stuff,” she said.

Some of the cocaine was cooked into crack, Fawcett said, and marijuana also was sold.

The indictments were filed Jan. 11. Seven arrests were made Wednesday, Fawcett said, and some of the suspects already were serving time in prison.

The seven Lancaster County residents arrested were charged with conspiracy to distribute and possession with intent to distribute cocaine, crack cocaine and marijuana.

They were: Edward Rivera and Jorge Torres, both of High Street; Jimmy Ortiz-Rivera, Lafayette Street; Sandra Collazo-Medina, Valley Drive; Harry Delgado, East Clay Street; Nathaniel Sanchez, North Broad Street; and Pedro Rivera, Oak Ridge Drive, Millersville.

Ortiz-Rivera also was charged with possession of a stolen firearm.

Lancaster County District Attorney Donald Totaro said some of the suspects were known to be local drug dealers.

"I recognized some of the names as people we dealt with in the past," he said.

If convicted, each suspect faces a mandatory 10-year prison sentence and fines up to $4 million.

Investigators seized about $500,000 in cash, five lots of real estate and jewelry during the investigation. A Lancaster city business — K&A Appliances at 149 E. King St. — also was seized.

The charges also include a $7.2 million substitute asset forfeiture that must be paid if the suspects are convicted. Fawcett said that sum is for money and real estate that wasn't recovered during the investigation.

A major break in the investigation came May 27, when two Mexican nationals — Jaime Cardenas-Borbon and Gabriel Rivera-Gil — were arrested at Days Inn, 30 Keller Ave.

Investigators seized 40 kilograms of cocaine and $182,000 cash from their room. It is believed to be one of the largest cocaine shipments ever intended for Lancaster County.

"As a result of that arrest, we were able to piece together additional information" about the drug ring, Totaro said.

The two-year investigation also was aided by wiretaps placed on five telephone lines authorities said were used for trafficking drugs.

"These federal agencies bring manpower and resources that enhance an investigation," Totaro said. Also, "jail sentences are far more severe" upon convictions in such cases.

Hearings for the suspects are scheduled to begin April 2, Fawcett said.

Accused Kingpin In Prison (SEN)

Sentinel, January 25, 2007

When Mycol Robinson called federal marshals and turned himself in on Tuesday, he ended more than a year of hiding from authorities.

The second alleged kingpin in a central Pennsylvania cocaine ring turned himself over to members of the U.S. Marshals' fugitive squad at the federal building in Harrisburg around 6 p.m. Tuesday, says a spokesman from the state attorney general's office. Robinson, 34, formerly of Steelton, had eluded authorities since they announced in September 2005 that they had broken up an overlapping cocaine ring with two leaders, who they identified as Robinson and George Santiago.

Santiago was sentenced last month in Cumberland County Court for drug dealing. Santiago and several smaller dealers were nabbed in September 2005.

Authorities believe Robinson stayed with friends and family in New York City, Florida and Washington, D.C., while the federal marshals hunted for him, and that he was most recently in the D.C. area. Marshals had frequent contact with Robinson's friends and relatives, which often wears them down and causes them to put pressure on the fugitive, said Nils Frederiksen, spokesman for the attorney general's office.

Later, authorities plan to look at whether to charge anyone with giving aid to the fugitive, he said.

Robinson is being held in Cumberland County Prison without bail, with a preliminary hearing set Tuesday. He is charged with five counts of delivery of cocaine, one count of possession with intent to deliver, one count of criminal conspiracy and two counts of participating in corrupt organizations, which is the state's racketeering statute. He could serve up to 90 years in prison and face $725,000 in fines.

An investigation into the drug ring found that Robinson and Santiago, 35, set up two separate but similar organizations for distributing drugs that involved at least 23 residents. According to reports, the men transported cocaine from New York before repackaging it for local sale, or "cooking" it into crack, eventually distributing more than $7 million of the drug.

The AG's office said Robinson used a home on North Second Street in Steelton and an address on Allen Road in Carlisle as distribution points, while Santiago set up shop on Beetum Hollow Road in the Newville area.

Santiago faced more counts than Robinson and was sentenced last month to 7 to 20 years in state prison and ordered to pay $110,000 in fines.

N.J. State Police, DEA Break Up South Jersey Narcotics Ring (AP)

AP, January 25, 2007

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) -- State and federal authorities broke up a major South Jersey drug distribution ring Thursday, arresting 14 people in New Jersey and Arizona, and seizing 25 pounds of crack and powder cocaine.

New Jersey State Police Capt. Jeff Simpkins said the bust resulted from a 10-month narcotics trafficking investigation that began as street-level surveillance, then grew.

"We took this one down at the trafficking level," Simpkins said. "When you stop it at the kilo level, it doesn't filter down to the school-yard level. It keeps it (the drugs) out of our neighborhoods."

"It's the most effective way to fight the drug game," said Simpkins who oversees state police in southern New Jersey.

The cocaine was valued at about $15,000 per pound.

State Police Superintendent Col. Rick Fuentes said the information developed with the Drug Enforcement Administration during the joint investigation will be accessible to other law enforcement agents conducting future investigations through the Regional Operations Intelligence Center.

The new facility nicknamed "The Rock," is where federal, state and local officials gather to share information on evolving cases.

"This information will have a value beyond the arrest of individuals," said Fuentes. "The information will be linked up with other potential cases and the vehicle for doing that is 'The Rock.' That's our clearinghouse."

Police from Gloucester Township entered six homes and three storage facilities in Gloucester, Camden and Burlington counties Thursday morning.

Three New Jersey men were arrested in Tucson, where the New Jersey suspects went to meet their supplier, police said. Eleven others were arrested in New Jersey, with the highest bail set at $500,000 and some defendants released without bail.

Authorities also seized $244,000 in cash and three guns.

Those arrested were charged with conspiracy in connection with the distribution of narcotics. The maximum penalty upon conviction is 10 years in prison and a $150,000 fine. Additional charges are likely, authorities said.

The investigation was code-named Operation Centerfield because one of the first suspects identified was Gary Maddox, who has the same name as the former Phillies center fielder.

Gang Task Force Nets Suspects, Drugs, Guns (RMA)

By Stephanie Barry

The Republican, January 25, 2007

SPRINGFIELD - Standing behind an array of guns and street drugs, federal and local law enforcement officials yesterday announced the results of Tuesday's blitz targeting suspected dealers in Mason Square.

The FBI Western Massachusetts Joint Gang Task Force made arrests beginning at dawn that day, netting 14 suspects by yesterday morning, officials said. Charges ranged from cocaine trafficking to possession of a large capacity firearm.

Springfield Police Commissioner Edward A. Flynn said the raids were the result of a year-long investigation into the robust open-air drug trade in Mason Square.

"The goal was impact players," Flynn said, adding that the investigation included undercover operatives, sophisticated surveillance and countless drug buys through informants.

He said of those indicted in state court, 13 were apprehended; one was located in a Maine jail on unrelated charges, and four are still at large.

Laid out on a table in a conference room at police headquarters yesterday were six handguns - including five police said were previously loaded and one outfitted with a scope - plus bags of marijuana, crack cocaine and heroin.

The contraband was recovered from searches that accompanied the arrests, police said, and were labeled with various suspects' names and addresses.

The guns, some found with stashes of ammunition, will be tested to probe possible links to local unsolved shootings, yesterday's panel said.

FBI supervisor Michael G. O'Reilly said the gang task force was established in 1994. It includes members of the FBI; U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration; U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; Massachusetts State Police; Hampden County Sheriff's Department; and local police in Springfield, Chicopee and Holyoke.

"We each have a special focus ... We take that focus and bring it together," said Robert G. Tacinelli, supervisor of the Springfield office of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

The task force was responsible for a 2005 crackdown on 36 local Latin King affiliates, the largest single-day roundup of that faction in the state's history, O'Reilly said. Many of those were prosecuted in federal court.

Assistant Hampden County District Attorney James R. Goodhines said all suspects are being held in lieu of bond ranging from $50,000 to $500,000.

The suspects were arraigned in Springfield District and Superior courts during the past two days. Flynn said the hope is that the charges will get bumped up to federal court, where sentences for drug crimes are long and prison assignments are often far-flung.

He said the timing of the sweep was critical for a wary city still reeling from a spate of violent crime.

"To see this type of hardware in front of us reminds us really what the stakes are," he said.

Ironworkers' Business Manager Faces Drug Charges (VANSUN)

By Peter O'Neil And Glenn Bohn, Vancouver Sun

Vancouver Sun, January 26, 2007

Perley Edmund Holmes, business manager of Ironworkers Local 97 in Burnaby, faces drug and conspiracy charges after U.S. Border Patrol officers seized cocaine valued at more than $4 million US in eastern Washington last Thursday night.

According to a court affidavit filed by a special agent of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, border patrol officers responded to an electronic sensor on a road near the Curlew Border Patrol Station south of Grand Forks in B.C.'s southern Interior.

The officers turned on their vehicle's bright "takedown" lights and "observed two individuals lying in the snow under some bushes," the affidavit states. A large backpack was beside each man. The officers ordered the two men to stay where they were. One -- the affidavit wasn't clear which one -- attempted to run north towards the Canadian border, less than a kilometre away, but was caught.

A U.S. Border Patrol Agency news release reported the seizure of more than 136 pounds -- 61.6 kilograms -- of cocaine in the two backpacks and the arrest of a "Canadian citizen attempting to smuggle the contraband across the border."

The agency didn't name the Canadian but the affidavit filed by the U.S. federal Justice Department in Spokane names Holmes and Case Hale Swinburne, of Okanogan County, Wash.

The criminal complaint is the first step towards a possible U.S. grand jury indictment on these recommended charges: possession with intent to distribute more than five kilograms of cocaine, and conspiracy to possess with the intent to distribute more than five kilograms of cocaine.

Dave Beatty, elected president of Ironworkers Local 97, said he and other officials were shocked by the arrest of Holmes.

"It was completely out of character for anybody who knows him," Beatty said Wednesday.

He said the union called in an independent auditor at its Burnaby office Monday to investigate union records.

CBC News, January 26, 2007

The business manager of the B.C. and Yukon local of the Ironworkers union has been arrested in Washington state, where he has been charged with a serious drug offence.

Perley Edmund Holmes, 50,Â is in jail in Spokane and faces a charge of possession of cocaine with intent to distribute.

They said they seized more than 60 kilograms of cocaine, worth an estimated $4.3 million.

Union president David Beatty saidÂ the arrestÂ came asÂ a big surprise to people who know Holmes.

"It's probably as shocking as could be, for anyone I've talked to, our members, our contractors. It's completely out of character and nobody can visualize this happening."

Beatty also said Holmes is no longer on the payroll.

An auditor will be brought in to review the finances of the local to ensure no illegal activities were conducted with union funds, he said.

Holmes faces 10 years to life in an American prison if he's convicted of the allegations.

Drug 'kingpin' Says He's Guilty In Broad Scheme (REP)

Reporter, January 25, 2007

A Vacaville man who prosecutors described as a regional "drug kingpin" pleaded guilty in federal court Tuesday to charges of conspiracy to distribute cocaine and methamphetamine, money laundering and trying to hide a financial transaction.

Eduardo Pichardo, 33, now faces 10 years in federal prison and a personal financial judgment of $500,000. He will return to federal court in Sacramento on April 3 for sentencing.

Pichardo was arrested by Drug Enforcement Administration agents June 21, 2006, on suspicion of distribution and conspiracy to distribute cocaine and methamphetamine.

The arrest culminated a seven-year investigation into a drug-trafficking network that stretched from Northern California to Arizona and Alabama.

In October, Pichardo was indicted on the additional charges of money laundering.

In exchange for his plea Tuesday, prosecutors agreed not to pursue money laundering or other charges against Pichardo's wife.

According to investigators, Pichardo became a prime suspect in a drug trafficking investigation shortly after it was launched in 1999.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents said Pichardo was the head of an organization that trafficked multi-kilogram quantities of cocaine and methamphetamine,

In October 2001, investigators said Pichardo arranged for the driver of a pickup truck to transport 25 kilograms (about 56 pounds) of cocaine from Phoenix, Ariz. to Alabama. On Oct. 5, the driver was stopped by Arkansas State Police during a routine traffic stop and was subsequently arrested. A search of the truck revealed the cocaine, which was concealed in a hidden compartment inside the truck's gas tank, officials said.

The street value of the seized load was estimated at $1.3 million.

According to court documents, Pichardo gave a colleague $15,500 in cash to wire to a bail bondsman in Arkansas in order to bail out his driver.

"The cash the defendant gave was proceeds of (his) drug trafficking activities," prosecutors wrote. And he used a friend to wire the funds so that the cash could not be traced back to him.

In addition, he instructed his colleague to wire the money in two separate transactions so that neither one would exceed $10,000. That order was given, prosecutors said, because he knew that any cash transaction in excess of $10,000 would be reported to authorities, thus hiding the transaction.

Pharmacist Could Face Three-year Term (MBSN)

By Josh Hoke

The 81-year-old Myrtle Beach man accused of illegally distributing prescription drugs could face three years in prison, according to a federal indictment obtained by The Sun News.

John Tuite worked as a pharmacist for Wilmington, N.C.-based United Care Pharmacy, an online business that provided prescriptions to customers throughout the country without requiring a consultation with a doctor, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Tuite is charged with conspiracy to distribute controlled substances. Three others face those charges and are accused of money laundering.

All four men were arrested earlier this month.

Tuite denied wrongdoing on Tuesday, and he could not be reached for comment Wednesday.

Tuite appeared in court last week and is free on bail.

He was to be in court Wednesday, his attorney said, but it was unclear by press time whether he made that appearance.

His attorney, public defender Bill Nettles, said, "The judge just wants an update on how the case can be resolved."

Nettles said since the indictment was filed in California, Tuite may eventually be forced to appear in federal court in that state.

Andrew Thomas Russo, 48, United Care Pharmacy's former chief operating officer; Denis Leborgne, 42, the former chief technical officer; and David John, 41, the former chief financial officer, were also arrested and charged in the case.

Cincinnati Doctor Gets Two Years For Clinic Crimes (PORTDT)

By Jeff Barron, PDT Staff Writer

Portsmouth (OH) Daily Times, January 26, 2007

A Cincinnati doctor has been sentenced to two years in prison for money laundering in connection with pain clinics in Lucasville, Hanging Rock, Jackson and Chillicothe.

Gregory L. Ebner, 55, no address, also was fined $10,000 after pleading guilty last year.

“Money laundering is not a victimless crime,” Internal Revenue Service criminal investigator Jeffrey Cooper said. “Not only are innocent people duped by various schemes, but the underground, untaxed economy harms the entire nation's strength.”

Jewell, of Paintsville, Ky., and Nico Capurro of Cincinnati, have pleaded innocent to several charges in connection to the case and remain free on bail.

According to the Justice Department, Ebner worked at the pain clinics two or three days a week and saw about 30 patients a day.

He prescribed drugs including Lorcet and Xanax after cursory medical examinations in which he never checked the height, weight or blood pressure of the patients.

He also had no diagnostic equipment at the clinics.

Patients paid in cash $175 to $200 per visit. The clinics would not accept insurance, personal checks, credit cards or any other form of payment.

New patients were required to bring an X-ray or MRI to create an aura of legitimacy, the Justice Department said.

Prescriptions were filled at only a few pharmacies, including the South Shore Pharmacy in South Shore, Ky. Many of the patients signed an agreement to only use that pharmacy.

Justice officials said Ebner split the patient payments with Jewell and structured them to hide his involvement in the illegal activity.

Ebner broke the money down into smaller amounts, typically less than $10,000 for deposit into his personal bank account to avoid the Currency Transaction Reporting requirements.

He used the money for a real estate down payment, shares of a medical partnership and as a payoff of his mortgage.

Ebner must surrender to officials on March 19.

IMMIGRATION:

Senate Endorses A Contracts Ban (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The U.S. Senate voted unanimously to bar companies that hire illegal immigrants from receiving federal contracts.

The ban would last for seven years and would last 10 years if the company were caught hiring illegal immigrants while it held a federal contract. The ban could be lifted if the government decided that doing so was in the interest of national security. The amendment was offered on the fourth day of debate on an increase in the federal minimum wage from $5.15 an hour to $7.25.

Alien Hiring Fine Fails On Hill (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 26, 2007

Senate Democrats quashed a proposal yesterday that would have dramatically increased civil fines on employers who hire illegal aliens.

Sen. Jeff Sessions, Alabama Republican, offered the amendment to the bill now being debated that would increase the federal minimum wage.

Ridding the economy of illegal aliens, he argued, would do far more to help low-income wage earners than simply raising the minimum wage. Not only do aliens displace U.S. citizens in the work force, he said, they also artificially suppress wages.

"Our whole purpose of the minimum-wage act is to increase the wages of working Americans, particularly low-skilled workers," Mr. Sessions said. "That's a noble goal."

One of the reasons "that those salaries have lagged behind is because of a large influx of illegal immigrant labor," he said. "That is indisputable, and it's not been discussed much here. People apparently don't want to talk about it, but we're going to talk about it."

But Democratic leaders refused to let Mr. Sessions' alien amendment reach the Senate floor yesterday, and they accused him and other Republicans of offering amendments unrelated to the minimum-wage increase in order to stall passage of the bill.

Some 60 amendments have been offered, and today marks the fifth day of debate on raising the minimum wage to $7.25 per hour from $5.15 per hour over two years.

"Amendment on Social Security. Amendment on immigration. And all the chortling and laughing as they go on about their business," he boomed.

Republicans are "not for those millions of Americans who are heading home tonight, who've worked long and hard, facing their children hoping that at last ... the United States isn't going to fail us," he said. "What do we tell them after five days?"

After accusing Republicans of stalling, Mr. Kennedy then proceeded to read aloud for five minutes a story in the New York Times about soldiers fighting in Iraq.

Mr. Sessions said his amendment is not a delaying tactic and isn't unrelated to the overall minimum-wage bill. His provision, he said, gets at the very reason a minimum-wage increase is needed in the first place. He calls his amendment "comprehensive wage reform," a sly reference to the "comprehensive" approach to immigration reform that Democrats and President Bush are demanding, but most Republicans deride as amnesty.

It would raise the minimum fine on employers from $250 per hired alien to $5,000 per alien. And it would raise the maximum fine from $10,000 per alien to $40,000 per alien.

Though Democrats turned back Mr. Sessions' employer-sanctions amendment, they allowed through a second Sessions amendment aimed at federal government contractors who are caught hiring illegal aliens.

He ticked off a half-dozen recent examples of federal contractors using illegal aliens, even in the most sensitive of positions.

"It's astounding how widespread this problem is," Mr. Sessions said. "In one alarming incident, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission was caught allowing illegal aliens who obtained documentation by using fake Social Security numbers to work as contract painters at nuclear facilities."

Under the amendment that Democrats allowed last night, any government contractor caught using illegal labor would be prohibited from future government contracts for ten years. It was approved on a 94-0 vote.

Bonkers At The Border (WSJ)

Most people would consider corrupt border patrol agents to be part of the illegal immigration problem, not the solution. So it's passing strange that anti-immigration Republicans in Congress are calling for the federal government to release Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean, two former border guards from Texas who were sent to prison last week for shooting an unarmed man in the back and then trying to cover up their crime.

Several GOP lawmakers, including outspoken restrictionists like Congressmen Tom Tancredo and Duncan Hunter, have hailed the ex-agents as American heroes. President Bush is even being urged to pardon Ramos and Compean, who received sentences of 11 years and 12 years, respectively. GOP Representative Dana Rohrabacher has gone so far as to accuse Mr. Bush of being "on the side of [America's] enemies" for allowing the men to go to jail.

CNN's Lou Dobbs has also weighed in repeatedly with pseudo-reporting designed to rile up his viewers rather than inform them of the facts. Speaking of facts, they are as follows, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Western District of Texas and evidence presented at the ex-agents' jury trial:

Agents Ramos and Compean were guarding the Mexican border near El Paso, Texas, on Feb. 17, 2005, when they encountered a van driven by Osvaldo Aldrete-Davila. When the driver saw the agents he sped off, eventually abandoning the vehicle and fleeing toward the border on foot. At one point, Aldrete-Davila stopped running and raised his empty hands to surrender. But when the first border agent to approach him stumbled, Aldrete-Davila took off again toward the Rio Grande.

At this point, Agents Ramos and Compean opened fire, shooting at the back of a suspect who they knew was unarmed. They fired 14 rounds in all -- Agent Compean even paused to reload -- finally hitting Aldrete-Davila in the buttocks. The suspect was wounded but still managed to make it across the border and escape.

It later was determined that Aldrete-Davila was in the country illegally and smuggling drugs. Nearly 750 pounds of marijuana were found in the van. But Ramos and Compean didn't know the suspect's immigration status when they shot him. Nor did they know the contents of the vehicle he was driving. What the agents did know is that they had broken any number of border patrol policies.

So Compean and another agent returned to the scene to gather shell casings and discard them in a drainage ditch. Compean and Ramos, who'd been disciplined for past conduct unbecoming a federal officer, then filed a false report. The only reason their cover-up didn't succeed is because an honest border agent who learned of the shooting eventually reported it.

After a trial lasting nearly three weeks, a federal jury in El Paso convicted both agents on charges including assault with a deadly weapon and obstruction of justice. As Johnny Sutton, U.S. Attorney for the Western District of Texas, put it: "The simple truth of this case is that former Agents Compean and Ramos shot 15 times at an unarmed man who was running away from them and posed no threat. They lied about what happened, covered up the shooting, conspired to destroy the evidence and then proceeded to write up and file a false report."

The Congressmen who are exploiting the episode haven't made an issue of the agents' guilt, which is by and large conceded. Rather, the restrictionists argue that Compean and Ramos should be given a pass because the victim of their crime was a drug-smuggling illegal alien.

This is an odd argument coming from immigration hard-liners, who typically say that while they love legal immigrants the U.S. must "enforce the law" on the border. That the agents have been held accountable for misconduct shows that no one is above the law. Letting the agents off the hook would also send a terrible message to honest border agents who perform a difficult and dangerous job.

Turning felons into political causes is the kind of stunt usually pulled by the likes of Al Sharpton. That Republicans would now stoop to it shows how immigration has caused some on the right to lose their political bearings. First they gave up their belief in free labor markets, and now they're discarding their law enforcement credentials.

And these are the same folks who assail Mr. Bush's guest-worker proposal as "amnesty." The irony is that if Mr. Bush's plan were in place and there were more legal ways to enter the U.S., border agents would have more time and resources to chase down people like Aldrete-Davila and apprehend them properly.

By John Pomfret

PHOENIX -- In 2001, Arizona state prosecutors trying to stem the growing tide of immigrant smuggling found a Western Union outlet in the border town of Douglas that was doling out more than $91,000 a month -- this in a community where the per capita income was barely $10,000 a year.

People across the country, prosecutors said, were sending money to the little Western Union shop in Douglas -- and scores others like it in Arizona -- to pay smugglers to sneak illegal immigrants into the United States.

To fight back, Attorney General Terry Goddard employed a controversial technique known as a damming warrant to seize $17 million in money transfers into hundreds of Western Union locations in Arizona, prosecute scores of immigrant smugglers and deport hundreds of people in a program he marvels at because of its "elegant simplicity."

On the surface, the warrants were a success. Between mid-2005 and mid-2006, according to Goddard's office, transfers of $500 and more into Arizona fell from $36.8 million a month to just $2.8 million. The only problem was that all of Goddard's other sources indicated that immigrant smuggling was still booming in Arizona.

So on Sept. 21, Goddard expanded the program, issuing a warrant blocking all Western Union money transfers of $500 and above from 26 states with a significant population of illegal immigrants to a group of Western Union outlets in the northern Mexican state of Sonora. He also planned on issuing warrants blocking money transfers through Western Union to nearby states such as Nevada.

Western Union sued to block the Sonoran warrant. "We felt that the state was overreaching," said Peter Ziverts, Western Union's vice president for compliance, "because none of this money ever touched Arizona. So how could Arizona claim it was involved in a state crime?"

On Jan. 9, Maricopa County Superior Court Judge Kenneth L. Fields agreed, quashing the warrant and ruling that it was "unconstitutional as applied under the Commerce Clause, Foreign Commerce Clause, Due Process Clause and the Fourth Amendment of the United States Constitution."

This legal battle is but one of more than 10 state and federal cases in Arizona over how to police illegal immigration. The cases underscore the pitfalls faced by local law enforcement as it intensifies its fight against immigrant smuggling and undocumented workers. Tactics prosecutors believe are a godsend in the crackdown are often, in the words of one federal law enforcement official, "either brilliant or illegal."

Arizona has emerged as the hothouse for new, sometimes controversial tactics to confront illegal immigration because, as Goddard said in an interview, "we have it rubbed in our face on a daily basis."

Since the mid-1990s when a federal crackdown in San Diego and El Paso forced illegal immigrants into the desert, Arizona has become the highway through which millions of crossers enter the United States. In fiscal 2006, the U.S. Border Patrol apprehended more than 510,000 people attempting to unlawfully enter the United States via Arizona, half of the total for the 2,000-mile-long southern border, according to government statistics.

Phoenix is recognized as the hub of the immigrant smuggling trade, stocked with safe houses where illegal immigrants, known as pollos, or chickens, are held until relatives or friends pay about $1,600 a head and they are moved out on the highways that crisscross the city. In an affidavit filed late last year, Goddard's office contended that Phoenix-based immigrant smuggling enterprises had annual revenues of $1.7 billion to $2.5 billion. The Phoenix Police Department estimates that 50 percent of that city's murders involve either an illegal immigrant as assailant or victim.

Sheriff Joe Arpaio of Maricopa County, home to 3.5 million people, has made his department one of the first local law enforcement agencies in the nation to direct its deputies to arrest illegal immigrants under a state law. So far 400 have been arrested, although Arpaio's tactics are the subject of a lawsuit.

In addition to the Western Union suit, Goddard's fight against immigrant smugglers, who are sometimes called coyotes, has also prompted a federal lawsuit by a group of Western Union customers who allege that the attorney general's office seized their money and never returned it.

According to the suit, Goddard's investigators did not tell the senders that their transfers had been blocked (a charge Goddard did not dispute) and handed money over to recipients only after they had proved that the transfers were not being used for illegal activity. "So much for innocent until proven guilty," said Matthew Piers, the lead attorney in the case.

"We have law enforcement run wild down there," Piers said. "We support interdiction of money for coyotes, that's an activity well worth stopping. But the warrants in Arizona are so broad as to be ridiculous."

Goddard's prosecutors said 91 percent of the people whose money was seized were involved in either drug or immigrant smuggling. Joshua Hoyt, executive director of the Illinois Coalition for Immigrant and Refugee Rights, which interviewed more than 400 of Western Union's customers to help prepare the case, said that while the "clear majority" of the money senders were illegal immigrants, only a small fraction were involved in felonies. "This is a legal equivalent of a drive-by shooting," he said. "People were sending money to their relatives to buy medicine and food."

Goddard said he has proof that immigrant smugglers were continuing operations in Arizona and using Western Union branches in Sonora to stash their cash. According to an attorney general's office affidavit, a suspect, who had been picking up his cash in Arizona, received $270,000 within two months from a small Western Union stand in Sonora, another garnered $136,000, a third $113,000.

"It is obvious to us that they've just moved the cash aspect of their business out of state," he said, "but the smuggling operations remain in Arizona."

Goddard's tactics were also controversial because of federal concerns that his office was overreaching. When ICE Director Julie Myers visited Arizona in late 2005, Gov. Janet Napolitano (D) suggested that they hold a joint news conference in support of the warrants. Myers declined, officials from both the state and federal governments said. And ICE pulled out of the state's financial crimes task force.

But in recent months, relations between ICE and the Arizona state government have improved. A new special-agent-in-charge, Alonzo PeÃ±a, arrived from Texas after Napolitano pressured the federal government to transfer his predecessor, law enforcement officials said. ICE will soon rejoin the state's financial crimes task force.

In an interview, PeÃ±a said ICE is considering using the surveillance warrants as a tactic to fight immigrant smuggling; that way at least law enforcement could avoid Western Union's argument that Arizona was overreaching.

"I am not really concerned about what happened in the past," PeÃ±a said, "We just want to get in and participate . . . as long as it's legal and can be introduced in court."

KPMG Placed On State Probation In Tax-shelter Case (AP)

By David Koenig, AP Business Writer

DALLAS — Accounting firm KPMG LLP has agreed to be placed on probation for three years and pay a $96,000 fine to avoid losing its license to practice in Texas after an investigation into fraudulent tax shelters.

The company and the Texas State Board of Public Accountancy announced Thursday that they reached an agreement under which KPMG's license was suspended for five years but the sanction was blocked while the firm is on probation.

KPMG was also fined the maximum $1,000 for each of 96 violations of the state accountancy law, the board said.

The case stems from admissions the firm made to federal officials who investigated tax shelters that helped rich clients avoid billions in taxes.

KPMG reached a deferred-prosecution agreement with the Justice Department in August 2005, and a federal judge in New York dismissed a criminal charge this month after prosecutors said the firm had cooperated with the government's investigation.

The accounting firm has blamed the preparation of fraudulent tax returns and statements to support the tax shelters on former executives. The case against those executives is continuing.

William Treacy, executive director of the state accountancy board, said KPMG's license to practice in Texas would be suspended if it is convicted of failing to comply with terms of its deal with the Justice Department.

KPMG, which has more than 400 certified public accountants in Texas, said its activities would not be affected by probation.

"We are pleased that the Texas matter is now resolved and that it does not restrict in any way our ability to serve our clients in the state," said spokesman George Ledwith.

The case was settled through a consent order without holding a formal hearing. Ledwith said Texas is the first state to reach a settlement with the firm. Other states were considering action before KPMG settled with the Justice Department in 2005.

The accountancy board is the licensing and enforcement agency for certified public accountants and accounting firms in Texas. The agency's director said it was unusual for the board to bring a case against such a large accounting firm.

The last one, he said, involved Arthur Andersen LLP, which was convicted of obstruction of justice for shredding Enron documents. The U.S. Supreme Court overturned the conviction, but not before Andersen was devastated.

"Fortunately for the public, we don't have these very often — maybe every three or four years," Treacy said.

Kentucky Sewer District Settles With IRS Over Bond Proceeds (BLOOM)

By William Selway And Martin Z. Braun

Bloomberg, January 26, 2007

Jan. 25 (Bloomberg) -- Kentucky's largest municipal sewer operator reached a settlement with the Internal Revenue Service to prevent $68 million of bonds it sold a decade ago from losing their tax-exempt status.

Louisville and Jefferson County Metropolitan Sewer District's settlement stems from its use of bond proceeds to buy an option on an escrow account from Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., said Marion Gee, the district's finance director.

``What they determined is that you should not have used bond proceeds to purchase the put option," Gee said.

Three other local government agencies since November settled audits stemming from IRS concerns they may have overpaid for securities and options that the borrowers purchased with bond proceeds. The U.S. Justice Department is currently conducting a criminal investigation into the business of selling investment contracts to local governments.

Municipal borrowers purchase Treasury bonds for escrows used to refinance outstanding bonds. The income from those bonds is used to pay for the refinanced debt as it comes due.

Gee said the IRS didn't raise questions about the price the district paid for the option. Pottstown, Pennsylvania-based Investment Management Advisory Group Inc., one of at least three brokers that was raided in connection with the U.S. investigation, handled the bidding for the option, Gee said.

Debt Buyback

U.S. local governments agree to settlements with the IRS to prevent the agency from seeking taxes from investors who were willing to accept lower returns from their bonds because the securities weren't subject to income taxes. As part of the settlement, the district will repurchase $2.8 million of the bonds in November.

The district proposed the settlement under a program that allows municipal borrowers to head off audits if they discover that a bond issue may violate IRS regulations on tax-exempt bonds, it said in a bond filing. Gee declined to say how much the district agreed to pay to the IRS, though he said no other parties to the transaction have to pay the agency.

``I'm not at liberty to talk about that amount because the case hasn't legally been closed," he said.

Investment Management Advisory spokesman Gene Grabowski didn't immediately return a call seeking comment. Lehman Brothers spokesman Randy Whitestone declined to comment.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Touts Tax Breaks For Health Care VIDEO (KCS)

By Dave Helling

The Kansas City Star, January 26, 2007

President Bush told small business owners and health officials in Lee's Summit Thursday that new tax breaks will help Americans buy insurance, keep health care costs low, and maintain private control of health care decisions.

"We believe the private sector is the best delivery of health care," Bush told members of a selected audience at St. Luke's Hospital, East, in Lee's Summit, Mo. "We know there's a role for the federal government, but it's not to dictate, it's not to be the decision-maker," he said.

In his State of the Union speech Tuesday, Bush proposed taxing employer-provided health care benefits, after allowing a $7,500 deduction for individuals and $15,000 for families. He said the plan would help individuals buy insurance, while keeping health care costs low.

Bush traveled to the hospital to discuss the plans with small business owners, Health and Human Services secretary Mike Leavitt and St. Luke's CEO Richard Hastings.

Critics say the plan could raise taxes for some people with good health care plans and could convince some employers to drop health insurance for their workers.

Earlier, Bush toured the hospital, meeting with staff to talk about use of computers and technology to cut costs. "Medicine is finally catching up with the rest of America in the use of information technology, particularly this facility here," he said.

Bush Touts Health-Care Plan As Cost Control (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher And Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

LEE'S SUMMIT, Mo. Jan. 25 -- With his new health-care proposals receiving a frosty reception from Democrats on Capitol Hill, President Bush ventured here Thursday to make the case that his ideas offer the best remedy for the nation's health insurance crisis.

Speaking at a roundtable before an audience made up largely of journalists, Bush promoted his plan to offer new tax incentives for people to get modestly priced health insurance through their employers or on their own.

Bush, who announced the initiative Tuesday in his State of the Union address, said it is part of a larger strategy to use private-sector forces, new technology and changes in existing government programs to hold down health-care costs and improve access to medical coverage.

"The best way to do that is through private health insurance," Bush said. "Therein lies part of the debate we have in Washington. We believe the private sector is the best delivery of health care. We know there's a role for the federal government, but it's not to dictate, it's not to be the decision-maker."

The president wants to offer tax breaks for families who buy health insurance that costs less than $15,000 a year, and impose a new tax on those with more expensive plans. For individuals, the tax break would go to those with plans costing $7,500 or less.

Bush said his proposal would help some of the 47 million uninsured buy coverage, while giving everyone a financial incentive to seek reasonably priced health plans, which he said would slow spiraling health costs in the long run. He also promised to redirect some federal health money to state efforts to help low-income people and those whose chronic health conditions make it hard to get health insurance.

"There is no question in my mind that a proper role for the federal government is to help the poor and the elderly and the diseased get health care," Bush said. "We'll do that."

After touring facilities run by the high-tech St. Luke's East medical center here, Bush spoke in a session that included small-business owners and uninsured workers who would probably benefit from his plan.

The plan would end the tax code's longtime bias in favor of employer-sponsored insurance, allowing millions of people who buy policies in the individual market to enjoy a tax deduction on their premiums for the first time. The self-employed can deduct premium costs, but many others cannot.

Essentially, Bush would use the new tax on people with high-priced health plans to subsidize the cost of insurance for those with lower-priced coverage, a progressive feature that administration officials thought would draw interest from Democrats who now run Congress.

But so far Democrats have given the idea the cold shoulder, characterizing it as a tax on the middle class that would do little for the uninsured.

"I find the plan troubling because it does nothing to help people get insurance, hurts those who already have it and provides a tax break that benefits the wealthiest Americans," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said.

The administration, however, contends that the plan would eliminate the blatant disparity favoring employer-sponsored coverage, which has been a feature of the tax code since the middle of the last century. Currently employer contributions to their workers' health benefits do not count as taxable income for the employee, which administration officials say encourages workers to get more expensive plans and use more health care than they otherwise would. Buyers of insurance on the individual market do not enjoy the same tax advantages.

The idea of altering that balance dates at least to the early 1980s, when President Reagan proposed limiting the amount of employer health contributions that could be excluded from an employee's taxable income and diverting the resulting tax revenue to reducing the federal deficit.

Thomas A. Scully, a Republican congressional staffer at the time who later became a top health policy adviser to President George H.W. Bush, said the plan went nowhere: Republicans panned it as a tax increase, and Democrats feared it would penalize some unionized workers with generous health benefits.

In 1992, under the first President Bush, the White House considered scaling back the unlimited tax break on employer coverage and using the new revenue to pay for refundable tax credits to help low-income people get coverage, Scully said. House Republicans, still smarting from Bush's decision to raise taxes as part of the 1990 budget deal, objected, and Bush's advisers stripped the plan out of the budget at the last minute.

"The political timing was terrible," Scully said.

A proposal similar to the current one was recommended two years ago by a presidential advisory panel studying the federal tax system. The panel recommended capping the exclusion from taxable income of employment-based health benefits at $11,500 for family coverage and $5,000 for individuals, starting in 2006. The key difference was that the panel's proposal would have limited the new deduction to the cost of premiums, while Bush's plan would allow even those with cheaper policies to claim the full $15,000 amount.

"The truth is that policy wonks have been talking about this for well more than 20 years, but politicians generally look at it and say, 'This doesn't look like a good deal for me,' " said Joseph Antos, a health economist at the American Enterprise Institute who supports the new Bush plan. "As we've joked around here for years, it's an idea that only a policy wonk could love."

Not so, said Bush.

"If people in Washington are serious about dealing with the uninsured, here is a serious idea for them to consider," he said. "They're just dismissing things because of pure politics; we have put forth ideas that are worthy of debate, and we believe will work."

Bush Promotes His Healthcare Proposal (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2007

He defends his plan to tax some employer-paid coverage, saying it would rectify 'discrimination … based upon who you work for.'

DOJ_NMG_0122318

LEE'S SUMMIT, MO. — President Bush traveled to a Missouri hospital Thursday to press his case that Congress should sign on to his healthcare proposals, including his idea to pay for his initiative by taxing some employer-paid insurance premiums as employee income.

Unlike similar town-hall-style events that the White House bills as "conversations," the round table at St. Luke's East hospital had no audience other than about 30 reporters.

"If you work for a company, you get your healthcare free, in essence. It's part of the benefits package," Bush told his seven guests, who included several small-business owners and an uninsured waitress. "If you're a stand-alone person, you pay your healthcare on an after-tax basis.

"In other words, there's discrimination in the tax code based upon who you work for. It makes it harder for individuals or small-company employees to be able to buy healthcare," the president said.

Members of Congress have given the idea a cold reception, saying the idea would make little headway toward obtaining healthcare for the 47 million people in the United States who are uninsured and would eventually raise costs for average families.

Bush toured the new hospital, part of St. Luke's Health System of Kansas City, Mo., to examine its use of information technology, another cause he has promoted. In the emergency room, Bush admired a flat-screen television monitor with a blinking display of patients' vital signs, procedures and medications.

"Medicine is finally catching up with the rest of America in terms of information technology," Bush told the assembled doctors and nurses.

In his State of the Union address, the president proposed making health insurance premiums paid by employers taxable to their employees as part of their compensation. At the same time, every family would get a standard healthcare deduction of $15,000 ($7,500 for singles).

That would mean that families with total healthcare premiums less than $15,000 would get a tax break, but those with what Bush has termed "gold-plated" plans would have to pay income tax on the amount over $15,000.

The president argues that his proposal would level the playing field for those without employer-sponsored health insurance, because the standard deduction would be available to everyone. And that would make it easier for more people to afford to buy individual health insurance.

However, many healthcare experts say that the president's proposal will do little to help most of those who have no health insurance. That is because about half of the uninsured earn so little that they do not file income taxes, so the standard deduction would not help them.

Currently, about 25% of employer health plans cost companies and their employees more than $15,000 a year, meaning that roughly 75% of those with employer health plans would get a tax break under the president's proposal. But healthcare experts say that those savings could be short-lived; the deduction and cap will be indexed to inflation, whereas healthcare costs have been rising faster than the inflation rate.

Esmerelda Wergin, a waitress at her grandmother's Mexican restaurant, told the president that she and her husband had been unable to afford health coverage for themselves and their two sons, either through a job or on their own.

"Some jobs offer you health insurance plans, but they cover nothing…. It's really hard to find one that's going to suit your family's needs," Wergin said.

Bush said the Wergins would save $3,500 in taxes under his proposal, money they could put toward health insurance.

"Rather than have a family sit outside the system … why not help them afford a healthcare system through making the tax code fair?" Bush asked.

Bush Health Plan Leaves Questions (PD)

By Mary Vanac

Cleveland Plain Dealer, January 26, 2007

Mary Vanac Plain Dealer Reporter

DOJ_NMG_0122319

Local insurers and employee group advocates aren't entirely sure what to make of President Bush's proposal to change the way we pay for health insurance.

During his State of the Union address Tuesday evening, Bush proposed giving a $7,500 deduction to single taxpayers and a $15,000 tax deduction to families who buy health insurance.

Practically speaking, taxpayers who pay for their own health insurance would benefit directly from the proposal.

Those who can afford health insurance but have not yet purchased it also could benefit, said Steve Millard, executive director of the Council of Smaller Enterprises, a unit of the Greater Cleveland Partnership.

But this group could account for less than 10 percent of the estimated 40 million Americans who do not have health insurance, Millard said.

But for the majority of taxpayers who get their medical insurance through an employer, the proposal means shifting that employer-paid benefit to employees as income.

This income would be tax-free up to the deduction amounts, but amounts exceeding the deductions would be taxable income for the first time.

Many of the details surrounding the Bush proposal still aren't clear, said Joe Gibbons, government-relations director for Medical Mutual of Ohio in Cleveland.

"The president offered up an interesting concept, which deserves a full review," Gibbons said.

Jim Kappel, spokesman for WellPoint Inc., the Indianapolis owner of Anthem Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Ohio, said, "Tax policy can be an important way for people to consider health coverage."

Like many insurers and states, WellPoint has its own ideas about how to reform the U.S. health insurance system.

A WellPoint plan announced this month called for universal coverage for children and for expanding programs for the neediest, Kappel said.

John Ryan, outgoing head of the North Shore Federation of Labor, said the proposal raised concerns for people who have medical insurance, as well as those who don't.

"For people who have health-care coverage, it provides a foot in the door for tax benefits," said Ryan, who plans to become U.S. Sen. Sherrod Brown's Ohio director after his replacement at the former Cleveland AFL-CIO Federation is found.

But workers who now receive generous health-care benefits could pay taxes they don't have to pay today, he said.

People who don't have insurance because they can't afford it, though, won't benefit from a tax deduction.

"The proposal falls short of what working families need," Ryan said.

"The only good thing about [Bush's] proposal on health care is that he has stated there's a problem," Ryan said.

COSE's Millard said he was glad to see that health care made the first 10 minutes of Bush's speech.

"I liked the comments he made supporting the Voinovich bill and alternatives for how states deal with health care costs," Millard said, referring to Ohio Republican Sen. George Voinovich's idea to provide waivers for Medicaid recipients that could bring more federal dollars to states like Ohio.

"We are advocating a number of things for changing the health care system," Millard said. Pairing the president's proposed tax deductions with a requirement that all Americans have health care coverage will bring change to the health care system, he said.

Bush Pushes Health Care Plan (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

LEE'S SUMMIT, Mo., Jan. 25 — President Bush urged Congress on Thursday to consider his new health care proposal and indicated he was ready for a fight.

"If people in Washington are serious about dealing with the uninsured, here is a serious idea for them to consider," Mr. Bush said of his health care plan. "They're just dismissing things because of pure politics."

Mr. Bush's comments came in a discussion with local doctors, small-business owners and workers here on the second stop of a tour to promote policies he proposed during his State of the Union address on Tuesday night.

Even before the speech, Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York and chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, had cast doubt on the chances of Mr. Bush's package of proposals, which is intended to improve access to health insurance with changes in the tax code. Mr. Rangel called it "a bad policy"; other Democratic leaders have since called the proposal all but "dead on arrival."

Under the proposal, workers would be newly taxed on health care plans provided by employers that were valued above new — and, administration officials say, generous — standard deductions for health care benefits. Individuals would in turn be able to buy insurance plans tax-free.

White House officials said they had received more positive feedback from some Senate Democrats, but the plan has drawn fierce resistance from the labor unions.

With record low approval ratings and most of his remaining political capital going into the defense of his new strategy for the Iraq war, Mr. Bush has little sway over Congress on his new plans, pollsters and analysts say.

But Mr. Bush's aides have said that they would try to build pressure on Democrats by accusing them of turning their backs on his proposals before truly considering them.

"We proposed a bold initiative," Mr. Bush said here. "I know Americans expect that the United States Congress will take a look at all ideas."

The president spoke at St. Luke's Hospital here, where he asked a group of workers, business owners and administrators how the current system worked against them and how the new system would help them.

Martha Gelencher, a small-business owner sitting with the president, said in a typically glowing exchange about the proposal that she could not imagine "why someone would not think it would be a good thing."

Mr. Bush portrayed the plan as in keeping with his philosophy that it was government's role to enable people to become the "decision maker," reminiscent of his reference to himself last year as "the decider."

Bush Comes To Missouri To Promote Health Plan (SLPD)

By David Twiddy

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, January 26, 2007

LEE'S SUMMIT, Mo. (AP) -- In town to push his proposal to expand access to health insurance, President Bush on Thursday praised advanced patient care technology at a local hospital.

Bush toured the Lee's Summit campus of the Saint Luke's Health System, which is less than two years old and features an array of high-tech systems that closely track patient care, even from half a state away.

In one room, Bush studied a wall of computer screens that included medical information on every patient currently receiving treatment in the hospital's emergency room, including the X-ray of a girl who had dislocated her elbow.

In another room in the intensive care unit, hospital officials showed the president a high-powered camera above a bed that would allow physicians anywhere to keep an eye on the patient's progress. A similar system allows hospital employees to watch patients at ICUs in other Saint Luke's system hospitals, including one in Hays, Kan.

"Medicine is finally catching up with the rest of America in the use of technology," said Bush, who has advocated for greater use of computerized health records as a way to bring down costs and reduce medical errors.

Afterward, Bush attended a round-table discussion in one of the hospital's conference rooms with a group of small-business owners and employees, hearing their concerns about paying for insurance.

In his State of the Union address Tuesday, Bush proposed taxing employer-financed health care benefits after a deduction of $15,000 for families and $7,500 for individuals. The deductions would also apply to people buying their own insurance plans.

The White House estimates about 80 percent of workers with health insurance would see a tax cut because of the change. The other 20 percent would see a tax increase if their insurance was worth more than the deductions.

Bush defended the plan Thursday, saying it would "level the playing field" between small businesses and large businesses, which typically get a discount because of their size and help more people afford coverage.

"If you work for a company you get your health care for free, in essence, because it's part of your benefit package," he said. "If you're a stand-alone person, you're paying for your insurance on an after-tax basis. There's discrimination in the tax code based on who you work for."

The Missouri Democratic Party joined other critics of the plan, saying it wouldn't help reduce the millions of people living without insurance and could encourage employers to limit or drop high-quality coverage.

"You don't make health care more affordable by increasing taxes on middle-class families that work hard and currently have good health care coverage," said Jack Cardetti, the state party spokesman.

Sherwin Carroll, president of the Missouri-Kansas State Council for the Service Employees International Union, said the poorest people will have to use any tax savings they receive for other living expenses, not insurance.

"We know tax cuts don't help the general public," Carroll said. "It gets President Bush around the real issue, which is universal health care."

"If people in Washington are serious about dealing with the uninsured, this is a serious idea for them to consider," he said.

As an example, he pointed to Dan Jones, a St. Louis computer engineer and one of the round-table participants, who said he's been without insurance since dropping his individual plan when premiums got to $400 a month.

"That $4,800 (a year's worth of premiums) is a lot of money," he said. "That's money that could go toward a car or a house."

Bush said the plan would save Jones more than the cost for an individual insurance plan.

"Here's a classic case, a young guy in the marketplace priced out of the individual market," he said. "The plan helps him."

Bush Promotes Health Care Proposal (USAT)

By David Jackson

Bush's proposal would give individuals a $7,500 tax deduction regardless of whether they buy their own health insurance or their employers pay for it. Families would receive a $15,000 deduction. It was unveiled during Tuesday's State of the Union speech.

VIDEO: Bush tours hospital

"Your health care proposal looks very profitable to me," Jones told Bush Thursday at a roundtable discussion.

Jones, who lives in St. Louis and works for a computer company, said he would be able to buy an insurance policy under Bush's plan and have money left over. Jones would be able to reduce his taxable income by $7,500, even if he spends less on health insurance.

On the second of his road trips to sell his State of the Union ideas, Bush told a group of medical professionals that the federal government should make health insurance and care more affordable. An estimated 47 million Americans are uninsured.

"The (health care) system discriminates against the Dan Joneses because the tax code … has made it harder for him," the president said. "We're trying to move somebody like Dan from being a statistic."

Democrats criticized Bush's plan. In Washington, a fact sheet released by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid's office said it would "prompt employers to stop offering health care."

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., who is exploring a White House bid, said Bush's proposal was a "halfway measure" that "does little to bring down costs or guarantee coverage."

Before the roundtable discussion on health care, Bush toured St. Luke's East hospital and learned more about new technologies that help doctors treat and diagnose diseases. The president said he wants to find ways to use information technology to help people understand the costs of medical services.

He also repeated his call for reducing the number of medical liability lawsuits, as a way to curb health care costs. "When you've got a lawsuit, it causes good docs to quit the practice of medicine," he said.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto said public pressure — and demand for better health care — would force Republicans in Bush's party and Democrats who control Congress to work together.

"The American people are rightly concerned about any plan that will put the government between patients and their doctors," Fratto said. "Good ideas that avoid that pitfall will have a chance to prevail."

On Capitol Hill, Republicans such as Sen. George Voinovich of Ohio have expressed concern that the war in Iraq could affect Bush's ability to press a domestic agenda with Congress.

Bush meets today with House Republicans to discuss health care, energy, immigration and other issues.

"They're going to want to talk about issues that came up in the State of the Union address," White House press secretary Tony Snow said, "because that is going to play a significant role in politics over the next few months."

Leavitt Espouses Health Plan (WT)

By Gregory Lopes

The Washington Times, January 26, 2007

During the next three months, Secretary of Health and Human Services Michael O. Leavitt will travel the country to drum up support for the Bush administration's proposals for health care coverage.

Not since the early days of the Clinton administration has so much attention been paid to the problem of medical insurance.

It has been a dizzying month of calls for reforms, with conservative industry groups and liberal advocacy organizations joining forces on proposals to reduce the legions of the underinsured and uninsured.

While the new attention is necessary, it may not be effective.

"What we have here is a convergence of philosophies between the Democrats in Congress that want to expand the employer system and public programs and Republicans [the Bush administration] who believe the individual system is where we need to go," said Robert Laszewski, president of Health Policy and Strategy Associates. "You don't split the difference, we're stalemated until 2008."

The president released his proposals to Congress shortly before the State of the Union address. Almost immediately the plan was criticized on Capitol Hill.

"President Bush's proposal on health care is another step in the wrong direction," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, at the U.S. Conference of Mayors on Wednesday.

"It will actually raise taxes on middle-class families lucky enough to have good health insurance, while providing little assistance to the 47 million uninsured Americans. Quite simply, it's bad medicine."

The Democrats do not favor the president's tax proposals but Mr. Leavitt was adamant that the states alone cannot solve the problem of the uninsured.

The problem, as Mr. Leavitt explained, is that low-income people with no employer insurance must buy individual health insurance after they pay their income taxes. "It's not fair," he said.

So the administration is proposing to reform the tax code by giving families a $15,000 deduction and individuals a $7,500 deduction. But Families USA, a nonprofit consumer organization, calls the tax-reform proposal regressive, partly because a tax deduction favors people with higher incomes.

A tax credit provides more tax relief. For a family in a 15 percent tax bracket, a tax deduction reduces their tax liability by only 15 cents for every dollar spent on premiums. The Families USA analysis shows that for a family in a 15 percent bracket, the tax deduction is worth $2,250.

When asked why a deduction rather than a credit, the secretary said that the administration considered a tax credit and that "a tax credit certainly has redeeming features."

"If exclusion [deduction] is not the solution, let's talk about what is a solution, but I believe exclusion is the best policy," he said.

Under the proposal, Mr. Leavitt said 23 million to 28 million people would pay more taxes on their insurance because, for the first time, the government would levy a tax on the value of employer-sponsored health insurance in some cases. Currently, most employees are not taxed on the value of their employer-sponsored health insurance.

Meanwhile, the industry/advocacy coalition proposal, while also offering tax incentives, calls for not only an expansion of the State Children's Health Insurance Program but also broadening the coverage power of Medicaid to childless adults.

White House Touts Health Care Savings (AP)

By Kevin Freking

AP, January 26, 2007

Get health insurance through your employer? The average cost of a family policy is about $11,500, low enough to get you a tax break under President Bush's new health care initiative.

If an employer-provided plan covers you alone, the policy costs just under $4,250 on average, still low enough for a tax cut.

The administration says its proposal would enable more Americans to afford health insurance, reducing the ranks of the uninsured _ now estimated at 46.6 million _ by 5 percent to 10 percent.

The president hit the road Thursday to sell his health care plan, talking it up at a conference in Lee's Summit, Mo. But it has received a cold response from key Democrats in Congress.

The plan would do two things: For the first time, the cost of an insurance policy would be treated as taxable income. The cost includes both the employer's and the employee's payments. The result is that workers' taxable wages would shoot up dramatically.

But, then, the president calls for a standard tax deduction for those who buy health insurance _ $15,000 for family coverage and $7,500 for individual coverage. So, the key to getting a tax cut will be to keep the cost of the policy below the size of the new deduction.

The result of the proposed change would be that, initially, about 80 percent of workers who get insurance through their jobs would be in the camp that gets a tax cut. About 20 percent would see a tax increase.

A smaller group of Americans, about 17.8 million, buy health insurance on their own because their job doesn't provide it or they can't afford the coverage their employer offers. Almost all of them would experience a substantial tax cut.

That's because they don't have a boss fronting the cost of their insurance on a tax-free basis. They pay for it themselves, and get little tax help unless they spend at least 7.5 percent of their adjusted gross income on health care.

Karen Davis, president of the Commonwealth Fund, said the people who buy insurance on their own are typically baby boomers. Of the 12 million adults in the individual market, 40 percent of them make more than $50,000 a year.

They would save, on average, about $2,500 when buying individual coverage, and $5,000 on family coverage, she said.

"I definitely think it is fiscal relief" for those in the individual market, Davis said.

That relief is much more mixed when it comes to people who get health insurance through their work, she said.

Just how much one pays or saves depends upon which income tax bracket they're in. The administration projects that the greatest benefit would go to the middle class.

The wealthy tend to have the most expensive policies, and many of them can expect to pay higher taxes. Meanwhile, the poor generally don't pay any income tax, so the help they get would be limited to lower payroll taxes.

The administration has referred to health insurance policies exceeding $15,000 for a family or $7,500 for an individual as gold-plated, but many disagree with that assessment.

"Not all these policies are gold-plated. What you get depends on where you live, where you work and what the cost of insurance is in that area," said Diane Rowland, executive vice president of the Kaiser Family Foundation.

Workers in established manufacturing industries, such as the auto and steel industry, tend to have generous health insurance benefits, so they could see their taxes go up if they stick with their current policy. So could many government workers.

Also, large firms tend to have better, more expensive policies than do small businesses. Davis said that large businesses tend to treat the great majority of employees equally.

"Typically, the person working in the mail room has the same health coverage as the person working as an executive," Davis said.

But John Goodman, president and CEO of the National Center for Policy Analysis, disagreed. He said executives at large corporations often get extra benefits on top of the insurance that everyone else at the company gets. They'll get annual checkups and undergo screenings at the most renowned medical facilities such as the Mayo Clinic, or in his home town of Dallas, the Cooper Clinic. It makes little sense for the government to subsidize such health insurance plans, he said.

While more than 100 million people would get a tax break, the administration estimates, more than 55 percent of the uninsured _ about 25 million people _ have such low incomes that they pay no income taxes, Davis said. So the tax changes would not make insurance any more affordable for them, she said.

The president's plan would not kick in until 2009. Over the years, the standard deduction would increase at the rate of overall inflation. But some tax analysts warn that the deduction would still lose value as a result.

That's because health insurance premiums have been going up much more quickly than inflation, so, eventually, more taxpayers will fall into that camp whose health insurance cost more than the deductible. When that happens, they have two choices, pay more taxes or select more basic, less expensive insurance plans.

The administration says it believes that people will seek out more basic coverage to avoid tax increases.

"We think that will bring down national health spending," said Katherine Baicker, who serves on the president's council of economic advisers.

Some analysts also worry that more small businesses will drop coverage if they know their workers can get coverage on the individual market, thanks to the new tax breaks for people buying insurance on their own.

Coverage in the individual market is generally cheaper than coverage in the group market, but many Americans, particularly those with pre-existing health conditions, will find it difficult getting a company to sell them a policy, said Len Burman of the Tax Policy Center, a joint program run by the Urban Institute and the Brookings Institution.

"For many, the nongroup market doesn't work well," Burman said. "It works fine for people who are healthy. It just doesn't work well for people who are sick."

Bush's Health Plan Might Look Familiar To Utah (SLT)

By Robert Gehrke

Salt Lake Tribune, January 26, 2007

Now, a decade later, the Health and Human Services secretary has the challenge of trying to sell a similar plan outlined in President Bush's State of the Union to deeply skeptical Democrats in Congress.

"Our goal is to get a plan for affordable, basic insurance, accessible to every citizen in every state," Leavitt told reporters Wednesday.

The Bush plan extends tax deductions to help self-employed workers or those whose employers don't offer insurance buy health coverage.

"If you're a waitress or you're a bricklayer or you're a day care worker . . . it's simply too big of a lift," Leavitt said.

There are currently about 47 million Americans without health insurance.

DOJ_NMG_0122325

The second part of the plan would tax health care benefits provided by employers that exceed $15,000 for families and $7,500 for individuals.

About 20 percent of workers with plans worth more than the deduction - policies the administration calls "gold-plated" coverage - would pay taxes. However, the White House projects that after 10 years, nearly 40 percent of workers would see a tax increase or have to find a cheaper policy, White House spokesman Tony Fratto said.

That's because the cost of health care

is projected to grow faster than the value of the tax deduction, meaning that, barring changes the White House hopes will keep health costs down, more workers would have health coverage worth more than the deduction.

Leavitt said the tax issue is a question of fairness that has to be addressed if the goal is coverage for every American.

"In my mind, it's simply indefensible for our country to have a tax policy that provides a tax benefit to portion of our citizens and simply ignores the rest, and that's the policy we currently have," he said.

As governor, Leavitt proposed, and the Legislature passed, a similar proposal exempting health care costs from state income taxes, but "it became very clear that it was essentially just a gesture."

"This dilemma is simply unresolvable by the states," he said. "It has to be dealt with by the federal government."

Leavitt and the administration face a skeptical Congress.

Rep. Pete Stark, D-Calif., who chairs a House health subcommittee, said the president's plan won't help the uninsured and will discourage employers from covering workers. Senate health committee Chairman Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said the tax breaks won't improve coverage or "help working families afford the spiraling cost of health care."

Utah health care advocates also have reservations about Bush's health care plans.

"These tax credits aren't going to come anywhere near what it's going to cost families to have credible health coverage," said Judi Hilman, executive director of the Utah Health Policy Project.

Leavitt also outlined a plan to redirect money paid to hospitals to provide care for the uninsured into new, basic health insurance polices devised by the states. He said that, for the $38.5 billion now going to hospitals, all of the uninsured earning up to twice the poverty level could be covered and have money left over.

Again, as governor, Leavitt tried something similar, reducing some benefits to Medicaid recipients to try to provide coverage to uninsured Utahns.

"I took criticism from advocacy groups, but I got letter after letter after letter of appreciation from nearly 20,000 families that had health insurance for the first time," Leavitt said.

Bush's Budget Will Detail Plans To Slow Spending On Medicare (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson said the Bush administration will offer specific proposals to significantly slow growth in Medicare spending in its new budget, but that there is little he or the president can do to jump-start the stalled effort to fix Social Security until Republicans and Democrats in Congress are ready.

Read excerpts2 from the interview with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson.

In an interview yesterday, Mr. Paulson said the budget for fiscal 2008, which begins Oct. 1, will include a number of "incremental changes" to government health programs, including some aimed at slowing the projected 7% annual growth in Medicare spending. The budget is to be released on Feb. 5.

Mr. Paulson wouldn't discuss details. Others say the savings -- expected to add up to $90 billion over five years -- are expected to come mainly from squeezing health providers, though some beneficiaries would be affected directly.

"When the budget goes up you will see a number of changes relating to Medicare which are aimed at slowing the growth of these liabilities, slowing the trajectory," Mr. Paulson said.

Talking to Congress

DOJ_NMG_0122326

Mr. Paulson, who took office six months ago, said he is spending much of his time talking to members of Congress about the urgency of restraining health costs and reducing the nation's reliance on foreign oil.

Restraining the costs of the Medicare health insurance program for the elderly will help the White House show a budget that is balanced by 2012.

The program cost about $374 billion last year, about 14% of all federal spending. Without any changes, the Congressional Budget Office estimates it will cost $851 billion by 2017.

The proposals to save the government money on Medicare complement President Bush's plan to change the tax law to make employer-provided health insurance taxable as income and to exclude $15,000 of that income per family to encourage people to choose cheaper health-insurance plans, Mr. Paulson said. Calling the proposal "a big idea," he said it is intended to advance the national conversation about health care and make Americans better consumers of health care and thus restrain cost increases over time.

On Social Security, Mr. Paulson acknowledged that it may be hard to meet the president's goal of fixing the long-term finances of the government's retirement program, given the "significant political differences and policy differences on what steps are to be taken."

In his State of the Union address, Mr. Bush said failure to put Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security on strong financial footing "will one day leave our children with three bad options: huge tax increases, huge deficits, or huge and immediate cuts in benefits."

Mr. Paulson said he has been reaching out to Democrats and Republicans in Congress to start a discussion without any "preconditions." Mr. Bush has pushed the notion of creating private accounts as part of a Social Security fix; Democrats have resisted. Mr. Paulson insisted nothing is off the table, refusing, for instance, to rule out discussion of changes to the payroll tax. "The key thing is to come together without preconditions," he said. "It's only fair that if you're going to have a bipartisan discussion, you can't tell someone we're not going to let you talk about your idea."

In a Fox News interview last week, Vice President Dick Cheney sounded a different tone, saying that the president wants a discussion without "preconditions" but that "we don't believe a tax increase is necessary." Those comments drew fire from Democrats.

Asked about Mr. Cheney's remarks, Mr. Paulson said, "The president has been very clear. He'd like people to come together without preconditions."

'Can't Force Something'

Mr. Paulson said even creating a path for his successor to solve the Social Security problem would be progress. "We can't force something," he said. "If we get fortunate there will be enough momentum and the leaders in both bodies of Congress will work together and we'll craft a solution. But if we don't, hopefully if I do my job right, if others do the things they're doing, we'll make progress. We'll depoliticize this and it will be easier for someone, sometime in the future to solve."

The secretary, an active environmentalist before coming to Washington, also emphasized the urgency of taking action to reduce the nation's dependence on oil, saying "one of the significant risks to our economy is imported oil" and said the solution lies primarily in reducing the reliance of automobiles on gasoline.

Mr. Bush has called for a 20% cut in gasoline consumption over the next 10 years, and would achieve that through new auto fuel-economy standards and a mandate to use more ethanol and other alternative energy.

"This is aggressive," Mr. Paulson said. "By putting a mandate of that size out there, I believe that is going to spur, and I know the president does, huge technological advances in investment," he said, adding: "If we can have 20% of our transport fuel not come from oil, that will make a big difference."

Growing Support Of Public (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0122327

In new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll1, Americans back Democrats by 35 percentage points on prescription drugs for seniors amid looming showdown with White House over Medicare drug benefit. Since Bush's presidency began, Democrats have turned an eight-point deficit on taxes into an eight-point edge, and narrowed deficit on "moral values" to nine points from 22.

Approaching 2008, Democrats have "a once-in-a-generation opportunity to be...reconsidered" as a national party, says Republican pollster Bill McInturff, who conducts the Journal/NBC survey with Democratic counterpart Peter Hart. In new book, Senate Democrats' campaign chief Schumer of New York recommends a "kitchen-table compact" including unconventional issues like reduced cancer mortality to court centrists like the fictional couple "Joe and Eileen Bailey" he uses to shape strategy.

The Baileys remain "up for grabs," Schumer says, "but they're more open to our message than theirs."

Congress attracts promising initial reviews.

By 53% to 44%, Americans say new House ethics rules will improve lawmakers' "ethics and honesty." A 48% plurality predicts Democratic Congress will "strike the right balance" with Bush; 12 years ago, a 47% plurality of Americans predicted the new Republican Congress would be "too inflexible" with then-President Clinton.

Speaker Pelosi's positive rating rises modestly to 28%, while 24% view her negatively. Three-fourths of Americans now recognize her name; most still don't know Senate Democratic Leader Reid, Senate Republican Leader McConnell or House Republican leader Boehner.

Health care returns to spotlight but still poses political risks.

A 53% majority expresses willingness to pay higher taxes so everyone can have health insurance. But that's down from 66% when Bill and Hillary Clinton pursued universal coverage unsuccessfully in 1993.

Resistance is greatest among those earning more than $75,000. Americans embrace coverage mandates pushed by Romney of Massachusetts and Schwarzenegger of California as good ideas, but by only a bare 48%-42% plurality; those 50 or older, the most-frequent voters, are least supportive.

Obama's backing of universal coverage may draw other African-Americans, who support the goal more than whites or Hispanics.

AS IRAQ COSTS mount, administration leans on private companies to help rebuild Lebanon as part of broader Mideast peace strategy; Intel and Cisco executives attend Paris donors' conference where Rice announces $770 million in U.S. aid. Some 49% of Americans say average U.S. citizen has sacrificed for Iraq war; 48% say no.

NEGOTIATORS STRUGGLE to complete U.S.-South Korea trade pact, which would be the biggest since Nafta. Among sticking points: Korean market access for U.S.-produced beef and autos. Among blue-collar workers, 28% call "jobs going overseas" the economic issue that concerns them most; 29% cite health costs.

SALES JOB: With just 40% approving his handling of the economy, Bush heads to Peoria and New York next week to promote recent signs of strength and rising wages. Treasury Secretary Paulson calls economy "a hell of a lot better than we thought it would be a year ago."

WHAT SLUMP? Majorities in all parts of the country say their home values are still rising. Most bullish are Southerners (65%); least bullish are Midwesterners (52%).

Charities chafe at Bush's foreign-aid priorities.

Antipoverty groups say U.S. would improve international image by emphasizing efforts against poverty and disease rather than democratization. "America has the opportunity to present a different face abroad," says Samuel Worthington of InterAction, an umbrella group with members including CARE and World Vision.

Though conservatives still strongly approve Bush's foreign policy, evangelicals are now split. Among families containing military veterans or active-duty soldiers, 55% disapprove Bush's handling of Iraq and 54% say the war hasn't been worth the costs.

MINOR MEMOS: Despite election thumping, 40% of Republicans characterize themselves as very happy compared with 26% of Democrats. ... Most likely to say they've taken antidepressants: women, whites, those earning less than $30,000 and liberals.

The President's Risky Health Plan (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0122328

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

The new health care proposals announced by President Bush this week purport to tackle the two toughest problems confronting the American health care system: the rising number of uninsured Americans and the escalating costs of medical care.

But on both counts, they fall miles short of what is needed to fix a system where — scandalously — 47 million Americans go without health insurance.

The financial sinkhole in Iraq and huge tax cuts for wealthy Americans have left the administration with no money to really address the problem. To keep the program "revenue neutral," Mr. Bush would instead use tax subsidies to encourage more people to buy their own health insurance, while imposing additional taxes on people who have what Mr. Bush deems "gold plated" insurance.

It is a formula that would do little to reduce the number of uninsured Americans and would have a high risk of producing pernicious results. Even White House officials acknowledged earlier this week that they expected the number of uninsured to drop by only three million to five million people as a result of Mr. Bush's proposals. They expect the states to take on most of the burden.

One enlightened element is that the plan would provide equal tax treatment to those who bought their insurance policies on the individual market and those who got coverage through group policies at work, thus ending a longstanding inequity that favors employer-based policies. To level the playing field, the administration proposes to grant everyone who gets qualifying health insurance a standard deduction — $15,000 for family coverage or $7,500 for single coverage — off their income subject to taxation. Those with family policies exceeding $15,000 in value would have to pay taxes on the excess amount.

After the proposed starting date in 2009, the administration estimates, about 80 percent of workers with employer-provided policies would pay lower taxes and 20 percent would pay higher taxes, unless they reduced the value of their health coverage to fit within the standard deduction.

The new standard deduction would almost certainly entice some people to buy health insurance who had previously elected not to. But a tax deduction is of little value to people so poor that they pay little or no income tax. And unfortunately, it is those people who account for the vast majority of the nation's uninsured.

Instead of trying to fix that fundamental flaw, the administration has decided instead to buck it to the states. The White House has offered few details. But its idea is to allow states to redirect federal money that now helps to finance hospitals that provide charity care and use it instead to subsidize health insurance for the poor.

In an ideal world, it would make good sense to insure people in advance rather than wait for them to show up in a high-cost emergency room. But this plan could quickly cripple the safety-net hospitals. Fortunately, no governor would have to accept the offer to redirect funds. The scheme is mostly a reflection of how the administration is unwilling to accept true responsibility for the uninsured.

If the administration really wanted to help low-income people, it would have proposed a refundable tax credit that would have the same dollar value for everyone — instead of a tax deduction, which primarily helps people in high tax brackets. Even those who do not pay taxes would get a check for the dollar value of the credit, providing them at least some money to help pay for health insurance. Congress ought to recognize that credits are the better approach for even such a limited plan.

As for the tax increases on those "gold plated" health policies, the White House is hoping to discourage people from using high-priced comprehensive health policies that cover everything from routine office visits to costly diagnostic procedures that are not always necessary.

The administration's goal is to instead encourage people to take out policies that might reduce the use of medical services, like policies with high deductibles or co-payments, or managed care plans. But even "copper plated" policies can exceed $15,000 in cost if they are issued in areas where medical prices are high or to groups with high numbers of older or chronically ill workers.

The whole approach rests on the premise that comprehensive prepaid health policies are a major factor in driving up costs; the theory is that people will tend to use services if they are covered. There is probably some truth in that.

But the main drivers in rising health costs are the costly services, high-priced drugs and hospitalizations for people who are seriously ill with catastrophic diseases or multiple chronic illnesses. Making their health coverage less generous would simply make it harder for them to get the care they need.

The greatest risk in the president's proposal is that it would seem likely to lead many small- and medium-size employers to stop offering health benefits altogether on the theory that their workers could buy affordable insurance on their own. That would leave many more Americans at the mercy of the dysfunctional individual policy market, where administrative costs are high and insurers strive to avoid covering people who are apt to become sick and need costly care.

For all its fanfare, Mr. Bush's plan would be unlikely to reduce the ranks of the uninsured very much. And if things went badly, it could actually increase their numbers. That's not the answer Americans are waiting for and not what they deserve.

Bush Plan Won't Fix Broken Health Insurance System (FLSUNSEN)

By Michael Mayo

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, January 26, 2007

To see how spectacularly off the mark President Bush's proposal to solve the health insurance crisis is, consider the case of Celestine Pearson.

"We're already capped out on our deductions, because we got five of us living on one part-time salary," Pearson said. "So how is this [$15,000 tax credit] going to benefit us? We won't get any more tax breaks, and health insurance still won't be affordable."

I met her outside Memorial Regional Hospital in Hollywood on Wednesday, where her 10-year-old son was having minor surgery.

She and her husband have been without health insurance for a year, when he lost his job with the state as a toll collector. He now has a part-time job that doesn't include benefits.

They live in Miami Gardens and have four children: 10, 13, 15 and 19.

She said the three youngest have medical coverage through Medicaid and the state. Their oldest, a biology student on scholarship at the University of South Florida in Tampa, has been uninsured since she turned 18.

"The president may have some people's interests at heart, but I don't think it's probably mine," said Pearson, 43.

Pearson said the family hasn't even bothered shopping for new insurance since losing the HMO plan that came with her husband's former job. She ticked off the other things that take priority: rent, food, electric bill, clothes.

Now that she, her husband and oldest daughter are among the 3.6 million Floridians without health insurance, she said they have adopted a new "preventative care" plan.

"Basically we're neglecting ourselves and praying we don't get sick," Pearson said.

"The politicians talk as if they care, but when it comes down to actually providing, they do nothing."

Actually, Bush's plan might be worse than nothing. It would reward high-income workers in low-cost plans, penalize middle-class families who live in high-cost states and might prove utterly irrelevant in reducing the ranks of the 46.5 million uninsured Americans or the overall cost of health care.

The plan would rearrange piles of tax money with no guarantee that the uninsured would use their share (if they even got a share) to buy insurance. And it wouldn't stop the increasing flow of everyone's money into the pockets of the insurance, health care and pharmaceutical industries.

In other words, sounds like another Bush boondoggle.

The plan appears dead on arrival, with no realistic way to get through the new Democratic Congress. But it does give the White House something to talk about for a bit to get everyone distracted from the continuing Iraq mess, sort of like that empty debate about privatizing Social Security a couple of years ago.

"For the average Joe American, making 30 or 40 grand a year, these tax breaks are going to do him bupkis," said Marc Zilbert, 60, of Hollywood, using the Yiddish word for nothing.

When it comes to health care, Zilbert is living proof of how upside-down the system is. A former commodities broker, he said he has been uninsured and unemployed for the last year, but now has all his medical care provided by the South Broward Hospital District's indigent fund.

"I get treated first class," said Zilbert. "No different than if I had Blue Cross/Blue Shield."

He stood outside with a cigarette, attached to an IV drip. He said he had pneumonia and diabetes. Was it a good idea to be smoking? He used another Yiddish word to describe himself (rhymes with luck) and said he had cut down from four packs to five cigarettes a day.

"I'd much rather be paying my own way," he said.

He said he'd have to pay about $1,200 a month for an individual health-care plan, and it wasn't likely any insurance company would take him because of his health history, including cancer.

"The gap in coverage is what's killing people," he said. "If you have a lot of money or if you have nothing, you're OK, but everyone in between is stuck. ... I don't believe in socialism but there has to be a happy medium. There's got to be a better way."

President's Health Care Plan Deservedly DOA (MERCN)

The San Jose Mercury News, January 26, 2007

President Bush should have taken a page out of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's book if he were serious about national health care reform.

The reaction to the president's health care plan is in sharp contrast to the buzz created by Schwarzenegger's shrewd, far-reaching concept of ``shared responsibility'' to reduce costs and provide insurance to the uninsured.

Schwarzenegger went to extraordinary lengths to try to ensure buy-in to his plan from across the political spectrum. Prior to his State of the State address, he consulted with Democratic leaders and health care experts throughout the state, and he has since welcomed alternative proposals and criticisms, creating a political aura that suggests he is more interested in ``getting it right'' than furthering a political agenda.

Monday, he continued his effort to drum up support for his plan by sitting down with nearly two dozen high-tech executives for a round table discussion at Seagate Technology in Fremont.

President Bush's approach? He didn't even bother to call in House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel, D-New York, or health subcommittee Chairman Pete Stark, D-Fremont, before announcing his plan. Stark found out about it by listening to the president's Saturday morning radio address. This is not reaching across the aisle.

Rather than a push for ``shared responsibility,'' the president continues with his view that everyone, rich and poor, should be pretty much on his own.

The president is offering a tax deduction of $7,500 for individuals and $15,000 for families to try to help purchase health insurance. But as Health Access Executive Director Anthony Wright puts it, ``that's like giving a three-foot rope to people in a 10-foot hole.''

Since it's becoming increasingly clear that the president isn't going to be able to lead a national debate on health care for his remaining years in office, it's time for the 2008 presidential contenders to start offering ideas.

They can begin by talking about their reaction to what innovative states -- including California and Massachusetts -- are doing to provide potential national models for health care reform.

Running On Empty (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

Sorry to repeat myself, but I have the same reaction to this year's energy proposals in the State of the Union that I had to last year's. President Bush had the opportunity to launch America on a transformative new path for clean, efficient power. He had a chance for a "Nixon to China" moment — as the Texas oilman who leads us into a greener future. Instead, he gave us "Nixon to New Mexico" — right direction, but not nearly far enough.

As I read the president's remarks, listened to the tepid public reaction and looked at his latest polls, which show Mr. Bush to be wildly unpopular, it seemed to me that the American people basically fired George Bush in the last election. We're now just watching him clean out his desk. Both his energy proposals and his recent Iraq surge were about the best he could muster, given his pink slip.

The problem is that he is going to be cleaning out his desk for another two years, and Americans deserve better. I would love to see Democrats put that something better on Mr. Bush's desk — regarding both energy and Iraq.

"The stakes on Iraq and on climate change are way too large for us all to be just couch potatoes waiting for the messiah to come in 2009," said Fred Krupp, president of Environmental Defense. "That is not an option. Yes, it would be entertaining, but we need leadership on these issues, and we need it now."

On energy — no, the president's proposals were not just beanbag. His call to reform CAFE mileage standards for U.S. cars "shifts the debate from whether to compel U.S. automakers to build more fuel-efficient vehicles to how much they should do so," notes a strategy consultant, Peter Schwartz. And his call for a nearly fivefold mandatory increase in the production of ethanol and other alternative fuels for cars and trucks also changes the debate from whether to how much, and which fuels.

But the devil will be in the details. Will liquefied coal be one of those alternatives — which could add to global warming — or only non-fossil-fuel alternatives? On mileage standards, U.S. automakers will lobby the White House very hard for the smallest possible change. Will they get their way? If so, there isn't much here.

The really bold, transformative — and popular — initiative Mr. Bush should have offered would either be a national cap-and-trade system for controlling CO2 emissions by utilities, manufacturers and autos, or a carbon tax. Both would create economic incentives for us to get rid of appliances, buildings and cars that emit a lot of CO2 and to invent and purchase those that don't.

But there is no reason that the Democrats could not right now put a cap-and-trade bill on Mr. Bush's desk themselves by spring, Mr. Krupp said, "and I think Bush would sign it."

It is not enough for Democrats to just hold hearings on climate change. They need to use their new power to change the climate. Not only would the public be with them, but so would big business. A coalition of America's best companies — like General Electric, DuPont, Duke Energy, Alcoa, Caterpillar — and environmentalists just issued a "call to action" for a national cap-and-trade program to limit greenhouse gas emissions.

On Iraq: talking to some of our senior military lately, I've been struck by how concerned they are about the new Bush buildup against Iran. Before we have even won one war in Iraq, the Bush team seems to be courting another with Iran. I am all for brandishing the stick with Iran, but it should be for the purpose of gaining leverage for a diplomatic dialogue with Iran and Syria about Iraq.

"When your house is burning, you don't go looking to start a fire in the next house," said Vali Nasr, author of the "The Shia Revival." Right now, he adds, everything should be subordinated to trying to salvage Iraq.

Let the troop surge be accompanied and reinforced by what the Baker-Hamilton commission proposed: a regional conference that puts Syria, Iran, Jordan and Saudi Arabia around a table with Iraqis to try to stabilize the place. And that requires that America brandish carrots and sticks with all the parties. If a real regional conference doesn't work, then Democrats who want to just set a date to withdraw will have an even stronger case because we will truly have tried everything. But let's try everything: a surge of diplomacy, not just troops.

Let the Democrats put that on the president's desk. Just as the business community would support a real climate initiative, I think the U.S. military would support a real diplomatic conference. Bush gave America's voters the reasons to fire him. Democrats need to give voters the reasons to hire them — for the long haul.

President's Union Speech Pleases Conservative Base (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

DOJ_NMG_0122332

President Bush's State of the Union speech surprised and pleased much of his conservative base by appealing as much to them as to the new Democratic majority in Congress.

"He did not pander to the Democrats and independents as some thought he would," said New Jersey Rep. Scott Garrett, a conservative Republican who told The Washington Times that his House colleagues expressed a similar assessment.

Conservative Republicans have grown increasingly tough and open in their criticism of Mr. Bush on everything from immigration and the Iraq war to spending and government intrusiveness -- to the point in some cases of open rebellion. But Tuesday night he somehow managed to cap that dyspepsia, at least for the moment, and draw praise from his own right wing.

Pat Toomey, president of the influential Club for Growth, saw the speech as a largely successful attempt to reach out to Democrats and independents without alienating Republicans.

"A good example was health care, which was the central focus of his policy," Mr. Toomey said. "His message will appeal to voters, the middle class, Democrats and Republicans alike, because it eliminates an inequity in the tax code that has prevented the evolution of consumer-based -- as distinct from employer-provided -- health care."

"So we are every happy with his proposal, which will lower costs and provide more choice for consumers," said Mr. Toomey. "Democrats ought to like it, but I very much wonder if they to give the president any kind of victory and I am afraid they would rather have this issue to use against Republicans in the 2008 elections."

Some religious conservatives, however, stopped just short of saying the president pandered to the Democrats in Congress.

"The top issues primarily interested the new majority," said Family Research Council President Tony Perkins. "While some of these issues have merit, the president went silent on key social issues that many Americans care deeply about. The overarching concern is that the administration is yielding its ability to influence the public discussion to the liberal leadership of the new congressional majority."

However, with his presidency now in its final two years, Mr. Bush must fight to maintain his influence.

"Bush is already a lame-duck president, but he is trying his best not to be considered a 'dead duck' president -- with no power or influence at all," said Merrill Matthews, an analyst at the Institute for Policy Innovation. "He was, in essence, saying, 'I am still relevant.' Bill Clinton made that claim verbally after the Republican victory in 1994. Bush is doing that by proposing several ideas -- many of them good and some of them more aligned with moderates or the left."

Because last year's election undermined Mr. Bush's political power to push his agenda, he is moving to "idea power," Mr. Matthews said. "Conservatives have always thought that ideas are the real driving force behind change," he said.

As for what, if anything, the president's sixth State of the Union will accomplish, Tom Kilgannon, president of Oliver North's Freedom Alliance, said, "It won't advance much that conservatives care about."

Senior State Department Official Resigns (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, January 26, 2007

Robert Joseph, the State Department's senior arms control and security official, has resigned.

Joseph submitted his resignation to President Bush amid uncertainty about the future of negotiations to curb nuclear programs in Iran and North Korea. Talks on both fronts have moved slowly, with U.N. penalties against both countries showing limited results. The talks are in recess.

Still, in an interview Thursday, Joseph said, "I think we have a very good record."

He cited Libya's renunciation of weapons of mass destruction and the dissolution of a network headed by A.Q. Khan, a Pakistani scientist who leaked weapons technology to North Korea, Iran and Libya.

Joseph also concentrated on what is now a grouping of more than 80 countries committed to intercepting and inspecting weapons cargo at sea and an initiative to combat nuclear terrorism.

Joseph, who will leave next month, acknowledged trying to stop Iran and North Korea from building nuclear weapons was very hard and he said they posed serious challenges to U.S. security.

While he was not a participant in negotiations with Iran and North Korea, Joseph worked on backup measures, including a financial squeeze on the two governments and putting in place the U.N. penalties.

DOJ_NMG_0122333

His departure follows that of several other top diplomatic officials, including Philip Zelikow, a close adviser to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; Deputy Secretary Robert Zoellick; and John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations;

Joseph joined the department in 2005 after working on Bush's national security council staff.

He has taken a strong view on a need to eliminate North Korean and Iranian nuclear programs. He warned last month against terrorist groups and other nations acting against U.S. and commercial satellites.

In a telephone interview, he said he would write, teach and work as a consultant. He has compiled 26 years of government service, teaching intermittently over that span.

Senators Kill Minimum Wage Amendment (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, January 26, 2007

An effort to increase the minimum wage in all states, even those that already have wage floors higher than the federal base, failed Thursday after Democrats labeled it a "poison pill."

Democrats said the Republican proposal was designed to kill underlying minimum wage legislation.

An amendment offered by Sen. Jim DeMint, R-S.C., was an effort to show how raising the federal minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 over 26 months would have no effect in eight states because they already have wage floors of $7.25 or higher. Another two states have scheduled minimum wage increases that also would place them above the proposed federal floor.

Eighteen other states have higher minimum wages than the current federal floor, but not as high as the $7.25 in the proposed legislation.

"This is a mandate on low-cost-of-living states, but not on high-cost-of-living states," DeMint said.

The amendment failed on a 78-16 vote after Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., raised a budget point of order challenging it. Massachusetts is among the states that already have a higher minimum wage and would not be affected by the federal law.

Kennedy called the amendment a ploy "intended to give senators in high minimum wage states an uncomfortable vote today not to raise wages for hardworking Americans."

States that already have higher minimum wages than the federal floor tend to be clustered in the Northeast and the Pacific Coast. States without their own wage floor are in the Midwest and the South.

How To Make The Poor Poorer (WSJ)

By Gary S. Becker And Richard A. Posner

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

The strong bipartisan support for increasing the federal minimum wage to $7.25 an hour from the current $5.15 -- a 40% increase -- is a sad example of how interest-group politics and the public's ignorance of economics can combine to give us laws that manage to be both inefficient and inegalitarian.

An increase in the minimum wage raises the costs of fast foods and other goods produced with large inputs of unskilled labor. Producers adjust both by substituting capital inputs and/or high-skilled labor for minimum-wage workers and, because the substitutes are more costly (otherwise the substitutions would have been made already), by raising prices. The higher prices reduce the producers' output and thus their demand for labor. The adjustments to the hike in the minimum wage are inefficient because they are motivated not by a higher real cost of low-skilled labor but by a government-mandated increase in the price of that labor. That increase has the same misallocative effect as monopoly pricing.

Although some workers benefit -- those who were paid the old minimum wage but are worth the new, higher one to the employers -- others are pushed into unemployment, the underground economy or crime. The losers are therefore likely to lose more than the gainers gain; they are also likely to be poorer people. And poor families are disproportionately hurt by the rise in the price of fast foods and other goods produced with low-skilled labor because these families spend a relatively large fraction of their incomes on such goods. And many, maybe most, of the gainers from a higher minimum wage are not poor. Most minimum-wage workers are part time, and for the majority their minimum-wage income supplements an income derived from other sources. Examples are retirees living on Social Security or private pensions who want to get out of the house part of the day and earn pin money, stay-at-home spouses who want to supplement their spouse's earnings, and teenagers working after school. An increase in the minimum wage will thus provide a windfall to many workers who are not poor.

Some economists deny that a minimum wage reduces employment, though most disagree. And because most increases in the minimum wage have been slight, their effects are difficult to disentangle from other factors that affect employment. But a 40% increase would be too large to have no employment effect; about a tenth of the work force makes less than $7.25 an hour. Even defenders of minimum-wage laws must believe that beyond some point a higher minimum would cause unemployment. Otherwise why don't they propose $10, or $15, or an even higher figure?

A number of countries, including France, have conducted such experiments; the ratio of the minimum wage to the average wage is much higher in these countries than in the U.S. Economists Guy Laroque and Bernard Salanie find that the high minimum wage in France explains a significant part of the low employment rate of married women. Mr. Salanie has argued that the minimum wage also contributes to the dismal employment prospects of young persons in France, including Muslim youths, an estimated 40% of whom are unemployed.

As a means of raising people from poverty or near poverty, the minimum wage is inferior to the Earned Income Tax Credit, which compensates for low wages without interfering with the labor market or conferring windfalls on the nonpoor. EITC is not completely devoid of effects on efficient resource allocation, because like any other government spending it is defrayed out of taxes, and it has been abused by underreporting of income and overreporting of dependents. But it is a more efficient tax than the minimum wage as well as being more effective in redistributing income to the poor.

So why push to increase the minimum wage rather than the EITC? For one thing, unions strongly favor the minimum wage because it reduces competition from low-wage workers (who, partly because most of them work part time, tend not to be unionized) and thus enhances unions' bargaining power and so their appeal to workers. For another, increasing the EITC would mean an increase in government spending, which might require higher taxes; there is no public support for explicit tax increases and most people don't understand that regulatory laws can have the same effect as taxes.

Moreover, poor people tend not to vote; and the number of nonpoor who'd be directly benefited by an increase in the minimum wage, when combined with the number of nonpoor workers whose incomes would rise because of reduced competition from minimum-wage workers, probably exceeds the number of nonpoor who would lose jobs. Teenagers would be among the hardest hit -- and few of them are voters (if under 18, they're ineligible). While workers who receive a wage increase when the minimum wage is hiked realize they've benefited from the hike, many hurt by the hike don't realize it; teenagers and retirees who have trouble finding a job are unlikely to realize that it's because there are fewer jobs in the economy for minimum-wage workers.

Let's hope that if Congress passes a stiff increase in the federal minimum wage, George Bush will emulate Mayor Richard Daley and veto it. Several months ago the Chicago City Council, by a lopsided but not veto-proof vote, passed an ordinance requiring companies that have more than $1 billion in annual sales, and own stores in Chicago having at least 90,000 square feet of floor space, to pay Chicago employees a minimum wage of $9.25 an hour plus $1.50 an hour in fringe benefits, respectively rising to $10 and $3 by 2010. About 40 stores would have been affected.

The ordinance was surpassingly foolish. The retailers that would have been most affected, such as Wal-Mart, Target and Home Depot, are at best only marginally interested in placing stores in large cities because space for large stores and for the parking they require is much more expensive than in suburbs and smaller towns. Moreover, these companies could offset much of the effect of the ordinance by opening more stores in suburbs within easy reach of Chicago, or by holding their floor space to just below 90,000 square feet. Fewer jobs would be available to low-skilled workers in the city, and families with modest incomes who seek low prices rather than elaborate service would be hurt more than the affluent by the increase in prices and reduced availability of big box outlets.

Who would favor such a bad ordinance? Conventional supermarket chains and clothing stores, of course, and unions -- the latter not only for the usual reasons but also because big box companies oppose unions; the ordinance sent a signal that unions have enough political clout to make life difficult for large nonunion retailers. The absence of opposition to the ordinance from low-income consumers is not surprising because they are not organized to exert political pressure. The aggressive support of the ordinance by most of the council's black members is more difficult to understand, but the explanation may be that they are allied with unions. They may have realized that their constituents would be harmed by the ordinance, but believed that in return for taking this hit they would get the support of unions for measures that would help low-income families.

The failure of the Chicago ordinance and related local measures helps to explain the push to raise the federal minimum wage. The ordinance would have been particularly destructive -- hence Mayor Daley's veto of it -- because the smaller the scope of a minimum-wage increase, the more easily it is evaded, though possibly at great social cost. A federal increase would have a smaller social cost per worker covered, but presumably a larger overall social cost. Chicago's "big box" ordinance is evidence, if any is needed, that politics can override economic sanity. One can only hope that this lesson will not be repeated on the national stage.

Lawmakers Target Rising Credit Penalties (AP)

By Marcy Gordon

AP, January 26, 2007

Democratic lawmakers challenged credit card executives Thursday over rising late fees and other penalties and marketing practices they portrayed as predatory.

The credit card industry and its practices came under scrutiny at a session of the Senate Banking Committee. Several Democratic members of the panel are proposing legislation to require companies to provide more details to consumers on how long it will take them to pay off their debts if they make minimum monthly payments, and to rein in solicitations of college students.

Credit cards have become a ubiquitous and indispensable part of the culture, with an estimated 640 million cards in Americans' wallets and more than $1.8 trillion charged on them in 2005. Many depend on them to pay their bills and buy groceries or gasoline. But consumer groups and other critics say fees are excessive and information provided to consumers is confusing.

The banking industry maintains that credit cards are an essential element of the economy, providing convenience to consumers _ at flexible interest rates according to the risk of the holder. Industry officials have acknowledged that the disclosure material provided to consumers could be improved.

"I would like to put the credit card industry ... on notice," said Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., the committee's chairman. "If you currently engage in any business practice that you would be ashamed to discuss before this committee, I would strongly encourage you to cease and desist that practice."

Banks and other credit card issuers "should take a long, hard look at how you treat your customers," he said.

Dodd, one of several Democrats in the Senate who are seeking the party's presidential nomination in 2008, has put consumer issues on the committee's agenda for this year.

If the industry doesn't improve practices on its own, legislation may be needed, he indicated.

Dodd and other senators questioned a panel of witnesses that included executives of Chase Bank USA, Barclays Bank and Capital One Financial Corp.

The executives defended their practices as fair and responsible. Most customers pay their bills on time, and only a small proportion of them represent a risk of default and are subject to punitive measures, they said.

Some members of the committee, mostly Republicans, said that while improved disclosure is needed, lawmakers should avoid imposing requirements or sanctions for the credit card industry that would amount to price controls.

"I think we should recognize that the market does work," said Sen. Bob Bennett, R-Utah.

A study by congressional investigators released in October found that fees for paying credit card bills late averaged $34, up from $13 in 1995, while some card issuers impose penalty interest rates of more than 30 percent on consumers who pay late or exceed the credit limit.

Among other practices cited at Thursday's hearing:

_Some credit card issuers use a billing method that charges interest on credit card debt already paid by the consumer.

FCC To Feel Unfamiliar Heat From Democrats (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

As congressional Democrats prepare to give the Federal Communications Commission its toughest scrutiny in years, a rivalry between the powerful agency's two most prominent Republicans is raising questions about its readiness to handle barbed questions and stiff challenges.

The Republican-controlled FCC -- which makes far-reaching decisions on telephone, television, radio, Internet and other services that people use daily -- has sparred infrequently with Republican-controlled congresses. But the Democratic-run 110th Congress is about to heat up the grill, starting with a Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee hearing on Thursday.

Senators vow to press the chairman and four commissioners on matters such as media-ownership diversity, Internet access, broadcast decency standards and delays in resolving various issues. The hearing may cover the waterfront, Democratic staff members say, but there's little doubt that the agency will face a tone of questioning unseen in recent years.

"They've effectively emasculated any public-interest standards that existed" for radio and TV stations, said Sen. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.), a committee member who plans sharp questions on decency, media consolidation and other topics. "The entire Congress for years now has been devoid of any kind of oversight," he said, and the new Democratic majority is launching a process that will force the FCC to "beat a path to Capitol Hill to respond."

Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), a senior House Commerce Committee member, said he plans "comprehensive hearings on net neutrality" later this year. The term refers to measures barring telephone and cable service providers from charging Web-based companies for priority access to the Internet. Markey supports such proposals, while the FCC's Republican members generally oppose them.

FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin, a Republican with close ties to the Bush administration, will be the focus of Democrats' criticisms. But some industry analysts think those lawmakers may try to find an ally in Commissioner Robert M. McDowell, another young Republican loyalist with a reputation for intelligence and political ambition. The two have clashed on at least three significant issues in the past several months, creating what some see as a rift that could be ripe for exploitation.

"McDowell has been critical of Kevin Martin on a number of occasions," said industry analyst Blair Levin. Although both men are conservative Republicans, Levin said, their independence is partly explained by their different political bases -- Martin's in the Bush administration, McDowell's in Congress.

In the legal, lobbying and industrial circles that monitor the FCC, opinions vary on the severity of the Martin-McDowell rivalry.

Publicly, the two men have played down their differences and said they have a good working relationship. "The chairman and I have been friends for more than a decade," McDowell, 43, said in an interview. "We have a strong and durable relationship. . . . We will still have some differences, but we work together."

A spokeswoman for Martin, Tamara Lipper, said the two men "have a very good relationship."

The FCC's commissioners -- currently three Republicans and two Democrats -- are appointed by the president, confirmed by the Senate, and allowed to operate largely independently of each other. Intra-agency and intra-party feuds are not uncommon, and many analysts noted that Martin clashed with former chairman and fellow Republican Michael K. Powell.

"When Michael Powell was FCC chairman, Kevin Martin was viewed as the maverick Republican," said Philip J. Weiser, a law professor at the University of Colorado who specializes in telecommunications. "And now he has to deal with his own maverick Republican."

Martin, 40, and McDowell clashed even before McDowell arrived at the FCC in June. McDowell handed Martin a stinging setback by saying the FCC had no authority to require cable companies to carry additional digital broadcast channels, a key industry issue that Martin hoped to bring to a vote.

The two subsequently tangled on other issues, most notably the $85 billion merger between AT&T and BellSouth approved by the FCC last month. Martin needed McDowell's vote to break a deadlock. But McDowell effectively held the process up, insisting that he could not take part in a vote because he previously worked as a lobbyist for an association representing companies that competed against AT&T and BellSouth.

McDowell's sharp criticism of arguments in favor of a full commission vote were widely regarded as a rebuke of Martin. Ultimately, the merger was approved, but only after the companies made concessions sought by the two Democratic commissioners.

Martin, McDowell and their colleagues may need all the camaraderie and cohesion they can muster at next week's hearing. With Democrats now in control of Congress, Dorgan said, "the running room of the FCC is going to be limited."

A No Vote On Senate Raises Just Might Count (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — It is a Washington ritual. Almost every year a lawmaker proposes withholding the automatic annual cost-of-living pay increase from members of Congress in the name of fiscal responsibility and populist reform.

Some members vote for it, but the proposal usually fails. And even the reformers get their raise.

The Senate, at least, may be raising the price of such public displays of self-sacrifice. In the rush to pass a major ethics bill on Jan. 18, the Senate approved a provision that would deny the pay increase to any individual member who voted against it, even if it passed.

Last year, a senator would have lost $3,100 out of a salary of $165,200. (The Senate has delayed taking a pay increase this year until after it finishes debating whether to increase the federal minimum wage for the first time in nearly 10 years.)

The penalty for opposing the raise is the work of Senator James M. Inhofe, Republican of Oklahoma, who called votes against the increase “the greatest single hypocrisy every year.”

“All the press releases hit the home state,” he said in a speech last year introducing the idea. “And then, of course, it is defeated, and they end up taking the increase anyway.”

The idea is a rare attempt to punish lawmakers financially on the basis of how they vote. Could the Senate, for example, cut a member’s pay for a vote to increase the deficit? For one against a new minimum wage?

“It is a precedent that could lead to a slippery slope,” said Kenneth A. Gross, an expert on political law. But, he acknowledged, lawmakers voting against a raise “would have to put their money where their mouth is.”

The Democratic and Republican Senate leaders incorporated the measure into their bipartisan ethics proposal, and the Senate passed it by a vote of 96 to 2 without further discussion.

But in an interview this week a spokesman for the Senate rules committee suggested that a House and Senate conference might revisit the provision before it became law.

Tancredo: Abolish Race-based Caucuses (AP)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, January 26, 2007

White House hopeful Tom Tancredo said Thursday the existence of the Congressional Black Caucus and other race-based groups of lawmakers amount to segregation and should be abolished.

"It is utterly hypocritical for Congress to extol the virtues of a colorblind society while officially sanctioning caucuses that are based solely on race," said the Colorado Republican, who is most widely known as a vocal critic of illegal immigration.

"If we are serious about achieving the goal of a colorblind society, Congress should lead by example and end these divisive, race-based caucuses," said Tancredo, who is scheduled to pitch his long-shot presidential bid this weekend in New Hampshire.

One caucus member dismissed Tancredo's comments as sour grapes from a dethroned Republican _ who also happens to be running for president.

"This story is really about a member of the minority party using intolerance to advance his presidential campaign," said Rep. William Lacy Clay, D-Mo.

Tancredo's request, relayed in a letter to Administration Committee Chairwoman Juanita Millender-McDonald, D-Calif., revived his effort to change House rules to abolish the groups.

Besides the Congressional Black Caucus, Democrats also have a Hispanic caucus with 21 members, and Republicans have a comparable Hispanic conference with five full members and 11 "associate" members who are not Hispanic.

The request comes in the wake of reports that freshman Rep. Stephen Cohen, D-Tenn., was refused admission to the Congressional Black Caucus because he is white. All 43 members of the caucus are black.

Cohen said in a statement that he told a reporter that he would be honored to join the caucus but did not apply, "nor has the CBC denied membership to me."

However, the group would not have permitted Cohen to join, its new chairwoman told The Associated Press. Rep. Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick, D-Mich., said the caucus decided early on that official membership would be restricted to blacks.

Tancredo is chairman of the Congressional Immigration Reform Caucus, which seeks to toughen border security to stem illegal immigration. He also opposes guest worker programs and immigration proposals by President Bush.

Tancredo: Ban Minority Caucuses (DENP)

By Anne C. Mulkern

Denver Post, January 26, 2007

Washington - Rep. Tom Tancredo called today for abolishment of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, Black Caucus and Asian Pacific American Caucus, saying they equal racial segregation

"It is utterly hypocritical for Congress to extol the virtues of a color-blind society while officially sanctioning caucuses that are based solely on race - and restrict their membership based on race," Tancredo wrote in a letter to Rep. Juanita Millender-McDonald, D-Calif., who oversees the caucuses.

Tancredo, a Littleton Republican who is considering a presidential run, first called in 2003 for a ban on the caucuses that are tied to ethnic groups. He pegged his renewed demand to a report in a Capitol Hill political newspaper that freshman Rep. Stephen Cohen (D-Tennessee) could not join the Congressional Black Caucus because he is white.

A spokesman for Cohen said "He never formally sought membership in the Congressional Black Caucus, nor has the Congressional Black Caucus denied membership to him," said Cohen's spokeswoman, Marilyn Dillihan.

Cohen, Dillihan said "really regrets that this is being used the way it's being used."

Whether Cohen officially asked to join or not is irrelevant, Tancredo spokesman, Carlos Espinosa, said. If he had asked to join, Espinosa said, he would not have been allowed.

"The policy is what's relevant here," Espinosa said.

Rep. John Salazar, D-Manassa, belongs to the Congressional Hispanic Caucus.

When Tancredo previously said the caucuses should be eliminated, a member of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus called that statement "more race-baiting" by Tancredo. The black, Hispanic and Asian-American caucuses exist because few members of Congress come from those racial groups and they need a unified voice, said Rep. Raul M. Grijalva, D-Ariz.

FEDERAL DIARY: Head Of TSP Moving On (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, January 26, 2007

His mission accomplished, the executive director at the Thrift Savings Plan has resigned to join a union-owned financial services holding company.

Gary A. Amelio, who developed a new retirement savings option to help federal employees diversify their investment portfolios, is joining ULLICO as president of retirement services. He will probably leave the agency early next month, a TSP spokesman said.

Amelio expanded TSP investment options in 2005 by adding life-cycle funds as a way to help federal employees who are too busy to monitor their savings or do not feel comfortable making investment decisions. The L Funds, as they are called, permit

TSP participants to select an investment mix linked to the time they expect to draw down their savings. The funds rely on asset allocation models that professional managers have determined can produce the maximum returns for the minimum risk.

During his 3 1/2 -year stint with the TSP, Amelio resolved problems that had delayed a new computer system that keeps track of accounts on a daily basis and introduced a toll-free telephone service. The TSP is one of the world's largest retirement plans, with about $206 billion in assets.

In accepting the resignation, Andrew M. Saul, the chairman of the Federal Retirement Thrift Investment Board, praised Amelio for upgrading TSP operations. A recent survey of TSP participants showed that 85 percent are satisfied with the retirement plan, a sign that Amelio's changes have been well received, Saul said.

Mark E. Singleton, the president and chief executive at ULLICO, said the union-owned company manages about $4.6 billion in pension assets and will look to Amelio to expand retirement services to meet the needs of union members, especially baby boomers who will be leaving the workforce in the next few years. ULLICO dates back to 1927, when it began offering life insurance to construction workers.Settlement at Social Security

A settlement has been reached in a case brought by the Social Security Administration's inspector general against four employees in the agency's Des Moines office, the National Treasury Employees Union has announced.

Colleen M. Kelley, the union president, said the inspector general had withdrawn charges against the employees and agreed not to undertake any other action against them.

The union recently filed a grievance on behalf of the employees, contending they had followed the orders of an administrative law judge in preparing decisions in 700 cases that granted Social Security disability benefits to claimants.

The inspector general's office had questioned the reproduction of evidence from one disability case for use in 700 cases handled by the Des Moines office in recent years, apparently to speed up claims processing. The inspector general was pursuing civil penalties against the employees, and a $215,000 fine had been proposed for one worker. The judge in charge of the cases died in 2003.

The employees, as part of the settlement, will cooperate in a review of "this misguided attempt to streamline the appeals process," Jonathan L. Lasher, a deputy chief counsel for the inspector general, said in a statement. Interviews with the employees will be the first step in a new audit focused on disability adjudication policies and practices, he said.

Kelley said the settlement showed that "these employees did nothing wrong. It is outrageous that the inspector general used his considerable authority to put these employees in fear of losing, not only their jobs, but their life savings, when all they were doing was carrying out the job duties as directed by their supervisor."Talk Shows

Beth Moten, director of the American Federation of Government Employees Legislative and Political Affairs Department, outlines the union's goals in Congress on "Inside Government" at 10 a.m. today on http://Federalnewsradio.com and WFED (1050 AM).

R. Allen Pittman, assistant secretary for human resources and administration and the chief human capital officer at the Veterans Affairs Department, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. tomorrow on WJFK (106.7 FM).

Ginsburg 'Lonely' Without O'Connor (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON — It's been a year since Sandra Day O'Connor retired from the Supreme Court after a quarter-century tenure and left Ruth Bader Ginsburg as the lone woman on the nine-member court. Although it's unclear how O'Connor's departure will affect the law, this much is certain: Ginsburg misses her friend, and worries about the message court visitors get when they see only one woman on the bench.

"The word I would use to describe my position on the bench is lonely," Ginsburg, 73, said in an interview with USA TODAY.

ONE-WOMAN COURT: Composition in contrast to gains elsewhere

DOJ_NMG_0122340

"This is how it was for Sandra's first 12 years," she said, citing the time from O'Connor's appointment in 1981 to Ginsburg's arrival in 1993. "Neither of us ever thought this would happen again. I didn't realize how much I would miss her until she was gone."

A year after Ginsburg joined the court, O'Connor recalled welcoming the new justice "with enormous pleasure," in part because O'Connor no longer would be the court's only symbolic representative for American women. They confided in each other, and when Ginsburg had surgery for colorectal cancer in 1999, O'Connor, a breast cancer survivor, was the first person to call her in the hospital.

O'Connor, a Reagan appointee, was at the ideological center of the divided court, a key backer of abortion rights and affirmative action in education. President Bush tried to replace her with a woman, then-White House counsel Harriet Miers, but the nomination died amid questions about her qualifications. Bush turned to Samuel Alito, whose record suggests he could tilt the court to the right.

The justices are weighing cases on abortion and school integration. Ginsburg, a Clinton appointee on the court's liberal wing, won't discuss how O'Connor's exit will change the court, saying only, "This term may be very revealing."

For now, O'Connor's absence is more symbolic. In court, the sight of Ginsburg — a slight figure in a tall, black leather chair, flanked by eight men — contrasts with the rising prominence of women in Congress. The number of female judges also is rising: Of the 875 federal judges, 201 are women.

Ginsburg is encouraged by such numbers, but disconcerted by the look of her own court. She said with O'Connor, the message was: "Here are two women. They don't look alike. They don't always vote alike. But here are two women." The former women's rights lawyer fears the message now is that a woman justice is a "one-at-a-time curiosity, not the normal thing."

High Court Just A 1-woman Show (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

WASHINGTON — When Louisiana teacher Stephanie Goodrich began a session with her eighth-grade honors class on the Supreme Court this month, she showed them a picture of the nine justices.

"They said, 'Could there be only one lady on the court?' " recalled Goodrich, who is in her 15th year teaching in the Alexandria, La., school district. Goodrich said her students are used to seeing women in key government positions. Louisiana has a female governor, Kathleen Blanco; one of its two U.S. senators is Mary Landrieu.

The makeup of the nation's highest court contrasts sharply with that of Congress and the rest of the U.S. judiciary, where women have made historical gains. After she was elected as the first female speaker of the House, California Democrat Nancy Pelosi declared that women had "broken the marble ceiling" in Congress.

Meanwhile, the number of women serving as federal judges across the nation has soared since 1977. Before Jimmy Carter became president, eight women had been appointed to federal judgeships in U.S. history. There now are 201 women on the 875-member federal bench.

Back at the Supreme Court, however, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, 73, is acknowledging her discontent with being the lone woman on the court. Since Sandra Day O'Connor was replaced by Samuel Alito a year ago, Ginsburg has worried about the symbolism of having just one woman on the court.

The message of the court's current makeup, Ginsburg says, is that a female jurist is "aberrational," when "if you look at courts generally, women are well represented."

"Having only one of nine judges with a woman's experience definitely seems out of date," said Celinda Lake, a Democratic strategist and pollster. "People don't want a woman just for a woman's sake, but they do respond to the argument that women bring a certain experience."

President Bush tried replacing O'Connor with a woman, nominating then-White House counsel Harriet Miers for the seat. However, Miers withdrew under criticism about her qualifications and conservatism, and the post went to Alito.

Alito's comments in court have suggested he might help move the bench toward the right on matters such as abortion rights and affirmative action in education. O'Connor was a key vote in supporting both.

Ginsburg, a member of the court's liberal wing, also supports abortion rights and affirmative action. However, her concern about the court's makeup is rooted more in a desire for jurists who have experienced American life as women than for those who would agree with her on the law. Ginsburg and O'Connor — who regularly voted with the court's conservative wing — often did not agree on cases.

Beyond the legal issues, analysts disagree about the significance of having just one woman on the Supreme Court.

Lee Arbetman, director of U.S. programs for Street Law, a non-profit organization that works with high school social studies teachers, said diversity in positions of power offers all students role models and builds confidence in the institution.

"There aren't men's outcomes and women's outcomes in (court) cases," he said. "But there is value in the different experiences men and women bring to the court. Women experience some aspects of the world differently, just as people of color experience some aspects of the world differently."

The court has only one member of a racial minority, Clarence Thomas. He was the second black justice appointed to the court, after the late Thurgood Marshall, who served from 1967 to 1991.

In the fall of 2005, when Bush nominated Alito to succeed O'Connor, few Americans seemed to care that a man would replace the first female justice. A USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll just before the nomination indicated that 15% of the respondents said it was "essential" to nominate a woman; 33% said it was a "good idea; not essential," and 49% said it "doesn't matter."

The conservative American Enterprise Institute's Karlyn Bowman, who specializes in opinion polls, said that "men and women thought it would be nice, but that it should not be determinative." Bowman said that when it comes to establishing role models for young people, gender diversity is not as important as it was in earlier decades. "We are past that for young women, because women have risen to leadership positions" in many fields.

Sheila Krumholz, executive director of the Center for Responsive Politics, said she believes it still matters to girls. And for women in important jobs, "having other woman around is liberating. It's no longer all eyes on you."

In Louisiana, Goodrich said her students have indicated they believe the most qualified people should be on the high court, irrespective of their sex.

Goodrich said the girls in her class sympathize with Ginsburg. They "said they felt sorry for Justice Ginsburg, being the only one," Goodrich said. "One girl said, 'She kind of carries the weight of all the ladies. At least when there were two ladies on the court, she had backup.' "

When Ginsburg was told of the girl's comment, she said, "That is very insightful."

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, January 26, 2007

'The War'

There was barely a dry eye in the house when Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson played host this week to a special screening by acclaimed filmmakers Ken Burns and Lynn Novick.

Mr. Burns and his longtime collaborator, best known for their documentaries "The Civil War," "Baseball" and "Jazz," have just completed "The War," a 14-hour documentary on World War II slated to air on PBS in September.

Mr. Nicholson's invited guests for the 45-minute sneak preview of "The War" included 25 veterans of the "Greatest Generation," who told Inside the Beltway that they were "thrilled" and "moved to tears" that the filmmakers had chosen World War II as the topic for their latest documentary.

Personal sermon

"Oh yes, things are quieting down," a somewhat relieved the Rev. Art Smith, pastor of St. Thomas Aquinas Catholic Church in Buffalo, N.Y., told Inside the Beltway by telephone yesterday, after New York Rep. Brian Higgins and his family abruptly walked out of Mass there on Sunday.

The Democrat received what was described as a public tongue-lashing from the pulpit by deacon Tom McDonnell because of his support for embryonic stem-cell research.

"Everybody has their own version to the story," Father Smith told us yesterday, assuring us that he was not trying to downplay the "emotion of the situation."

The pastor, who more than a decade ago worked in television for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops in Washington, has been sharply critical of the deacon's sermon. Indeed, Father Smith took to the pulpit and apologized to the congregation.

In addition, Buffalo Bishop Edward U. Kmiec has issued a statement critical of Mr. McDonnell's personal attack, saying no member of the congregation, congressman or otherwise, should be confronted from the holy altar.

Mr. Higgins gave Inside the Beltway the following statement yesterday: "On the incident itself — I never apologized for leaving the church service last Sunday. ... Under the circumstances, leaving was the appropriate thing to do."

Ouch!

As House Republicans continue to draft a new battle plan at their annual legislative retreat on Maryland's Eastern Shore, they might keep in the back of their minds an observation from Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, who commented this week about the November elections and the subsequent shift of power on Capitol Hill: "The Republicans never knew what hit them."

Spilling to Sidey

First lady Laura Bush today will host the debut of the Hugh S. Sidey Scholarship for Print Journalism at the White House. The legendary Time magazine correspondent was a favorite of the entire Bush family, and nobody could get the family members to reveal their true, inner feelings better than he.

Take the time shortly before his untimely death in November 2005, when Mr. Sidey, who covered the White House for decades, was invited into the Houston living room of former President George Bush and Mrs. Bush to chat about the second presidential term of their son, George W. Bush.

Mr. Bush: "Kitty Kelley. Did you see where somebody handed her her hat the other night, the Washingtonian? [The notorious Washington author's name was dropped from the magazine's masthead.] I loved that."

Mrs. Bush: "Remember when Ann Richards said George Bush was born with a silver foot in his mouth? And then when George beat her in his first run for governor — I must say I felt a certain sense of joy that he finally had kind of taken her down. I could go around saying, 'We showed her what she could do with that silver foot, where she could stick that now.' "

Mr. Bush: "Michael Moore's got to be the worst for me. I mean, he's such a slimeball and so atrocious. But I love the fact now that the Democrats are not embracing him as theirs anymore."

Mrs. Bush: "[President Bush] knows we're the only two people in America who are awake at 6 in the morning. He calls from the Oval Office to talk to George, and we put him on speakerphone."

Mr. Bush: "The thing that was perhaps the most hurtful to me was the theme that the president doesn't know what he's doing, that he's dumb, that he's some know-nothing cowboy from Texas. And when I sat with him, as I did out at Camp David, at Crawford, and heard him with the intelligence people, talking about the world and asking the appropriate questions — what's the development in this country or that — I was surprised at how broad the vision and grasp are. But he gets no credit for that."

Stealthy Maneuver: The CIA Captures An A-12 Blackbird (WSJ)

By Jonathan Karp

The Central Intelligence Agency is closing in on a high-value landscaping target: a 1960s spy plane called the A-12 Blackbird.

The CIA plans to mount the once-secret, 102-foot-long supersonic plane on a pole at its Langley, Va., headquarters in time for the agency's 60th anniversary in September. The jet chosen for the mission is a particularly well-preserved specimen that has been at the Minnesota Air Guard Museum, next to the Minneapolis-St. Paul airport, since 1991.

Even though a moving crew began the 10-day process of dismantling the spy plane this week, volunteers who painstakingly restored it at their own expense are continuing to oppose what they consider a hijacking. Their pleas for mercy, backed by the governor and entire Minnesota congressional delegation, have fallen on deaf ears.

"Possession is nine-tenths of the law, so until they drag it away with me screaming, we have a chance," said James Goodall, an aviation buff and retired Minnesota National Guardsman who salvaged the plane and led efforts to preserve it.

The A-12 Blackbird, retired in 1968, was the forerunner to the better-known SR-71 Blackbird. The stealthy A-12 is one of the fastest aircraft ever made, capable of flying at more than three times the speed of sound and at the edge of space. The plane originated as part of a CIA program code-named "Oxcart." Of the 15 A-12s built by Lockheed Martin Corp.'s famed Skunk Works advanced projects unit, nine remain. One is on display at an Air Force base, and the others are at museums around the country.

Mr. Goodall and his supporters don't question the right of the Air Force, which controls these decommissioned warplanes, to reclaim an A-12 and lend it to the CIA as an oversize lawn ornament inside the agency compound. Instead, their two-month dogfight has been aimed at getting the Air Force to justify removing the Minnesota museum's crown jewel while three A-12s sit in Alabama, including one that has been neglected since suffering hurricane damage. Another is parked on the USS Intrepid aircraft carrier, a floating Manhattan museum that will be closed until late next year because of renovation work across the Hudson River.

The CIA, whose headquarters isn't open to the public, had no role in selecting which plane it would receive. The Air Force says the Minnesota Air National Guard doesn't have a historical connection to the A-12, and though the Minnesotans have taken good care of their A-12, the volunteer-run museum doesn't meet the Air Force's current legal requirements for its museums. For one thing, it doesn't have a salaried director. After reviewing all nine A-12s, "The only one that didn't have a legitimate rationale for its location was Minnesota's," said Terry Aitken, senior curator at the National Museum of the U.S. Air Force.

That logic outrages Mr. Goodall, 61 years old, who spent 20 years in the Minnesota Air National Guard and his entire adult life smitten with the A-12. He says he became an "airplane nut" at age 5 when he saw a squadron of B-36 bombers flying over San Francisco Bay. He first glimpsed a Blackbird as an 18-year-old Air Force recruit at Edwards Air Force Base in California. It was March 10, 1964, and "it affected me forever," he says.

Over the years, Mr. Goodall became an expert, writing five books on the supersonic plane. He built a rapport with Ben Rich, who developed the Blackbird for Lockheed and eventually ran Skunk Works. Mr. Goodall says he got a tip from Mr. Rich in 1989 that the Blackbird program would be canceled. "If anyone can scrounge one, you can," he says the late Mr. Rich told him.

At the time, Mr. Goodall was the staff historian for the 133rd Airlift Wing of the Minnesota Air National Guard. He hatched a scheme to rescue an A-12 from the scrapheap in Palmdale, Calif. In 1990, Minnesota's congressional delegation backed the Air Guard museum's request, citing the fact that companies in Minnesota supplied key Blackbird components and that some Blackbird pilots hailed from the state.

The Air Force was happy to unload the A-12 to avoid a costly process of destroying the asbestos-packed plane. Once the Air Force museum agreed to the loan, Mr. Goodall arranged for two massive cargo planes from the New York Air National Guard to haul the Blackbird in pieces from California. He persuaded a local hotel to put up the flight and moving crews free of charge for 10 days. "The Air Force estimated the move would cost $500,000. I got it done for $27,000. That makes me the deal-of-the-century guy," Mr. Goodall says.

Back in St. Paul, he marshaled volunteers and corporate donations for restoration work. He then spent years -- and thousands of his own dollars, he says -- scrounging for cockpit instruments, at one point swapping a prized ejection seat from his private collection to get a supersonic speedometer known as a Mach meter.

All was well until last November, when the museum got a letter from Mr. Aitken, the Air Force museum curator, invoking a provision of the loan agreement that allows the Air Force to reclaim its plane by giving 60 days' notice. The only reason Mr. Aitken cited for the decision was the need to "satisfy current exhibit requirements."

Distressed local Air Guard commanders appealed to save the A-12, calling it a "labor of love." Mr. Aitken replied that the plane didn't conform to the air park's primary mission, which is to commemorate the state guard wing's history, and said it would be better suited at the CIA. Mr. Goodall, who is now retired in Seattle but returns to the Twin Cities occasionally to visit his beloved Blackbird, energized the opposition movement by urging guardsmen and the museum's civilian nonprofit foundation to enlist Minnesota and national politicians. He also mobilized support from former A-12 pilots.

Mr. Goodall's plea: If the Air Force wants a plane to commemorate the CIA's pioneering past, it should take one that actually flew in combat. Minnesota's plane never saw action. The A-12 in Birmingham, Ala., on the other hand, photographed

North Vietnamese surface-to-air missile sites in 1967, later sustained flak damage, and flew over North Korea on a spy mission in 1968 after the North Koreans captured the USS Pueblo, claiming the Navy ship had strayed into its territorial waters.

Some Minnesotans are upset that the Air Force gave short notice and didn't offer to discuss its A-12 plans. "This is a museum, a community, not a war game," said Mark Ness, vice chairman of the museum foundation and a retired Air National Guard brigadier general. Mr. Goodall knew the odds were long. The Air Force has plucked other planes despite local resistance, including a B-36 bomber taken from Fort Worth, Texas, and the celebrated World War II B-17, the Memphis Belle, from its namesake city in Tennessee.

Even as another joint appeal from Minnesota's congressional delegation was delivered to the Air Force secretary Friday, the Air Force museum told guardsmen in Minneapolis-St. Paul to prepare for the movers.

The Minnesota museum's supporters have retained a former state supreme court justice as their lawyer, but as the moving crew continued to unbolt the A-12's wings yesterday, they had yet to decide whether to seek a court injunction against the move. Mr. Goodall, who refers to the plane as "my A-12," has made his own unilateral sortie. He has removed some cockpit instruments he had donated. "No one will see them anyway if the plane is on a pole," he says. "I'll be damned if the CIA...will get their hands on these."

On Being Partisan (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

American politics is ugly these days, and many people wish things were different. For example, Barack Obama recently lamented the fact that "politics has become so bitter and partisan" — which it certainly has.

But he then went on to say that partisanship is why "we can't tackle the big problems that demand solutions. And that's what we have to change first." Um, no. If history is any guide, what we need are political leaders willing to tackle the big problems despite bitter partisan opposition. If all goes well, we'll eventually have a new era of bipartisanship — but that will be the end of the story, not the beginning.

Or to put it another way: what we need now is another F.D.R., not another Dwight Eisenhower.

You see, the nastiness of modern American politics isn't the result of a random outbreak of bad manners. It's a symptom of deeper factors — mainly the growing polarization of our economy. And history says that we'll see a return to bipartisanship only if and when that economic polarization is reversed.

After all, American politics has been nasty in the past. Before the New Deal, America was a nation with a vast gap between the rich and everyone else, and this gap was reflected in a sharp political divide. The Republican Party, in effect, represented the interests of the economic elite, and the Democratic Party, in an often confused way, represented the populist alternative.

In that divided political system, the Democrats probably came much closer to representing the interests of the typical American. But the G.O.P.'s advantage in money, and the superior organization that money bought, usually allowed it to dominate national politics. "I am not a member of any organized party," Will Rogers said. "I am a Democrat."

Then came the New Deal. I urge Mr. Obama — and everyone else who thinks that good will alone is enough to change the tone of our politics — to read the speeches of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, the quintessential example of a president who tackled big problems that demanded solutions.

For the fact is that F.D.R. faced fierce opposition as he created the institutions — Social Security, unemployment insurance, more progressive taxation and beyond — that helped alleviate inequality. And he didn't shy away from confrontation.

"We had to struggle," he declared in 1936, "with the old enemies of peace — business and financial monopoly, speculation, reckless banking, class antagonism, sectionalism, war profiteering. ... Never before in all our history have these forces been so united against one candidate as they stand today. They are unanimous in their hate for me — and I welcome their hatred."

It was only after F.D.R. had created a more equal society, and the old class warriors of the G.O.P. were replaced by "modern Republicans" who accepted the New Deal, that bipartisanship began to prevail.

The history of the last few decades has basically been the story of the New Deal in reverse. Income inequality has returned to levels not seen since the pre-New Deal era, and so have political divisions in Congress as the Republicans have moved right, once again becoming the party of the economic elite. The signature domestic policy initiatives of the Bush administration have been attempts to undo F.D.R.'s legacy, from slashing taxes on the rich to privatizing Social Security. And a bitter partisan gap has opened up between the G.O.P. and Democrats, who have tried to defend that legacy.

What about the smear campaigns, like Karl Rove's 2005 declaration that after 9/11 liberals wanted to "offer therapy and understanding for our attackers"? Well, they're reminiscent of the vicious anti-Catholic propaganda used to defeat Al Smith in 1928: smear tactics are what a well-organized, well-financed party with a fundamentally unpopular domestic agenda uses to change the subject.

So am I calling for partisanship for its own sake? Certainly not. By all means pass legislation, if you can, with plenty of votes from the other party: the Social Security Act of 1935 received 77 Republican votes in the House, about the same as the number of Republicans who recently voted for a minimum wage increase.

But politicians who try to push forward the elements of a new New Deal, especially universal health care, are sure to face the hatred of a large bloc on the right — and they should welcome that hatred, not fear it.

Home Sales Slipped In December (LAT)

By Jesus Sanchez

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2007

Nationwide sales of existing homes sagged in December, contributing to the steepest drop in annual sales in nearly 20 years, according to a real estate report today.

Total existing-home sales — including detached houses and condominiums — in December slipped 0.8% from the previous month to a seasonally adjusted, annual rate of 6.22 million units, according to the National Assn. of Realtors.

For the year, existing home sales totaled 6.48 million properties — the third best year for home sales. However, last year's results represented an 8.4% decline from record high sales in 2005. It was the biggest annual drop since 1989, when sales declined 14.8%, according to the Associated Press.

Despite the sales slide, NAR chief economist David Lereah said a decline in the number of homes available for sale at the end of last year and other data suggested that the housing market might be bottoming out after a lengthy slow down.

"It looks like we're moving beyond the low for the housing cycle last fall, and buyers are responding to historically low interest rates and competitive pricing by home sellers," said Lereah said in a statement. "In addition, a tightening inventory of homes on the market is supporting prices."

Prices, after surging up in recent years, also remained relatively flat at the end of last year. In December, the national median sales price remained unchanged from the same month in 2005 at $222,000 (The median is a typical market price where half of the homes sold for more and half sold for less). For all of 2006, the median price was also $222,000, up 1.1 percent from a median of $219,600 in 2005.

In California, sales of existing homes (excluding condominiums) fell 15.3% in December on a year-over-year basis to a seasonally adjusted, annual pace of 450,550 properties, according to the California Assn. of Realtors. The median sales price, meanwhile, rose 3.7% during the same period to $547,400.

The median number of days it took to sell a single-family home was 73 days in December 2006, compared with a revised 43 days in December 2005.

"The market continues to level out as buyers and sellers search for common ground in today's more balanced environment," said Colleen Badagliacco, president of the state association, in a statement. "The number of homes for sale peaked in June and July and has since edged downward. Although time on the market remains higher than it was a year ago, competitively priced homes continue to sell well."

Existing-Home Sales Plunge, But Pace Is Expected To Ease (WSJ)

By Michael Corkery

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

Homes sales in 2006 tumbled at the fastest pace in 17 years, although economists believe the worst of the housing correction may have passed and sales could start to rebound later this year.

The National Association of Realtors said sales of existing, or previously owned, homes fell 0.8% in December from the previous month to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.22 million units. For all of 2006, sales of existing homes totaled 6.48 million. That was down 8.4% from 2005 and was the largest annual decline since 1989, when rising interest rates and relatively high unemployment fueled a housing recession.

Even after last year's sharp drop, 2006 was the third-strongest year for home sales since the NAR began tracking sales in 1968. And prices managed to move slightly higher in 2006; the existing-home median price was up 1.1% to $222,000.

"We have to remember how strong and some might say overheated the housing market was in 2005 in terms of sales and investor demand," said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist of PNC Financial Services Group in Pittsburgh. Last year showed a big drop as a whole "but to a level that frankly is still reasonably active with over six million home sales."

Sales of condominiums and cooperatives led the decline for the year, falling 10.4% to 803,000 units. Sales of single-family homes were off 8.1% to 5.68 million. However, data for the month of December suggested that the condominium market may be starting to recover, and at a faster pace than the market for single-family homes. Condominium sales rose 2.1% in December compared with the previous month as sales of single-family homes declined 1.3%.

Although sales were down across the nation in December, the biggest year-over-year declines occurred in the West, where sales plunged 15.5%. December sales were down 7.1% in the South from a year earlier, 5.5% in the Northeast and 5.8% in the Midwest.

For 2007, many economists predict that sales will continue to fall, but at a more modest pace and with most of the decline occurring in the first half of the year. "The biggest drop is probably behind us," said Fannie Mae's chief economist, David Berson. "But it's still too soon to say this is unambiguously the bottom."

Forecasts for 2007 vary widely. David Lereah, NAR's chief economist, foresees a modest sales decline of 1.2% this year. Mr. Berson expects existing-home sales to drop 7% to 8%.

Steven Wieting, an economist at Citigroup, said that while the housing market is showing some signs of stabilizing, a significant slowdown in housing-related industries like furniture and appliances may yet come. "Everything in a housing cycle doesn't turn at once," he said. "Lagging indicators will weaken as much as the leading indicators already did."

Separately, the Labor Department reported that new claims for unemployment insurance jumped 36,000 to 325,000 in the week ended Jan. 20. Claims had been below the 300,000 level -- which economists consider a benchmark for very tight labor markets -- the previous two weeks. The Jan. 13 reading was revised to 289,000 from a previously reported level of 290,000.

Sales Of Existing Homes In '06 Had Biggest Drop In 17 Years (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 (AP) — Sales of existing homes fell last month, closing out a year when demand for homes slumped by the largest amount in 17 years.

The National Association of Realtors reported that sales of existing homes were down 0.8 percent in December, a bigger decline than had been expected. For the year, sales fell by 8.4 percent, the biggest annual decline since 1989, when sales of existing homes fell by 14.8 percent.

Even with the sharp decline in sales last year, the median price of an existing home sold in 2006 managed to rise 1.1 percent. But that was far below the double-digit gains during the boom years. The median home price rose by 12.4 percent in 2005.

Economists said they believed that the low point for housing had been reached, and they were forecasting a slow rebound in 2007. Because of that optimism, analysts say they do not believe the slump in housing will drag the overall economy into a recession.

The 0.8 percent drop in sales in December came after two straight months of improving sales, the first back-to-back sales gains since the spring of 2005.

David Lereah, chief economist for the Realtors, said that he believes that sales of existing homes have hit bottom and will start to gradually improve.

He said that in 2005, 40 percent of the market represented purchases of second homes and investors buying homes looking to resell them for quick profits.

He said speculators had now left the market and that should leave sales at a more sustainable level.

In other economics news, the number of Americans filing applications for unemployment benefits shot up last week by the largest amount in 16 months, reversing two weeks of big declines.

The Labor Department reported that 325,000 newly laid-off workers filed claims for jobless benefits last week, an increase of 36,000 from the previous week. That was the biggest one-week rise since a surge of 96,000 claims the week of Sept. 10, 2005, when devastated Gulf Coast businesses laid off workers after Hurricane Katrina.

Home Sales Down 8.4%, Could Be At Bottom (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, January 26, 2007

Sales of existing homes slid 8.4% last year, the steepest fall in 17 years, but the market probably hit bottom in September and is entering a slow recovery that will last until June, the National Association of Realtors said Thursday.

One sign the market could revive this year is that the median home price, which had fallen for four months, was unchanged at $222,000 in December and was up 1.1% for all of 2006. And though it's still a buyer's market in most of the USA, the 7.3-month glut of homes for sale in November shrank to 6.8 months.

"It looks like we are on the bottom, and we will be scraping bottom as we move along," said David Lereah, the NAR's chief economist. "The worst is over for existing-home sales, but I'm still troubled about new homes."

The Commerce Department will release new-home sales today. Those sales are expected to be down 17% for 2006 and to fall a further 9.7% this year, Lereah says.

Not everyone is ready to herald the end of the correction for existing homes. From November to December, they note, sales fell 0.8%, ending a two-month upward trend. December sales were off 7.9% from December 2005. "It's very premature at this point to jump to the conclusion that we've turned the corner," says Brian Bethune of Global Insight.

Buyers are also facing rising interest rates, which make mortgages harder for some to afford. The average rate on a 30-year fixed-rate loan crept up to 6.25% last week, the highest since early November, Freddie Mac said. Each quarter-point increase makes homes unaffordable for about 50,000 more people, Lereah said.

Still, most economists say the bottom has probably been reached.

"Is the worst behind us? Most likely," says Joel Naroff, chief economist of Naroff Economic Advisors. "Are better times here? Doubtful."

During the last housing correction, in 1989, sales tumbled nearly 15%. This time, an overall healthy economy is cushioning the blow.

In areas that never overheated during the boom, such as parts of Texas and North Carolina, home sales are still setting modest records. The housing markets that were the hottest — especially Florida and California — are where the cooling-off will take the longest.

In Florida, sales in December plummeted 28% from the year before, and prices dropped in five metro areas. In California, sales skidded 15%; prices were down in 13 metro areas of the state.

Sales last year in California, where the median-priced home costs a gasp-inducing $567,690, were the lowest in a decade. They are projected to fall a further 7% this year. Robert Kleinhenz, an economist for the California Association of Realtors, said, "I'm hopeful we'll see the bottom soon."

Annual Existing-Home Sales Fall Most In 17 Years (WP)

By Dina Elboghdady

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

Sales of previously owned homes fell slightly in December after two consecutive months of modest gains but took their steepest annual drop since 1989, the National Association of Realtors reported yesterday.

But home prices rose 1.1 percent for the year, and the supply of existing single-family houses, townhouses, condominiums and co-ops for sale shrank from November to December -- offering some hope that the housing market may be on the mend, economists said.

However, stock and bond markets fell on concern that these numbers indicated that housing problems may not be over.

"During the summer, the housing market was like a trauma patient being wheeled in with multiple wounds," said Michael Larson, a real estate analyst for Weiss Research. "There's some momentum back in the market, but I don't think the patient will get off the gurney and walk out the door any time soon."

In 2006, 6.48 million existing homes were sold, down 8.4 percent from 2005, which was the busiest year on record. The drop was the steepest since 1989, when sales fell 14.8 percent from the year before.

In December, existing homes sold at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.22 million, down 0.8 percent from November and down 7.9 percent from December 2005.

Todd Vencil, a real estate analyst at BB&T Capital Markets, said he is relieved to see the rate of sales stabilizing in the 6.2 million to 6.3 million range in recent months after peaking at 7.27 million in June 2005.

"We look for up trends, down trends and sideways trends," Vencil said. "We seem to be in a sideways trend now, which is fine because it indicates there's stabilization, and stabilization today will allow for recovery later in the year."

David Lereah, the National Association of Realtors' chief economist, said he saw good news in the numbers, most notably in home prices.

The median price of a home in December was $222,000, unchanged from December 2005. The median price for all of 2006 was up 1.1 from the previous year, also to $222,000, meaning that half of buyers in 2006 paid more and half paid less.

"All the doomsayers were saying the bubble was going to burst, and it never did in 2006," Lereah said. "We had price increases."

But there's a more muddled picture when it comes to the supply of homes on the market.

The inventory fell 7.9 percent in December from November. If no more homes are added to the mix, there's a 6.8-month supply of existing homes for sale.

That shrinkage is typical in the slow winter months, when sellers tend to pull their homes off the market before re-listing them in the spring, many analysts said.

Instead, some analysts pointed to the year-over-year increase in supply. Inventory climbed 23.3 percent from December 2005 to December 2006. Until that supply dwindles substantially, home prices will drop well into the future, said Nishu Sood, an analyst at Deutsche Bank Securities. "Demand remains fairly weak, and we're likely to see home prices decrease more significantly during the spring selling season," Sood said.

Sood dismisses the price increase for 2006 as insignificant because it factors in numbers from the beginning of the year, when prices were still doing well.

In December, existing-home sales, which account for most home sales, fell 15.5 percent in the West, 7.1 percent in the South, 5.8 percent in the Midwest and 5.5 percent in the Northeast. The South includes the Washington area.

The report released yesterday did not include the sales of newly built homes; the government is scheduled to announce that statistic today. But sales of new homes also appear weak based on the recent earnings reports from builders.

Yesterday, NVR, the parent company of Ryan Homes, reported that profit fell 39 percent in the fourth quarter compared with a year earlier. The Reston company posted revenue of $1.6 billion, down 2 percent.

Fed's View: Steady But Set To Boost (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Surprisingly solid economic growth hasn't only persuaded investors that the Fed won't cut interest rates, it also has prompted some to predict that an overheating economy will trigger rate increases before long.

Fed officials don't appear to share that view -- at least not yet. They believe the housing downturn has yet to show its full impact on the economy. As it does, they expect growth to remain slow and unemployment to rise, hastening the recent downtrend in inflation, which is now running roughly from 2.2% to 2.6%, excluding food and energy. Indeed, officials are more comfortable about inflation than they were two months ago.

In spite of that, the Fed, at the end of its policy meeting Wednesday, is likely to reaffirm its "bias" toward raising rates rather than lowering them, citing inflation concerns. It is almost certain to leave its target for short-term interest rates unchanged at 5.25%. The Fed has maintained that target and its "tightening bias" since June.

There are several reasons the Fed is likely to signal inflation concerns for at least one more meeting. Some officials believe that even if underlying inflation is coming down, it is still unacceptably high. Because they are uncertain how much further it will fall, they believe the Fed, to keep the public from expecting higher inflation, should be biased toward raising rates.

The second, and potentially more important reason, is that the job market, unlike the rest of the economy, is stronger than expected. The longer unemployment stays low, the greater the likelihood that fear of accelerating wages and prices will prompt officials to contemplate an interest-rate increase.

Janet Yellen, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco, said in a speech this week that there is "an emerging puzzle in the data: Why is the labor market apparently going gangbusters, while growth ... has turned in only a middling performance on average in recent quarters?" Her puzzlement is shared by some of her colleagues.

When the economy grows at its long-term "potential" rate, which is thought to be a little under 3%, it creates just enough jobs to employ new entrants to the labor market, and the unemployment rate is steady. But last year, as growth fell below 3% in the spring, the unemployment rate declined steadily, from 4.7% in the first quarter to 4.5% in the fourth.

Ms. Yellen said one worrisome explanation may be that either the economy's potential growth rate is notably slower than 3%, or that growth is stronger than the official data now show. In either case, the economy could face tighter capacity constraints than first thought, stoking inflation pressure.

Ms. Yellen said a likelier explanation is that the job market has simply lagged behind the overall economy, and unemployment will soon move higher. Other officials agree, noting in particular that construction employment seems bound to decline more.

In early December, economists thought the economy would grow at an annual rate of 2% in the fourth quarter, according to a survey by forecasting company Macroeconomic Advisers LLC, following growth rates of 2% in the third quarter and 2.6% in the second. Many analysts said the Fed could shift to a "neutral" bias -- that is, saying rates were equally likely to go up or down -- at next week's meeting. Futures markets expected three to four quarter-percentage-point rate cuts this year.

Since December, however, trade, housing starts, employment and manufacturing activity all have proved stronger than expected, and growth is now thought to have hit 3% in the fourth quarter. While the consensus forecast is for first-quarter growth of around 2.5%, that, too, is rising; Morgan Stanley expects 3.5%. Housing remains a drag on the economy, but trade and consumer spending, fueled by job growth and lower oil prices, have compensated. Some economists predict that presages more rate increases.

Michael Feroli, economist at J.P. Morgan Chase, says sub-3% growth in mid-2006 shows "the Fed nailed the soft landing." But the point of the soft landing "is to get some increase in unemployment ... and that didn't happen. The clock is ticking to see if it happens at all." His firm expects the Fed to start raising rates again in October.

Fed officials don't appear ready to go with that forecast yet. They still think the economy is slowing. They believe further declines in construction are necessary just to bring supply in line with current home sales. Moreover, flat or falling home prices are expected to make consumers feel less wealthy, damping their spending later this year.

Inflation is also ebbing. Excluding food, energy and shelter, it was just 0.5%, at an annual rate, in the past six months. Shelter is heavily influenced by rents, which face downward pressure as owners of unsold homes put them up for rent.

But just in case, a continued bias toward raising rates would keep the Fed, and the markets, prepared in case they are wrong.

Blue Chips Post Biggest Loss In 2 Months In Heavy Trading (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

A day after hitting its 26th record close in four months, the Dow Jones Industrial Average plunged 119.21 points, its heaviest decline in two months.

The decline left the blue chips at 12502.56, down 0.9% in a day of heavy trading. The average is up just 0.3% in 2007.

More broadly, with the DJIA up more than 17% since July 14, many investors were asking how much higher it can go without a pullback. Some are beginning to sell to lock in profits.

The day's news wasn't awful -- just troubling enough to spark selling.

Investors learned that sales of previously occupied homes fell in December. Home builder Beazer Homes USA reported a quarterly loss and said it hasn't seen "any meaningful evidence of a sustainable recovery in the housing market."

Bristol-Myers pulled down drug stocks with its own quarterly loss, due to competition from generics.

Some energy-related companies had bad news. Peabody Energy warned of soft quarterly profits to come. BJ Services posted a disappointing quarterly profit. Occidental Petroleum said fourth-quarter profit fell.

Some stock investors are worried now about bond yields. The yield of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note, which influences a variety of other market rates including some mortgage rates, was below 4.5% last month. Yesterday, it rose to 4.865% amid fears the Federal Reserve won't cut interest rates this year.

"You are seeing interest rates run up a little here and that is causing some concern in the market," said portfolio manager Richard Nash at Cleveland investment-management firm McCormack Advisors International. Higher rates raise costs for consumers and businesses.

Investors looked past upbeat profit news from companies including eBay and Nokia. A $1.14 decline in crude-oil prices to $54.23 a barrel served mainly to worsen concerns about energy-company profits.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 1.1%, or 16.23 points, to 1423.90, up 0.4% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index slid 1.3%, or 32.04 points, to 2434.24, up 0.8% in 2007.

In news that could affect trading today, Microsoft reported a stronger-than-expected per-share quarterly profit and announced a share buyback. Its stock rose 2% in after-hours trading.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks retreated1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 3.09 billion shares; 788 stocks rose and 2,575 fell.

Bond prices declined2. The 10-year Treasury note fell 14/32, or $4.38 for each $1,000 invested. The 30-year bond was down 24/32, pushing the yield up to 4.961%.

The dollar strengthened3. Late in New York, it traded at 121.15 yen, up from 121.11, while the euro weakened against the dollar to $1.2939 from $1.2960.

Strong Global Economy Clobbers Stocks (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, January 26, 2007

Stocks endured their worst sell-off in two months Thursday after investors bristled over news regarding China's economy, home sales and interest rates.

Investors pushed the Dow Jones industrials down 119.21 points, or 0.9%, to 12,502.56, a harsh sell-off coming one day after the Dow set a new high. It was the Dow's worst day since it fell 158.46 points on Nov. 27, 2006. Still, the blue-chip barometer is up 0.3% this year.

Tech stocks, measured by the Nasdaq composite index, took it even harder, falling 32.04 points, or 1.3%, to 2434.24. The Nasdaq is up 0.8% this year, making it the best performer year-to-date among the major market indexes.

Hit by declines in stocks in the paper and packaging, investment banking and brokerage and home entertainment software industries, the Standard & Poor's 500 lost 16.23 points to 1423.90. The S&P 500 is up 0.4% this year.

News of a red-hot Chinese economy was one thing that hit stocks, says Todd Clark of Nollenberger Capital. China reported blistering economic growth of 10.7%, igniting fears of inflation.

Next, investors were served up news indicating sales of existing homes fell 0.8% in December (story, 1B). That weak number made them worry if they've overestimated how healthy consumer spending is. "It wasn't a recipe for higher (stock) pric es today," Clark says.

And then stock investors contended with a surge in the yield of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note to a three-month high of 4.88%.

Not only does the higher yield tempt investors away from stocks, but it signals some investors may think the economy is healthy enough for the Federal Reserve to boost rates, says Gary Tapp at SunTrust Robinson Humphrey. "It looks like the U.S. economy is strengthening," he says.

But it could be simply the market needed to cool off after a strong 2006, he says. "The market had been going straight up for a long time," Tapp says.

Highlights:

Varian Medical, a medical-supply company, fell $4.37 to $45.77. On Wednesday, it issued a forecast for its fiscal second quarter that was 4% lower than expected.

•Plexus, an electronics manufacturing company, lost $3.04 to $18.18. The company said Wednesday it expected to earn up to 19 cents a share in its second quarter, 46% lower than forecasts.

10-year-old Filmmaker Sues For Creative Control (LAT)

By Josh Friedman, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2007

He seeks creative control of his movie, alleging his financier wants 'final cut and everything.'

Budding filmmaker Dominic Scott Kay wants creative control, along with a shot at the Sundance Film Festival. And, as often happens in the entertainment business, to get what he wants he's headed to court with one of Hollywood's top litigators in tow.

The child actor, whose credits include Steven Spielberg's "Minority Report" and voicing Wilbur the pig in Paramount Pictures' recent "Charlotte's Web," is in a creative battle with Conroy Kanter, the financier of the short film Kay directed. The two met when Kay played with Kanter's son on a soccer team.

"She wanted to make all the decisions and stuff," Kay said. "She wanted final cut and everything."

Kay alleges in a lawsuit filed Thursday in Los Angeles County Superior Court that Kanter, his Malibu neighbor, is trying to wrestle away control of "Saving Angelo," starring actor Kevin Bacon, which she helped bankroll with $11,000.

Kanter's attorney, Michael Stoller, alleged that Kay's mother was behind the lawsuit and was seeking financial gain, adding that his client considered financing the film a "charitable contribution" to animal rights. "This is another example that no good deed goes unpunished," he said.

Kanter was seeking to use Kay to become a Hollywood "player," said Dylan Ruga, who is representing Kay along with prominent Hollywood lawyer Stanton L. (Larry) Stein.

Kay alleged that he had shelved the film because Kanter had threatened to sue him since September 2005 if he completed the editing or screened the finished product without her consent. The lawsuit said profit would go toward animal rescue charities.

The movie was invited to the Los Angeles International Short Film Festival, and it could have been entered in the 2006 and 2007 editions of the Sundance Film Festival, Kay alleges.

"One of the most frustrating things was that Ms. Kanter stopped me from showing the film at Sundance for two years in a row," Kay said. "I don't think that's fair."

Democrats' New Leader Embraces Faith (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON

Harold Ford Jr. is back in national politics. The young former congressman from Tennessee, who came close last fall to becoming the first African- American elected to the Senate from the South since Reconstruction, was named chair of the Democratic Leadership Council (DLC) Thursday.

The Washington-based DLC has been an ideological home base for a generation of successful Democratic politicians trying to carve out a centrist policy approach – including former President Clinton and his wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, now also running for president.

Speaking at a Monitor breakfast Thursday, Mr. Ford laid out the policy terrain he will be focusing on and how he hopes to help the Democratic Party build on its recent successes.

"This new majority in the Congress ... gives the nation a chance to not only see a new leadership but to experience and embark on a new direction on a lot of policy fronts – be it international terror; global competitiveness or globalization, whatever you choose to call it; be it ways to help lower the cost of healthcare," said Ford. "This congress has its work cut out for it."

Unlike most past DLC chairs, Ford does not currently hold elective office, and so he will travel extensively around the country, helping the group develop policy positions. Ford has also accepted a teaching position at Vanderbilt University in Nashville.

Two of the top three Democratic contenders, according to early polls, are active in the DLC – Senator Clinton and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina – but the group will not issue any endorsements. Part of the DLC's goal is to help expand the Democrats' appeal in parts of the country where it has struggled in recent years, including the South. Already, the Democrats have made gains in the Mountain West, after a period of decline.

Ford made clear that he intends to run for office again someday. When asked what went wrong in his race for the Senate, which he lost by three percentage points, he said: "It's over with, we didn't win."

"A lot of things happened right there at the end of the race.... I haven't sat down and looked at the numbers," he said. "I know I want to do it again one day. In my state, it takes a few times to run sometimes, one or two times to run before you win."

DOJ_NMG_0122353

During the campaign, Ford, who is single, took some heat for his attendance at a Playboy party at last year's Super Bowl. This year, he won't be at the Super Bowl. But, he quipped, "I make clear [that] I love Jesus, I love girls, and I absolutely love football. That's not a DLC comment."

"I would hope that any candidate not be timid about sharing their faith," Ford said.

For him, some of the central issues of the day – healthcare, poverty, global warming – go right to the heart of his religious tradition.

"Anybody that really preaches about their faith, how could they not be concerned about those three issues," he said. "The New Testament's essentially dedicated to what people with money should do for people who don't have a lot of it. So ... if your religion actually informs your faith and not politics informing your faith, you should actually care about those things."

Harold Ford Jr. Will Lead Democratic Leadership Council (MCA)

Memphis Commercial Appeal, January 26, 2007

January 25, 2007 WASHINGTON -- Former Memphis congressman Harold Ford Jr. today accepted the high-profile post of chairman of the Democratic Leadership Council, the moderate policy group that launched a little-known Arkansas governor named Bill Clinton to national stardom and the presidency.

The announcement was made this morning at a Washington hotel breakfast sponsored by the Christian Science Monitor, but had been anticipated for days.

Advertisement

"I'm excited about the post for a couple of reasons," he said. "I think that the new majority in Congress presents not only our party with a great opportunity to give the nation a chance to see a new leadership but to embarking in a new direction on a lot of policy fronts."

DLC founder Al From and DLC president Bruce Reed made the announcement at the monthly breakfast for print journalists. Ford told the group that the job is temporary in the sense that he plans to seek elective office in Tennessee in the future.

He fielded questions for more than an hour on policy positions he's taken in the past, and on the role his faith played in the recent U.S. Senate race he lost to former Chattanooga mayor Bob Corker.

Later, asked if he'd be going to the Super Bowl this year, Ford said: "I love Jesus, I love girls and I love football."

And although the DLC won't endorse a Democrat in the presidential primaries, Ford did endorse Al Gore to get an Oscar for his film "An Inconvenient Truth."

Before the announcement, many said the post is the best available platform for a moderate-to-conservative Democrat as he waits for elective offices, like Lamar Alexander's Senate seat in 2008 or the Tennessee governorship in 2010, to contest.

New Dem Leader Challenges GOP Over Religion (POL)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, January 26, 2007

The new head of the leading group of centrist Democrats lashed out Wednesday at what he called the "hypocrisy" of Republicans who overdo their talk about religion.

Harold Ford Jr., the charismatic Tennessee congressman who lost a nasty Senate race last year, on Thursday was named chairman of the Democratic Leadership Council, the party's most influential centrist group.

Ford made his debut at the Christian Science Monitor breakfast, a Washington institution for reporters. Once called the Sperling Breakfast, after founder Godfrey Sperling, the breakfasts -- which started in 1966 -- are a chance for politicians to float ideas and field questions in a relaxed atmosphere.

But business gets done: Everything is on the record. And Ford did not disappoint the sleepy-headed journalists, offering a passionate response when asked about the role of faith in politics. During the question-and-answer period, Ford said candidates should not hesitate to discuss the role religion plays in shaping their positions. But he added that faith "is often used by some to beat up on or whip up on others, and the Bible that I read doesn't suggest that you do that."

"God works in mysterious ways," Ford said. "Some of the nomenclature and jargon that's used by those who invoke faith regularly - compared with some of their actions and behavior and conduct - I think has raised concerns on the part of many that maybe those who preach it the most aren't practicing the most. I pray for all of them, and would hope that they'd be able to find some healing and wholeness in their lives, but that they would also see that maybe they should reflect a little before they go lashing out and attacking others. I think voters get it, too. The hypocrisy on the part of some was so interesting in this last election."

In November, Ford, age 36, lost by 51 percent to 48 percent to Republican Bob Corker, but told the breakfast several times that he plans to run again. "Between political jobs?" he joked when DLC founder Al From noted that an earlier chairman was Charles S. Robb after he was Virginia governor and before he was a U.S. senator.

Ford succeeds Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who's heading off to run for president. His other predecessors include former President Bill Clinton, Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana and Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut.

Ford was presented at the breakfast by From as a rising star who will help the group develop a new generation of leaders to pursue the group's pro-growth, pro-defense policies. "We will be aggressive. The agenda will be ambitious," Ford said. "We certainly anticipate the conversation attracting the leading minds in our party, the leading candidates in our party."

During the question period, Ford recalled Steven Thomma, chief political correspondent for McClatchy Newspapers, from a catfish restaurant on the Tennessee campaign trail toward the end of the campaign, and joked that the reporter almost couldn't ask his question because he was eating coleslaw. "When I left that, I thought you were going to win," the reporter said.

"So did I," Ford said, to big laughter.

"What happened?" Thomma asked.

Ford didn't seem interested in a detailed autopsy. "It's over with - we didn't win," he said. "We ran a hard campaign. A lot of things happened right there at the end of the race. I don't mean to be flippant about your question. I've sat down at looked at the numbers, and I know I want to do it again one day. In my state, it takes a few times to run - sometimes one or two times to run before you win."

Then he spoke about the oft-discussed phenomenon of black candidates, including former Virginia Gov. L. Douglas Wilder, who do better in polls than they do at the ballot box, apparently because white respondents say they're going to vote for an African American and then don't. "One thing that was very interesting in the last week were the polls that came out showing us down double digits, which we never were, and I think that probably played a little bit of role in sapping a little bit of the momentum," Ford said. "People kept calling it a 'Wilder tax.' … I assume it means if you're a black guy, you've got to be way ahead because you're going to lose votes on Election Day. Well, the opposite happened here, according to the polls. We actually gained, and came within 49,000 votes of winning. … We'll run again, one day."

Ford made it clear that he still resents some tactics of Republicans. Asked what he had learned about race in the contest, and what advice he would have for Sen. Barack Obama in his presidential race, Ford replied: "Run hard and be honest and put it in the voters' hands. That's all you can do." He also said: "This stuff on race, you'd probably need to ask my opponent."

Hagel Ponders White House Run As War Criticism Raises His Profile (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

Washington Post, January 26, 2007

His Republican colleagues regard him warily. The White House barely speaks to him. He is reviled by his party's conservative base.

Looks as though Sen. Chuck Hagel is on a roll.

Both parties have their Iraq war contrarians. For the Democrats, it is Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, whose steadfast support for President Bush nearly cost him his seat last year and forced him to run as an independent. The Republican version is Hagel, a career maverick from Nebraska and the only GOP senator to call for an end to the war.

Hagel's sharp criticism of the war has placed him squarely in the mainstream of public opinion on Iraq and revived long-dormant speculation about his presidential ambitions. Hagel has been eclipsed by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a leading contender for his party's presidential nomination who has vigorously endorsed the president's war policies.

But with McCain appearing increasingly isolated on the issue as public opinion has turned overwhelmingly against the war, Hagel is acting like a politician who believes his stock is climbing. In other words, he is considering a White House run.

Hagel said in a wide-ranging interview this week that he is discussing his options with his family and other confidants and will make a decision in the next six weeks.

He said one possibility is forming a presidential exploratory committee and -- despite his outcast position within his party -- seeking the Republican nomination. Or he may seek a third Senate term. Then again, he might take a more creative path.

Hagel joked during the interview about teaming up with New York Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, a moderate Republican, and also floated the possibility of joining a bipartisan unity ticket with a Democrat -- with his name first, of course.

Hagel clearly admires Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and calls him "a star," but he doubts the two could ever team up given the vast difference in their parties' principles. "I don't know if it gets to that point, but there is a shift going on out there, and there's nothing like a war that does that," Hagel said.

His GOP critics fume that Hagel and his Democratic allies who sponsor resolutions opposing a troop buildup are undermining Bush at a critical moment. "I really don't understand Senator Hagel," said Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah.). "But playing around with resolutions when we all know we've got to stay and get the job done -- that doesn't make any sense. Most Republicans want us to win over there."

Hagel attracted the support of only 1 percent of registered Republicans in recent polls, compared with 25 to 30 percent for McCain. And his standing among conservative party faithful who will determine the outcome of the Republican presidential nomination remains strikingly low because of the intensity of his attacks on Bush. But Hagel has gained a particular following within the antiwar community. An Internet "draft Hagel" movement has formed, and even die-hard liberals admit they find him appealing.

"Chuck Hagel for president! If it ever narrows down to a choice between him and some Democratic hack who hasn't the guts to fundamentally challenge the president on Iraq, then the conservative Republican from Nebraska will have my vote," said an Internet article last week by Robert Scheer, co-author of the book "The Five Biggest Lies Bush Told Us About Iraq."

Like McCain, his close friend and potential 2008 GOP rival, Hagel is a decorated Vietnam War veteran, but his assessment of the Iraq conflict is radically different. McCain has asserted that despite serious mistakes by the Bush administration, victory remains possible. Hagel believes that U.S. troops are being thrown into a civil war that cannot be won and calls the conflict "the most divisive issue in this country since Vietnam."

Earlier in their careers, McCain, 70, and Hagel, 60, were viewed as rising Republican stars, two plain-spoken outsiders with gritty military rÃ©sumÃ©s. After losing to Bush in the 2000 GOP nomination battle, McCain greatly enhanced his stature inside the party by embracing Bush's Iraq policy. Meanwhile, Hagel, an early and persistent critic of the invasion, grew more estranged.

"He's held his view for a long time and I've held mine for a long time, so it's not as if we suddenly find ourselves on the opposite side of the issue," McCain said of Hagel. "I respect his views. I maintain my strong affection and respect for him."

Hagel warned against military action long before the Iraq invasion, but despite his trepidations, he supported a Senate resolution authorizing the war. He has since renounced his vote and has been trying to atone for it ever since. When Bush announced a plan earlier this month to deploy additional troops, Hagel co-sponsored, with two prominent Democrats, a new Senate resolution opposing the plan. Though nonbinding, the measure has triggered the first significant confrontation between the White House and Congress over Iraq since the war began.

Hagel vainly implored his Republican colleagues to join him in supporting the resolution, which was approved 12 to 9 during a session of the Foreign Relations Committee on Wednesday. "If you wanted a safe job, go sell shoes," he said. "This is a tough business."

One of Hagel's sparring partners is Lieberman, who has infuriated Democrats with his outspoken war advocacy. Two weeks ago, the Nebraska senator was introduced to the Internet video site YouTube when his son, an eighth-grader, showed him a clip from "Meet the Press" that was drawing heavy traffic. It was a showdown between Hagel and Lieberman over Iraq.

If critics of Bush's troop increase have their way, Lieberman asserted, the consequences "for my children and grandchildren, I fear, will be disastrous."

"That's ridiculous," Hagel shot back, "and I am offended that any responsible member of Congress or anyone else would even suggest such a thing. Senator Lieberman talks about his children and grandchildren. We all have children and grandchildren; he doesn't have a market on that."

Hagel is a loner in the Senate, a serious and somewhat distant colleague who eschews consultants and other trappings of political ambition -- although he is a regular on political talk shows. He travels the country extensively and particularly enjoys talking to students. Last month, he spoke at Nebraska Wesleyan University and the University of Nebraska at Lincoln, and he is to receive an honorary degree from the College of William and Mary next month. Ambassadors and foreign officials visit his office regularly.

He often speaks of the current period as a "transformational time" that could bring a political earthquake, as early as the 2008 election. He sees parallels to 1960 and 1980, which resulted in the pivotal presidencies of John F. Kennedy and Ronald Reagan.

"Politics and politicians must become relevant to the times . . . or they become irrelevant," Hagel said. "And when you become irrelevant, something is going to fill that void."

TIME Poll: Hillary Vs. McCain? (TIME)

By Tony Karon

Hillary Clinton is the clear front-runner to win the Democratic Party's nomination for President in 2008, but the Republican race will be a close contest between Senator John McCain and former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani — with McCain edging Giuliani by a three- to four-point margin. And a presidential face-off between Clinton and McCain, right now, would be close to a dead heat. Those are some of the key findings of a new TIME poll earlier this week that canvassed a random sample of 1,064 registered voters by phone.

Despite the buzz generated by Senator Barack Obama entering the race, the survey found that Senator Clinton would beat him for the Democratic nomination by a margin of 40% to 21%. Senator John Edwards is a distant third with 11%. Obama clearly suffers a disadvantage in profile among likely voters, with only 51% indicating that they knew enough about him to form an opinion, compared with 94% saying the same of Hillary Clinton. In Obama's favor, however, is his far lower negative ratings. While 58% of voters familiar with Hillary Clinton have a positive view of her, 41% give her negative marks, for a net favorability score of +17. By contrast, Obama's net favorability score is +47. On the Republican side, Giuliani has a net favorability rating of +68, with only 14% having a negative view of him. McCain's net favorability score is +45.

McCain, however, holds a narrow lead of 30% to 26% over Giuliani for the G.O.P. nomination. A race between McCain and Clinton would be a virtual tie (47%-47%), according to the poll, while McCain would beat either Obama or Senator John Edwards by a 7-point margin.

Clinton's popularity within her party does not translate as easily across party lines as Obama's does, or indeed as Giuliani's and McCain's. Only 58% of the total sample of respondents had a very or somewhat favorable impression of her, compared with 82% for Giuliani (including 7 out of 10 Democratic voters), and 70% each for Obama and McCain — both of whom showed strongly among independents. These figures must be read against the fact that 94% of respondents said they knew "a great deal" or "some" about Clinton, while 73% said the same of Giuliani and 66% of John McCain. Only 51% knew "a great deal" or "some" about Obama.

If the election were held now, Rudy Giuliani appears to have the support of the greatest number of respondents of both parties, with 56% indicating they would "definitely" or "probably" support him — followed by Hillary Clinton (51%) John McCain (50%) and Barack Obama (50%). But Clinton has a strong edge when the question is which presidential candidate people would most like to have over to their homes for dinner. The former First Lady led the dinner-invitation field with 26%, while Obama and McCain tied for second place at 15%. But with the New Hampshire primaries a year away, the the four leading contenders all have some work to do: Obama in making himself better known, Clinton in making herself better liked, McCain in matching Giuliani's appeal to Democratic voters, and Giuliani in landing more invitations to dinner.

IRAQ

HOW THE WAR SCRAMBLES PARTY LINES

The Iraq war has actedÂ like bleach on this year's primary colors: political stripes have faded and dissolved as candidates scramble to explain how they would get America out of Iraq without igniting the Middle East. The most conservative candidate for the G.O.P., Sam Brownback, is closer on Iraq to Democrat Joseph Biden than he is to John McCain. Democrats John Edwards and Hillary Clinton, meanwhile, are worlds apart.

The Republican Party has perhaps the deepest identity crisis over the way forward in Iraq. G.O.P. voters are down on Bush but still largely behind the war, and three leading Republicans--John McCain, Mitt Romney and Rudy Giuliani--would like to change policy but refuse to abandon the mission. All three back Bush's troop increase. McCain has, however, attacked the Administration's handling of the war. Brownback--like fellow Republican and potential candidate Chuck Hagel--supports scaling back the U.S. military mission and appears to be betting that by next winter Republican voters will be looking for an exit strategy.

Most Democratic voters oppose the war and want it ended. But too dovish a position by candidates now could look weak to independents and centrists in the general election. Hillary Clinton backed the war and the mission through last November's election but has since called for capping troop levels. Biden, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, calls for cautious withdrawal and scores points for his proposed political solutions, including direct talks with Iran and Syria. Always antiwar, Barack Obama has taken the party position of cautious withdrawal: a troop drawdown starting in four to six months. John Edwards has come out hard and early to declare his vote authorizing the war was a mistake and to issue the strongest antisurge message among the major Democratic candidates.

No position on either side is particularly safe; they are all gambles on a certain outcome in Iraq. If the situation on the ground stabilizes, the leading Republicans and Clinton will appear steady hands; if it deteriorates, Biden, Brownback and Edwards will look wiser.

MONEY

THE FIRST TEST: WHO CAN RAISE THE MOST CASH

After Barack Obama posted an online video to announce he was running for President and promised a new kind of politics for his campaign, he went straight old-school. He spent much of the rest of his day dialing for dollars, asking wealthy Democrats to support him in his quest to compete with Hillary Clinton's deep pockets. When Clinton got into the race a few days later, the New York Senator made clear she would avoid public financing for her campaign--forgoing a system that matches the first $250 of every individual campaign donation--because she believes she can raise much more than the $50 million limit imposed on candidates who accept matching funds in the primary.

The 2008 presidential campaign may show that race, religion and gender don't matter, but money still talks, and more loudly than ever before. In 2003, John Edwards surprised everyone by raking in $7 million in campaign donations in the first three months of the year. That amount will be like Monopoly money after 2008. Strategists say the two eventual party nominees could well spend up to $500 million each before the general election.

Whether they get their money by calling, blogging or throwing lavish fund raisers, would-be contenders had better start quickly. Raising even $50 million for the primary this year means coming up with $137,000 a day.

RELIGION

CHASING VOTERS INTO THE PEW

This time around, candidates from both parties are looking for the right tone on religion. On the Republican side, the usual scramble is under way to win over the large Evangelical base, which is still without a top-tier candidate. Many conservative Christian activists admire Sam Brownback for his opposition to embryonic stem-cell research, abortion and gay marriage, even though he is a long shot. Three G.O.P. front runners aren't exactly dream candidates for social conservatives: Mitt Romney faces a challenge in explaining his Mormonism to conservative Christians suspicious of it. Rudy Giuliani supports abortion rights. And in 2000 John McCain called conservative Christian activists like Jerry Falwell "agents of intolerance."

Democratic candidates for 2008 are determined to build credibility with religious swing voters. Barack Obama devoted a chapter to his religion in his newest book and is far more likely to talk about his "personal relationship with Jesus Christ" than McCain, who keeps religious matters largely to himself. In December Obama publicly joined Brownback at an AIDS-awareness convention at Saddleback, the Rev. Rick Warren's evangelical megachurch in Orange County, Calif. On its website the Clinton campaign, in a bio of the New York Senator, describes at length that "faith was central to her family. Her mother taught Sunday school, and Hillary was a regular in her church youth group."

But Democratic activists may have little appetite for overt religiosity, particularly if it impinges on socially liberal issues. Former vice-presidential nominee John Edwards, though he is tacking left in his second White House run, nonetheless had to disappoint a questioner at a New Hampshire town hall who wanted him to support gay marriage. "I am just not there yet," Edwards says.

AMAZON FACTOR

FIRST, WRITE A BEST SELLER

This election cycleÂ may boast the most ever candidates with best sellers: John McCain with Faith of My Fathers, Barack Obama, riding high on the hardcover and paperback lists (The Audacity of Hope and Dreams from My Father) and Hillary Clinton, whose Living History sold more than 1.2 million hardbacks. The most memorable title belongs to former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee, who wrote Quit Digging Your Grave with a Knife and Fork after losing 100 lbs. If he's not elected President, he could at least make it into Oprah's Book Club.

LAST-MINUTE CAMPAIGNS

THE WAIT-AND-SEE PRIMARY

Despite the rash of newÂ candidates announcing their bid this month, some heavyweights are holding out, either for tactical reasons or out of indecision, and could shake things up with a late entry into the race. The biggest could-be contenders are former Vice President Al Gore and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich. Gore denies that he plans to run, but his hit film, An Inconvenient Truth, and his strong stands on climate change and the war in Iraq have rehabilitated him with Democratic activists.

Gingrich has energized some on the right with his calls for a conservative revival in the Republican Party. If Mitt Romney's attempt to woo the party base fails, Gingrich, who's already polling in third place, could capitalize. Some dream of a run by George W. Bush's brother, former Florida Governor Jeb Bush, or Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, although the President's low approval ratings and the lack of progress in Iraq could dim their prospects. But with 21 months before the election for the announced candidates to pummel one another, voters may tire of the whole bunch, leaving the door open for a fresh bid by a familiar face.

OPERATIVES

RECRUITING THE NEW GURUS

DOJ_NMG_0122359

The hunt is onÂ for theÂ next Karl Rove, the political consultant with the strategic acumen and message magic to steer a candidate all the way from Iowa to the Oval Office.

The biggest names in the race, Clinton and McCain, have the early talent advantage. The former boasts Hillaryland--a cadre of loyal, long-serving pros--with the addition of a few carefully selected people from her husband's operation. McCain retains his inner circle from 2000 and has scooped up a slew of Bush veterans, even though some aided in the trashing of McCain in the infamous South Carolina 2000 primary. "We're in the business of making friends now," explains one of the Arizona Senator's old hands.

Hillary Clinton, of course, has the top political consultant who is not on the payroll: her husband. And then there's Rove. Bush's political guru coyly refuses to say whether he plans to advise a Republican in the 2008 race. If he does and his man wins, the next Karl Rove could be ... Karl Rove.

THE BLOGOSPHERE

WINNING OVER THE ONLINE ACTIVISTS

While the past fewÂ elections have seen candidates try out newfangled blogging technology with all the comfort and skill of a granddad on a skateboard, the 2008 candidates are doing everyone a favor by not trying to be bloggers.

"Bloggers put much more of a premium on understanding the medium rather than joining in," says Kevin Madden, a spokesman for Mitt Romney. Romney's strategy is to participate in podcasts and talk regularly with top conservative bloggers, an approach that has made him the top vote getter in Republican blogger straw polls, though he lags in national telephone ones.

Hillary Clinton, a real-world front runner, dwells in the low one figures in blogger surveys, but she has hired former Kerry hand Peter Daou to burnish her Web image. Daou says bloggers need to be wooed like any other reporters--or voters, for that matter. "It's very old school," he says. "I just reach out to them one by one." Employing bloggers instead of just courting them is a tricky next step, though. McCain was chastised last year when a blogger posted attacks on Romney without disclosing up front that he was on McCain's payroll.

NEW FACES

Only a few candidates are famous. The rest are known mostly in their universes--the Senate or Arkansas, say--or as perennial protest candidates. Here's a primer on the faces you might not recognize in the crowd.

SAM BROWNBACK

MIKE HUCKABEE

DUNCAN HUNTER

TOM TANCREDO

The Colorado Rep's big issue, border control, inspires base G.O.P. voters. He has sponsored legislation punishing Sudan for its war in Darfur

TOMMY THOMPSON

The former Wisconsin G.O.P. Governor made a name in welfare reform in the '90s. He's pushing a plan to split Iraq into three separate states

DENNIS KUCINICH

Yes, it still rhymes with "spinach." His antiwar stance, looking better now than in '04, has drawn backers among House colleagues in both parties

CHRISTOPHER DODD

The affable Democrat is popular in the Senate. Fluent in Spanish, he's an expert on Latin America and is strong on children's issues

TOM VILSACK

Inexperienced in foreign affairs, he's a likable self-made man. His hopes ride on his record as Iowa's Governor and a champion of ethanol fuel

McCain's Health And Age Present Campaign Challenge (POL)

The Politico, January 26, 2007

"I am older than dirt and have more scars than Frankenstein," John McCain likes to say.

It always gets a laugh, though I don't suppose his mother, who is 94, and her twin sister, appreciate it very much. If he is older than dirt, what does that make them? Older than lava?

If McCain, 70, runs and wins, he would be the oldest person ever inaugurated as president. As is evident from the scar on the left side of his face, he has had malignant melanoma, the most invasive and dangerous form of skin cancer. (One in every 60 Americans is at risk for developing invasive melanoma in their lifetimes.)

I talked to McCain recently and asked him about his health. He said it was good. "I hiked the Grand Canyon rim-to-rim last August with my son, Jack," he said.

I tried to imagine that. The last time I saw it, the Grand Canyon was seriously deep.

How on earth do you hike a thing like that rim-to-rim? I asked.

"Down and up!" he said. "It takes three days."

John Kennedy, who at 43 became the youngest person ever elected president, and who was always associated with "vig-ah," in fact had serious diseases that were kept from the public.

As was revealed in 2002, Kennedy was sick from age 13 through the rest of his life, was on chronic-pain medication throughout his presidency and had Addison's disease, an endocrine disorder that until 1940 was a terminal illness. Kennedy survived it through cortisone injections, which at the time only rich people could afford.

Dr. Jeffrey Kelman, who examined Kennedy's medical records in 2002, said, "He was never healthy. I mean, the image you get of vigor and progressive health wasn't true."

The point being: Electing a young person to the presidency is no guarantee that he or she will be healthy or stay healthy.

The media often demands the release of medical records these days, and the candidates sometimes comply. There were so many false rumors circulating about McCain's health when he ran for president in 2000, that he released 1,500 pages of medical and psychiatric records. They showed him to be in good health and not nuts. (And how many presidential candidates can say that?)

"We'll probably have to do that again," McCain told me of the record release.

Do you think all candidates should release their medical and psychiatric records? I asked.

I thought he would jump on that and say yes, just to put pressure on the other presidential campaigns, but he did not.

"I don't know," he said. "I think probably in my case it was a little more unique because of my POW status and the war injuries and the fact that people were spreading rumors that I was crazy and disabled both. So we'll probably have to do that again."

You think the rumors will start again? I asked.

"They already have!" he said.

But I don't think that is going to be McCain's problem. It isn't his health but rather his demeanor that worries some people.

The Iraq war, which he strongly supports, has disturbed and dismayed him. He told The Washington Post it was a "train wreck." He told me it was a "witch's brew." He visits wounded soldiers and Marines when they come back home for treatment and if any civilian feels the pain of the military, it is McCain.

And it is showing.

Last April, I wrote of a campaign swing McCain made through New Hampshire and Iowa, "Though McCain said he enjoyed himself, he was not the rollicking campaigner of six years ago. At a number of stops, he was largely subdued and sometimes almost somber."

Last Sunday, on "Meet the Press with Tim Russert," McCain seemed to have moved from almost somber to almost gloomy.

DOJ_NMG_0122361

In my recent interview, I suggested to him that the laughing, joking John McCain of his last presidential campaign seemed to be AWOL.

"It's hard to make jokes; we are a nation at war," he said. "There are great national security challenges that we face. But I also believe, as Ronald Reagan did, that America's greatest days are ahead of us. It's going to be an upbeat campaign and an optimistic one."

And will you still come to the back of the bus and goof off with the press like before? I asked.

"If I changed that," McCain said with a smile of old, "I would probably get death threats."

I'm very excited about Politico, but I sure hope that your level of commentary rises above what we see here. McCain's health is a vital issue in the upcoming race. Anyone looking at him can see he's not well. I hope you examine this issue with a degree of vigor and candor the mainstream press shies away from. To reprint McCain's quips and leave it at there is useless.

I don't want this to sound mean spirited. I am not a fan of McCain for several reasons. But the point of this comment is that John McCain was a prisoner of war. I have read his story and his books, and the fact that he survived being a POW for 5 years, in my mind does not make him a war hero. Neither does getting shot down. I know that he is a patriot. Most Americans are. When I think of a war hero, I think of my oldest brother who was killed in action in Korea, and awarded the Medal of Honor. That is a war hero, and there are thousands of others just like him. It has always troubled me that we call McCain a war hero, based largely on his own account. Patriot, sure, good man, absolutely, war hero, i just don't know.

by AnnaCatherine on 01.25.2007 at 04:12 PM

McCain might want to get out while he still has his dignity. His military record protects him from being bashed like the others. I'm not sure that's fair. He was obviously asleep at the State of the Union Address. It was overlooked or just 'off limits'. While I understand the reluctance to criticize him others are scrutinized and criticized all the time. It's part of the deal.Maybe it's time for a reality check. No malice intended. Thanks, ANNA

by desertdog on 01.25.2007 at 04:03 PM

I know McCain. Have met him several times. He's honest about Iraq. It's what he thinks that he tells you. He really does believe that it will be very tough for us if we pull out suddenly and the country collapses, and he does think that it is a chance if we send some more troops. I don't think he is enthusiastic about it. On the other hand, he knows that such a position will cost him votes next year. He doesn't care about that. If he loses because of it, those are the lumps you take. That's how McCain thinks. Yep, any way you look at it, he's a patriot. He may be wrong, but it's his view, like it or not. What if we do something else? Webb's idea of getting our troops out of the cities? At this point, McC doesn't think much of that. It's his opinion. I have found that you might not agree with him, but you do get his views when you ask. Would he have invaded if he were president, or would he have run the war the way Bush has? I doubt he would have invaded, regardless of how he voted (see Kerry and Hillary), I know he would have run it differently.

The days of American adventurism is over. Gun boat diplomacy no longer "persuades" the natives. Someone needs to emphatically tell McCain (and Bush).

Time and again McCain strikes me as someone keen to attack Iran, expanding the current mayhem exponentially. The bloodshed will result in regional and global costs. He also strikes me as somone relatively unfamiliar with the regional realities, IAEA reports and international law.

No, he'll not have my support. We've already seen the consequences of one fellow attacking a country that did not pose a threat to us (or anyone else). And we attacked and occupied them based on fraud and cooked intelligence. We don't need more (much more) of the same from this so called "maverick".

This is fighting terrorism? I think not!

Giuliani A Tough Conservative Sell (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, January 26, 2007

Rudy Giuliani's star has hardly dimmed in the five years since terrorists attacked his city on Sept. 11, 2001, and he became a national hero _ the face of U.S. resolve at a time of tragedy.

The Republican dubbed "America's Mayor" hopes to ride that celebrity and his record at City Hall to the White House by emphasizing his leadership skills and embracing the strong-on-security, limited-government tenets of the GOP.

"If he can handle the scrutiny, and if events break his way, sure, he can win," said Fred Siegel, who wrote a Giuliani biography, "The Prince of the City."

Giuliani's quest to capture his party's presidential nomination won't be easy.

He's a moderate Republican from New York City, on the wrong side of social issues in the eyes of hard-core conservatives who are a crucial voting bloc in the primaries. His mayoral tenure was marked by criticism of an overzealous police force. He's linked to the city's scandal-plagued ex-police chief Bernard Kerik. His thicket of business interests could pose conflicts. He's been divorced twice.

"I sure have strengths and weaknesses," Giuliani said recently. "I think that sort of puts me in the same category as just about everybody else that's running. Are my strengths greater or my weaknesses worse? I don't know. You have to sort of examine that. That won't be the issue."

His challenge will be to remind voters of his take-charge attitude on Sept. 11 and his two-term mayoral reign, at the same time his main rivals _ Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney _ no doubt will try to exploit his background and record. For now, both are trying to gauge how much of a threat he may be.

Giuliani, who formed a presidential exploratory committee last year, is betting that the Republican rank-and-file will look past his liabilities. His aides dismiss skeptics who say he has too many flaws to win over primary voters a year from now.

"I believe they'll look at the picture as a whole," said Tony Carbonetti, Giuliani's longtime political adviser. "This (New York) was an unmanageable city, and I think what people want today is a manager, someone to lead in difficult times and to lead in not-difficult times.

"We're going to continue to tell that story," he said.

Before Sept. 11, Giuliani was known as the hard-charging prosecutor-turned-politician who cleaned up Times Square, led the city out of fiscal despair and brought Republican rule back to the liberal mecca.

Giuliani, of course, made enemies in the process, but on Sept. 11 even his chronic critics were muted when he took charge amid the rubble of the World Trade Center's twin towers. To many, he became a picture of strength, a reminder of the resilience of the American spirit.

"He has a connection to that. He is unique. On the other hand you look at the politics and you say this is a problem," said Alex Vogel, a Republican strategist in Washington who is not affiliated with any presidential candidate.

"The question is: Can you win a Republican primary a different way? History keeps saying no. But history has never presented us with someone whose favorability numbers are as high as Rudy's."

Indeed, national polls have consistently shown him leading for the GOP nomination, and early surveys in key states show him ahead or competitive. He travels to one important state, New Hampshire, this weekend where he will give the keynote address at the state GOP's annual meeting.

For all the hype since 2001, Giuliani didn't start preparing for a presidential run in earnest until after November's elections. Thus, he has lagged behind McCain and Romney in courting fundraisers, setting up a national organization and hiring ground operatives in key states, although he has made progress on all fronts recently.

Giuliani's aides insist they're making strides toward filling out his campaign. They say he can raise the $80 million to $100 million necessary this year for a serious run. Name recognition, obviously, isn't an issue.

Neither, his supporters argue, is likability. They say he appeals to people across the political spectrum and in every region of the country, meaning he could expand the general election playing field. That, his backers say, makes him the Republican most likely to beat the presumptive Democratic front-runner, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

Perhaps.

But first he has to capture the GOP nomination _ and the big question is whether he can win over enough Republicans in states like Iowa and South Carolina, among the first nominating contests where voters are solid conservatives and could be turned off by his stance on social issues.

"Giuliani is going to have to convince people that he's more conservative than his record otherwise would suggest," said Peverill Squire, who teaches politics at the University of Iowa.

The former mayor's support for abortion rights, gay rights and gun control conflict with the hard-line positions of the GOP's right. His supporters say he's not as liberal on those issues as he's made out to be. Still, he's from New York _ and that alone rankles the party's conservative wing.

Despite that, Giuliani's backers contend _ and some Republican strategists agree _ that he could get support from fiscal conservatives because of his record of cutting taxes, curbing spending and promoting small government, particularly now when the base is smarting over the soaring federal deficit under Republicans.

And, with the country still at war, his link to Sept. 11 _ the brand of a strong leader _ could trump the base's concerns about his background and stand on social issues.

"Giuliani's national security credentials will allow him to span ideological divides in the Republican Party and win conservative votes," said Greg Strimple, a GOP strategist in New York who is neutral in the race.

Unknown is whether Giuliani can woo enough of those base Republican voters to win the nomination and, if not, whether he can make up the difference by attracting independents and Democrats.

"His opening could come if people really think that somebody like Hillary is running away with it, and if there's a perception that only Giuliani can beat her," said John Truscott, an unaffiliated Republican strategist in Michigan.

Another factor that could help Giuliani is how the primary calendar shakes out.

New Hampshire and Michigan hold early contests, and New Jersey, California, Illinois, Florida and other states viewed as more hospitable to a moderate may schedule their votes earlier in the year, perhaps lessening the importance of a strong showing for Giuliani in Iowa and South Carolina.

For all the obstacles, even folks with ties to Giuliani's opponents can't deny that the New Yorker has a shot.

Said Ken Khachigian of California, who served as a strategist for President Reagan and was with McCain in 2000: "I would never sell Giuliani short."

Hunter Makes Presidential Bid Official (AP)

By Jim Davenport

AP, January 26, 2007

Republican Rep. Duncan Hunter, best known for his advocacy on behalf of the military, launched a longshot bid for the presidency Thursday in this early voting state.

Frequently citing Ronald Reagan, Hunter told supporters he wants to pick up on the former president's legacy.

"I want to lead that policy of peace through strength," said Hunter, a strong supporter of the Iraq war.

The 14-term conservative from California, who has made no secret of his White House aspirations, set up a presidential exploratory committee earlier this month.

He initially announced his intentions in October, becoming the first GOP candidate to declare, and then began making stops in early primary and caucus states, including Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

He joins an increasingly crowded GOP field of declared and likely candidates, including Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Sam Brownback of Kansas, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

Hunter has been a familiar face on Capitol Hill and at the Pentagon. Until Democrats took control of Congress this month, he was chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, the powerful panel that oversees military policy.

However, Hunter is little known outside of Congress and his San Diego district. He is a strong opponent of illegal immigration who wants fences extended along the U.S.-Mexico border and supports the prosecution of smugglers bringing illegal immigrants across the border.

Last week, Hunter filed a bill calling for a congressional pardon of two U.S. Border Patrol agents who are both serving more than a decade in prison for shooting a Mexican drug dealer as he fled, then covering up the crime.

"Nobody wins the presidency without winning South Carolina," Hunter said.

Hunter already has some deep-pocket allies in the state, including textile magnate Roger Milliken, who supports Hunter's promise to protect U.S. manufacturers threatened by cheap, overseas labor.

"I'm thrilled that he's running," said Milliken, who hasn't yet endorsed a presidential candidate. "This point of view he represents must be heard."

Hunter, 58, was born in Riverside, Calif., and was an Army Ranger in Vietnam. He worked his way through law school with farming and construction jobs.

Hunter won his U.S. House seat in 1980 and has been an ardent military supporter. His son has spent a pair of seven-month tours in Iraq.

Hunter Touts Experience, Conservatism In Bid For Presidency (CQ)

By Rachel Kapochunas

Congressional Quarterly, January 26, 2007

Republican Rep. Duncan Hunter of California made his presidential candidacy official Thursday morning, announcing his entry into the GOP field at a breakfast meeting in the South Carolina city of Spartanburg.

The 14-term lawmaker is touting more than a quarter-century of congressional experience; his focus on national security issues that has made him the current ranking Republican (and former chairman) of the House Armed Services Committee; and a record as a staunch conservative that he says will appeal to many voters in the Republican Party's base.

Yet Hunter is making his first campaign venture outside his congressional constituency in the San Diego area, in the southwestern corner of the continental United States. And the 58-year-old representative of California's 52nd District enters the presidential race trailing far behind nationally recognized hopefuls, such as Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, in name recogintion and fundraising potential.

He is also fighting history. The last successful candidate to make the direct leap from the House to the White House was Ohio Republican James Garfield in 1880.

And though he maintains he is "the most conservative" candidate in the 2008 race, he faces strong competition on the Republican right from Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, who announced his candidacy Jan. 20.

Other potential competitors for the GOP conservative vote include former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, Colorado Rep. Tom Tancredo, former Virginia Gov. James S. Gilmore III and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

Hunter picked Spartanburg, in northwestern South Carolina, as the launching point in his campaign in part because voters in the strongly Republican region might be particularly receptive to his conservative views. Hunter also hopes that South Carolina, which has several military installations and a pro-defense slant, will also take a shine to his national security policy credentials.

Hunter already has a network of allies in the state, including Roger Milliken, head of textile and chemical manufacturer Milliken & Company, based in Spartanburg. Last year, Milliken contributed both to Hunter's House campaign committee — from which he can legally transfer funds to his presidential campaign — and the congressman's Peace Through Strength political action committee (PAC).

The two share a strong skepticism of free trade agreements that they believe cost American jobs. Milliken told the Associated Press that he supports Hunter's committment to protecting U.S. manufacturing, though adding that he has not made any official endorsement for the 2008 presidential race.

The Peace Through Strength committee ran ads featuring Hunter last month, including one in which he called for "fair trade."

DOJ_NMG_0122365

Hunter said China is "cheating" U.S. businesses by devaluing its currency — which has the effect of making its exports cheaper and U.S. imports to China more expensive — and subsidizing its businesses.

His second ad emphasized his charge that China is buying "ships, planes and missiles with our money."

Hunter's conservatism extends to social issues. He is an outspoken opponent of illegal immigration, an issue on which President Bush and some of the Republican candidates have taken more moderate stances.

2nd Republican Enters Race For Presidency (NYT)

By Sarah Abruzzese

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — Representative Duncan Hunter, Republican of California, announced his bid for the presidency on Thursday in Spartanburg, S.C., then boarded a motor home to tour the state, where he hopes to gain support from a conservative electorate.

Mr. Hunter, 58, said his candidacy would emphasize his support for the war in Iraq, his opposition to abortion and his belief in free trade.

Serving his 14th term as a congressman, Mr. Hunter, of San Diego, is a Vietnam veteran and a lawyer. He was the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee until this year and is now the ranking Republican on the panel.

In a release earlier this month, he paved the way for his candidacy, saying, "America needs a way ahead in the ongoing war against terrorists and a policy of economic opportunity, with a reaffirmation of faith in the principles of our founding."

He said yesterday that he would also emphasize the need to restore the balance of trade with China.

"This is not free trade, this is not fair trade," Mr. Hunter said according to the text of his speech. "It is cheating."

Mr. Hunter, who has a 92 percent lifetime conservative rating from the American Conservative Union, repeated his opposition to abortion this week, telling thousands of anti-abortion demonstrators here that, if elected, he would not nominate judges who supported abortion.

Mr. Hunter also opposes embryonic stem cell research and supports tighter controls on illegal immigration. Mr. Hunter is the second Republican to announce his intention to run for the presidency. Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas did last week. Senator John McCain of Arizona and Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former mayor of New York, are also expected to seek the nomination.

Duncan Hunter Announces For President At Spartanburg Breakfast (HJH)

By Jason Spencer

Spartanburg (SC) Herald Journal Hunter, January 26, 2007

Espousing hard-line views on immigration, trade, America's role in spreading democracy and the need to protect the life of an unborn child, California Congressman Duncan Hunter today officially announced his longshot bid to become this country's next president.

"God still loves our nation. We are still a people of character, and strength, and kindness," Hunter told a packed room at the Marriott at Renaissance Park (Watch video from the announcement).

"My fellow Americans, with the support of our families, with faith in God, and with confidence in the goodness of the American people, let's begin this race for the American presidency, and let's win."

The announcement is a first for Spartanburg, but not surprising considering the strong ally Hunter has in textile magnate Roger Milliken.

"Judging from the reaction I've just had, talking to a few people, they can get his message," Milliken said afterward. "The problem is, how does the word get through? His message is the right one for America. And you can see that he's dedicated."

Hunter's announcement received national media attention, with Fox News, CNN and C-SPAN among the many cameras rolling in the back of the Marriott's Azalea Ballroom.

The 250-or-so supporters in the room included the local GOP faithful, but they also came from across the state — not to mention San Diego (where Hunter lives), Yuma, Ariz., and Washington, D.C.

While some pundits have debated whether in 2008 Americans will be electing a “wartime president,” Hunter made it very clear they would be. He and his supporters almost referred to him more as this country’s “next commander in chief” rather than “next president.”

“We live in a world that’s on fire, and our next commander in chief has to be someone who in that critical moment, to help protect the lives of American people, that can make the right decision. And with his background and experience, he’s the right man for the job,” said Van Hipp, a former chairman of the S.C. Republican Party and current head of Washington, D.C.-based American Defense International.

Hunter, a Vietnam veteran, has served in Congress since 1980, and spent the last four years as the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. He co-wrote the legislation to build a 700-mile fence along the U.S.-Mexican border.

And like many other conservatives seeking the GOP nomination in 2008, he’s trying to latch onto the legacy of Ronald Reagan — Hipp even introduced him as “the next best thing” to Reagan.

A CNN poll last week cast Hunter with only 1 percent of the vote among likely Republican voters — trailing even other lesser-known conservatives like Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, former Virginia Gov. Jim Gilmore and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

Those three have visited Spartanburg, too. But only Hunter chose this city to make his official announcement.

“This represents the heart of what I call the arsenal of democracy. This is a place that’s known for textile manufacturing. You’ve got steel manufacturing right up the way … and I thought this was the heart of the base that is left in America, and I think the heart of the base that can help my campaign come to a successful conclusion,” Hunter said.

“You know what that is? That’s the great Americans who won’t move their companies off-shore, who won’t take their manufacturing to China. … There’s a certain ethic of patriotism here that is not found in many boardrooms of multinational corporations. I like that.”

Obama Calls For Universal Health Care (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, January 26, 2007

Every American should have health care coverage within six years, Democratic Sen. Barack Obama said Thursday as he set an ambitious goal soon after jumping into the 2008 presidential race.

"I am absolutely determined that by the end of the first term of the next president, we should have universal health care in this country," Obama told a conference of Families USA, a health care advocacy group.

Obama was previewing what is shaping up to be a theme of the 2008 Democratic primary. His chief rivals, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and John Edwards, also are strong proponents of universal health care and have promised to offer their plans.

Obama said while plans are offered in every campaign season with "much fanfare and promise," they collapse under the weight of Washington politics, leaving citizens to struggle with the skyrocketing costs.

He said it's wrong that 46 million in this country are uninsured when the country spends more than anyone else on health care. He said Americans pay $15 billion in taxes to help care for the uninsured.

"We can't afford another disappointing charade in 2008, 2009 and 2010," Obama said. "It's not only tiresome, it's wrong."

Obama's call was an echo of a speech he made last April when he said Democrats "need to cling to the core values that make us Democrats, the belief in universal health care, the belief in universal education, and then we should be agnostic in terms of how to achieve those values."

His argument Thursday not only will be considered through the prism of the presidential campaign, but weighed against rival Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's ill-fated plan to overhaul the health care insurance system when she was first lady.

Even after leading that calamitous attempt in 1993, Clinton remains in favor of universal health care and has made it a central theme of her presidential bid.

DOJ_NMG_0122367

"One of the goals that I will be presenting ... is health insurance for every child and universal health care for every American," she said at a community health clinic in New York Sunday, the day after entering the 2008 Democratic field. "That's a very major part of my campaign and I want to hear people's ideas about how we can achieve that goal."

On Thursday, she criticized Bush's proposal to make health care more affordable through tax breaks, arguing that it would lead to less funding for hospitals.

Addressing the U.S. Conference of Mayors, Clinton was self-deprecating in describing her own experience in the health care debate and joked that Bush would need some heavy-duty protection as he wades into the fight.

"I welcome his participation in the health care debate. I'm going to send him a suit of armor because I know anybody who puts a foot in the health care debate is gonna need that. I've got the scars and experience to show for it," said the New York senator.

Another candidate, Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich, also backs universal health care.

Obama Adopts Universal Health Care As Policy Theme (CQ)

By Marie Horrigan

Congressional Quarterly, January 26, 2007

Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who is mulling a bid for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008, Thursday called on policymakers to overcome the "failure of leadership" and create a universal health care system.

"In the 2008 campaign, affordable, universal health care for every single American must not be a question of whether, it must be a question of how," he said in a speech at a Washington, D.C., conference on health care issues staged by the nonprofit advocacy organization Families USA.

"We have the ideas, we have the resources, and we must find the will to pass a plan by the end of the next president's first term," continued Obama, who railed against what he called the "smallness of our politics — the idea that there isn't much we can agree on or do about the major challenges facing our country."

"We can't afford another disappointing charade in 2008," he said in prepared remarks. "It's not only tiresome, it's wrong."

Obama has a new platform to discuss these issues, having taken a seat on the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee. But the position he pronounced Thursday is not original to him.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, who chairs that committee, cited universal health care as a top agenda item for the 110th Congress at the panel's first hearing earlier this month. "We need to find a solution in this Congress, so that every American has guaranteed access to quality care by the end of the decade," Kennedy said.

His suggestion that such a system could be modeled on a program recently instituted in Massachusetts added a bit of a bipartisan ring to the discussion, as the plan was championed by now-retired Republican Gov. Mitt Romney — himself a prospective candidate for president in 2008.

While Obama's speech was one of his first major policy statements since he launched his presidential campaign exploratory committee last week, Families USA Executive Director Ron Pollack said his appearance should not be construed as an endorsement by the organization. Families USA, which has a stated goal of getting high-quality affordable health coverage for everyone, has not endorsed a political candidate in its 24-year history.

And Obama is not the only senator addressing the conference. Kennedy is scheduled to speak Friday morning, as is newly elected Sen. Sherrod Brown of Ohio, though neither of them is in the 2008 presidential running.

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton — who has formed her own exploratory committee and is considered a front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination — has her own deep ties to the organization. She addressed Families USA conferences in 2001 and 2005, and the organization strongly supported her efforts in to develop a universal health care system in the 1990s during the presidency of her husband, Bill Clinton.

Families USA, according to Pollack, worked closely with Clinton in her role as first lady and backed her sweeping proposals, which ultimately failed in the face of massive Republican opposition and divisions within Democratic ranks.

Clinton also has seniority over Obama on the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, having joined when she first came to Congress in 2001.

But Obama's ability to garner major media attention lent cogency to his speech Thursday. The first-term senator called for an online medical records system to cut administrative costs, something that he said everyone from Kennedy to Republican former House Speaker Newt Gingrich "believes we should do." He said such a policy would save the nation $600 million a year.

He also called for an examination of the "record-breaking profits" earned by the pharmaceutical and health care industries, and questioned whether the employer-based insurance system was a good fit in today's economy, in which few workers stay with one company throughout their careers.

"This crisis isn't just morally offensive, it's economically untenable," he said.

Obama said he had experts working on his own plan for universal health care, but referenced plans by Oregon Democratic Sen. Ron Wyden and comprehensive state-based plans emerging from places such as Maine, Illinois and California.

• On Kucinich's Turf. Obama has been a media magnet since he caught the public's imagination with his dynamic keynote address to the 2004 Democratic convention and his election to the Senate later that year. At the other end of the attention scale is a longshot Democratic presidential hopeful, Ohio Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich — who happens to have made universal health care a central cause for years.

Kucinich, who unsuccessfully sought the 2004 Democratic nomination, is co-author with Michigan Democratic Rep. John Conyers Jr. of HR 676, the Universal Health Care Insurance Act, which they introduced Wednesday.

Kucinich described the bill as the only plan to address the issues of quality, accessibility and cost. It "stands alone in an increasingly crowded field of efforts to provide health care coverage to all," Kucinich said in a statement.

Last week, Kucinich was named chairman of the new Domestic Subcommittee of the House Oversight Committee, which has jurisdiction over the Department of Health and Human Services and through which the congressman has vowed to address health care issues.

• Rebutting the Madrassa Rumor. Yet if Kucinich is regularly overshadowed in the presidential derby by Obama's star power, he at least has not yet been subjected to personal attacks of the sort Obama already is seeing.

Earlier this week, Obama became the center of a media frenzy as he rebuffed a published report that he had attended a madrassa, or radical Islamist school, while living in Indonesia as a child with his American mother and Indonesian stepfather.

The conservative-oriented Insight Magazine, associated with the Washington Times newspaper, ran a story last week that cited unnamed sources who said Obama spent at least four years at a madrassa. The magazine attributed the allegation — which were subsequently cited on Fox News Channel — to sources within Clinton's presidential campaign exploratory committee, in what one Clinton staffer told CNN was "an obvious right-wing hit job."

CNN, though, sent a reporting team to Indonesia, the nation with the world's largest Muslim population, and debunked the madrassa charge. The network cited numerous sources who said the school Obama attended as a child, though Muslim-run, had a diverse student body and did not engaged in radical politics.

Obama's team fired back Wednesday. "These malicious, irresponsible charges are precisely the kind of politics the American people have grown tired of, and that Senator Obama is trying to change," spokesman Robert Gibbs wrote in a memo distributed

Universal Health Care Pushed By Democrats (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning

Chicago Tribune, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Leading Democratic presidential candidates are showing a passion for ambitious plans to provide health care coverage to all Americans that the party has not shown since the Clinton administration's health plan turned into a political debacle in 1994.

The Republican takeover of Congress that year was credited in part to political opposition to the Clinton health care plan. Since then, Democrats have concentrated on more modest, incremental efforts to expand health coverage, such as subsidized insurance for low-income children and prescription drug coverage for the elderly.

But this year, the three most prominent Democratic presidential candidates all have declared their intention to move the country toward universal health care coverage

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) committed on Thursday to providing health care coverage for every American within six years.

"I am absolutely determined that by the end of the first term of the next president, we should have universal health care in this country. There's no reason we shouldn't have that," Obama said in a speech to Families USA, a liberal health advocacy group.

Former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina declared in announcing his presidential campaign in December that he would back universal health care, even if it required expanding the federal budget deficit.

And Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who as first lady spearheaded the Clinton administration's ill-fated plan, also has made health care coverage for all a central theme—highlighting her commitment by appearing at a community health care center last weekend, the day after entering the Democratic presidential field.

"One of the goals that I will be presenting…is health insurance for every child and universal health care for every American," Clinton said on Sunday. "That's a very major part of my campaign."

An adviser to one of the Democratic candidates said that health care is among the top concerns of the public, particularly likely Democratic primary voters, and that campaign strategists expect health coverage will be a paramount issue in the struggle for the nomination.

"We expect that it's going to play a bigger role than it ever did," said the Democratic adviser, who declined to be otherwise identified.

Several Republican governors also have recently embraced the goal of health care coverage for all.

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, now a GOP presidential candidate, signed legislation requiring all state residents to get health insurance by July 1 or face a tax penalty, with the state subsidizing insurance for lower-income residents. California Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger kicked off his second term this month with a call to assure health care for all state residents.

In Illinois, Democratic Gov. Rod Blagojevich's All Kids program was the first in the nation to offer state-subsidized health insurance to all children. During his re-election campaign last year and since, Blagojevich has spoken of his interest in moving the state toward a broad universal health care program.

In his speech Thursday, Obama argued that the political climate has shifted since 1994, opening an opportunity for universal health care.

He noted that more employers have dropped private health care coverage since then. Employees with coverage are paying higher premiums and co-payments. And, he said, American companies face greater competitive pressure from foreign businesses that are not burdened with health care costs because their governments provide coverage.

"We are not in 1992. We are not in 1993. We are not in 1994. We don't have to be intimidated," the senator said.

Obama said he would offer a plan for universal health coverage within "several months" and said the goal would be "a top priority" for him.

He otherwise provided few details, though he called for a greater focus on preventive health care to reduce doctors' visits and argued that the country could save on administrative costs by requiring greater use of electronic insurance claims. He said the country should examine "how much of our spending is going toward the record-breaking profits earned by the drug and health care industry."

Obama hinted that he might re-examine the building block of the current health insurance system, in which most workers received group health insurance provided through their employers.

"At a time when businesses are facing increased competition and workers rarely stay with one company throughout their lives, we also have to ask if the employer-based system of health care itself is still the best for providing insurance for all Americans," Obama said.

Asked to clarify the comment afterward by reporters, he said, "I don't think we immediately replace the employer-based system."

He added that he would be looking at such options as broadening employer-based group plans into larger insurance pools and improving the portability of health insurance coverage as employees move in and out of jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0122370

Edwards and Clinton also have yet to offer detailed plans on health coverage, but spokesmen for both candidates said they would release proposals in the coming months.

Economist Henry Aaron of the Brookings Institution, a think tank with a liberal leaning, and health-care expert Stuart Butler of the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank, both said establishing universal health care coverage would be enormously difficult.

Butler, who has studied America's health-care system for 30 years, said he supports universal coverage, but that the current system would require drastic overhaul and that the "costs would be staggering." An estimated 47 million Americans have no health insurance.

Aaron, who has been working on reform of America's health-care system for more than 25 years, said the climate for universal coverage has improved, but probably not enough to get very complex legislation passed in the next several years.

To adopt a universal plan is "technically enormously difficult," Aaron said, and would have to take into account that the U.S. has a highly diverse population and a highly diverse health-care system. It would require passage of several pieces of legislation that could take years to get through Congress, he said.

"I am not sure that even a new president and a new Congress can work through those devilish details" in the next presidential term and pass a universal plan, he said. Still, he said, if the supporters of a national plan avoid the mistakes of the Clinton administration, "they've got a shot."

Obama Certain Of His Appeal To Black Voters (CHIT)

By Christi Parsons

Chicago Tribune, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Barack Obama said Thursday that he's not worried about how he will fare with fellow African Americans should he launch a bid for the presidency, as he is expected to do in February.

"If you look at my black vote in my U.S. Senate race or my approval ratings back in Illinois," Obama (D-Ill.) said, "I feel pretty confident that, once folks know who I am, we'll do just fine."

The remarks came as some detractors have been quietly asking whether Obama, a biracial Harvard-educated lawyer, will prove "black enough" to black voters in a national election. The son of a white American mother and a black Kenyan father, Obama represented a mostly black district in the Illinois state Senate and won with a healthy African American vote when he ran for the U.S. Senate in 2004.

The remarks came after a meeting with Rev. Al Sharpton, the African American activist and one-time presidential candidate from New York, in which the two talked about civil rights concerns and other issues they'd like to see debated in the 2008 campaign.

Demonstrating his flair for drawing a media crowd, Sharpton circulated a schedule of Democratic presidential hopefuls he planned to visit on Capitol Hill early in the day, with the guaranteed media draw, Obama, last on the list.

"We talked about issues and policy, about 21st Century civil rights concerns that we both share," Sharpton said after meeting with Obama. "We're trying to get the process beyond just the surface stuff."

Sharpton hasn't announced his own intentions for 2008 and, after the meeting, said he hasn't chosen a candidate among Democrats now seeking the office.

"I'm not making any endorsements today," Sharpton said.

Standing with Sharpton after their meeting, Obama gestured to a portrait of Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall on the wall of his office, saying he and Sharpton are both beneficiaries of Marshall's legacy.

"Rev. Sharpton emphasized his hope that any presidential candidate is speaking to the issues of the dispossessed, and that his number one priority is making sure that we get those on the agenda," Obama said.

"I think he's right to do that and I assured him that I not only want to hear his views, … but that publicly any of us who step into this fight for the nomination have to be held accountable and speak to these issues. "

Sharpton Sizes Up 2008 Contenders (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, January 26, 2007

Democrat Al Sharpton said Thursday he's waiting to see how the 2008 presidential field shapes up before deciding whether to declare himself a candidate.

The civil rights activist spent the day on Capitol Hill, meeting with the four Democratic senators who are pursuing the presidency _ Chris Dodd of Connecticut, Joe Biden of Delaware, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois. Each met privately with Sharpton in their office.

"I'm not making any endorsements today," Sharpton, who ran in 2004, told reporters at the end of his meeting with Obama.

Obama said the two talked about their shared agenda of fighting for the dispossessed. "I assured him that I not only want to hear his views and thoughts and policy recommendations, but publicly any of us who step into this fight for the nomination have to be held accountable and speak to these issues," he said.

Sharpton said they talked about economics, health care and education issues. "We are going to keep talking and he knows I'm talking to everybody," he said.

The normally loquacious Sharpton was unusually curt and cut off further questioning by saying he was behind schedule. But he told reporters who followed him that he would decide about his own candidacy "once I see what these guys do or don't do."

Former Rep. Harold Ford Jr., has some advice for his friend Sen. Barack Obama: Don't be afraid to take your presidential campaign anywhere in this country, no matter what the racial politics.

Ford lost a close bid last fall to become the first black senator from a Southern state since Reconstruction. Some blamed the loss in Tennessee on racial politics, but Ford said Thursday other factors, including a rival who spent his own money, contributed to his defeat.

He said Obama, son of a white mother and an African father, can't control how his race will affect his candidacy.

"As long as he works hard, is honest ... and is not afraid to take his message anywhere in the country, he'll do fine," Ford said. "He can't try to predict what other people may think or may do. All he can do is run the campaign that he's capable of running.

"Do I think the fact that he's black will be a factor in his campaign? Probably," Ford said. "It would be a factor if two white guys were running. People talk about race regardless, so race is an issue that we deal with in America. I don't think that will be a central part of his campaign at all."

Ford spoke to reporters over lunch on his first day as chairman of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council. Ford is replacing former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who stepped down to run for president.

Ford said he plans to remain neutral in the 2008 race because of his new position, but he is particularly close to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Obama.

WASHINGTON (AP) _ Hollywood moguls Steven Spielberg, Jeffrey Katzenberg and David Geffen are throwing a fundraiser for Sen. Barack Obama's presidential campaign next month.

Some 700 invitations to the $2,300-per-head event at the Beverly Hilton Hotel went out this week, Andy Spahn, political adviser to Katzenberg and Spielberg, said Thursday. Katzenberg, Spielberg and Geffen are the founders of the DreamWorks movie studio.

Katzenberg has endorsed Obama, but Spielberg, a longtime supporter of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, hasn't made up his mind. Geffen also has not publicly endorsed a candidate.

"There are many people in this community who will support multiple candidates, but this certainly is evidence off the serious credibility and strength of Obama's candidacy," said Spahn, rejecting the suggestion the fundraiser was a slight to Clinton.

The Feb. 20 event will be followed by a private dinner at Geffen's house for donors who have committed to raising $46,000.

As president, Bill Clinton had a famously affectionate relationship with Hollywood, and the goodwill _ and deep pockets _ transferred to Sen. Clinton. Celebrities such as Barbra Streisand, Jennifer Lopez and Chris Rock donated to her Senate races in 2000 and 2006.

Clinton spokesman Phil Singer said Spielberg and other major Los Angeles donors, including producer Steve Bing, media mogul Haim Saban, supermarket magnate Ron Burkle and investment banker Sim Farar, will be co-hosting a fundraiser for the New York senator in the spring.

Sharpton Goes To Washington To Talk To Party's '08 Hopefuls (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — The Rev. Al Sharpton, a man who says he knows a well-tailored suit from a fake, went to the United States Senate on Thursday to do some comparison shopping, meeting separately with four Democrats who are seeking the 2008 presidential nomination to discuss civil rights.

One purpose of the visit, two New York advisers and confidants of Mr. Sharpton said, was to send a signal to Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois and a fellow African-American, that he should not take for granted the political support of Mr. Sharpton, a power broker in New York politics and a presidential candidate in 2004.

Indeed, Mr. Sharpton sounded far from sold on Mr. Obama on Thursday night after their meeting in the senator's office, where Mr. Obama had them pose for a picture beneath a portrait of Justice Thurgood Marshall of the Supreme Court.

"I left the meeting a little curious, feeling that he was noticing our civil rights agenda, but I didn't understand what his civil rights agenda is," Mr. Sharpton said.

Mr. Obama and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, with whom Mr. Sharpton also met, are expected to compete fiercely for black votes.

"I'm not endorsing anyone at this point," Mr. Sharpton said, "but she has more of a civil rights program laid out. And I always know where I stand with her. She is always accessible and welcoming."

No candidate's schedule was too important for them to miss the meeting: Mrs. Clinton was waiting to speak at a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing on Iraq when the time for her appointment with Mr. Sharpton came and went. So one of her aides escorted Mr. Sharpton to an office near the hearing room, and Mrs. Clinton left the discussion about troop levels in Baghdad to meet him.

Mr. Sharpton and Mrs. Clinton met behind closed doors for 15 minutes, then emerged with big smiles. Mrs. Clinton seemed surprised to see a dozen reporters waiting; Mr. Sharpton had sent out two news releases, one at 2 a.m. on Thursday, with his itinerary.

"I'm delighted that Reverend Sharpton is here today to talk about issues that are important to our country," Mrs. Clinton said as they stood in a Senate hallway. "His commitment to the 21st-century civil rights agenda is one that I share."

Mr. Sharpton said, "I'm very happy my hometown senator is in the race."

Mrs. Clinton declined to take questions and zipped back to the hearing, while Mr. Sharpton hung back with reporters for a few minutes.

Asked who he favored among the Democratic candidates, he said, "We're talking." He said the conversations dealt with criminal justice issues and Hurricane Katrina, among other things.

Mr. Sharpton also met with Senators Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, and plans to meet soon with former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina and Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico, all of whom are seeking the presidency.

Mr. Sharpton also said he would decide this spring whether to run for president again in 2008.

Sharpton: Step Up Or I'll Run In '08 (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, January 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0122373

The Rev. Al Sharpton yesterday threatened to again seek the Democratic presidential nomination unless current contenders, including four senators he visited on Capitol Hill, commit to focusing attention on civil rights issues.

Mr. Sharpton, a New York-based activist and perennial candidate for various posts, said strong attention must be placed on affordable housing, access to wealth, retirement security, health care and education.

"If somebody picks up a strong agenda, I won't. But if not, maybe, and we'll see or we should see by late spring or the summer if someone does," Mr. Sharpton said.

Mr. Sharpton's comments came as he visited Democratic Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, Barack Obama of Illinois and Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, the four senators seeking the party's nomination.

Mrs. Clinton after speaking with Mr. Sharpton said she is in lock step to deal with "21st-century civil rights issues" such as those Mr. Sharpton is backing.

"These are issues important to our country and ... an agenda that I support," she said.

Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama are the front-runners in recent polls and considered the two strongest candidates by most political pundits. Many pundits think that the pair will need to court Mr. Sharpton's endorsement and his help on the campaign trail to secure votes from black voters.

Standing next to the New York minister in front of a painting of renowned Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall, Mr. Obama said the two men have benefited from the movement Mr. Marshall energized when, as a lawyer for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, he won the 1954 Brown v. Board of Education case that barred segregation in schools.

"Hopefully the work that we do will benefit generations to come; he wants the candidates to speak to the issues of the dispossessed. And I think he is right to do that," Mr. Obama said.

Mr. Sharpton entered the 2004 presidential race to put issues of police brutality and racial profiling, poverty, limited access to education and health care at the forefront and to denounce the war in Iraq. He said far too many Democrats were "acting like elephants in donkey jackets," referring to the overwhelming support by the party's members of Congress to authorize the war.

While most pundits wrote off his campaign, he placed third in the polls in South Carolina and second in the District's nonbinding primary. He also gave what was regarded as one of the best speeches at the 2004 Democratic National Convention.

But after the election, Mr. Sharpton began a new campaign working with evangelical ministers to expand their activism with Republicans against abortion and homosexual "marriage" to also address such issues as poverty, equal opportunity and rebuilding New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina.

"It was shocking, beyond shocking, that the president did not mention New Orleans or Katrina in the State of the Union address, because they are members of the Union still suffering daily with issues of poverty and despair," he said.

Mr. Sharpton said that this campaign is the reason why his first stop in Washington yesterday was at the office of Mr. Dodd, chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs.

He said Mr. Dodd "is in the best position to work on" the minister's concerns about such issues as access to capital, diversity among heads of pension funds and the practice of redlining -- where minority neighborhoods pay more for goods and services, particularly bank interest on loans.

"Those issues are ones that he as the committee chairman can affect now, and also out on the campaign trail as a presidential candidate, so that was a very important meeting," Mr. Sharpton said.

Sharp Decline In Union Membership In ’06 (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

Union membership dropped sharply last year in the United States, as the percentage of manufacturing workers in unions fell below the percentage of all American workers in unions for the first time in modern history.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported Thursday that union membership fell by 326,000 in 2006, to 15.4 million workers, bringing the percentage of employees in unions to 12 percent, down from 12.5 percent in 2005. Those figures are down from 20 percent in 1983 and from 35 percent in the 1950s.

Work force experts said the decline in union membership was caused by large-scale layoffs and buyouts in the auto industry and other manufacturing industries, together with the labor movement's difficulties in organizing nonunion workers fast enough to offset those losses.

In manufacturing, which had long been the heart of organized labor, the percentage of workers in unions sank to 11.7 percent, from 13 percent. Perhaps the brightest spot for labor was the extent of government workers in unions, 36.2 percent, although that, too, was down, from 36.5 percent in 2005.

Union leaders have long said that for organized labor to turn around, it must reverse the decline in membership in the private sector. But the percentage of private sector workers in unions continued to fall last year, slipping to 7.4 percent — the lowest percentage since the early 1900s. In 2005, the private sector percentage was 7.8 percent.

At a news conference on Wednesday, the A.F.L.-C.I.O. pointed to polling results showing that 53 percent of nonunion workers said they would vote to join a union tomorrow if they could.

"Sixty million Americans say they would join a union tomorrow if they could — that's far more than the 15.4 million now in unions," said Stewart Acuff, the A.F.L.-C.I.O.'s organizing director. "What's stopping them is employer resistance."

With the Democrats in control of Congress, labor unions hope they can reverse their decline by persuading Congress to enact the Employee Free Choice Act, which would give workers the right to unionize through an easier, less antagonistic method — signing pro-union cards.

But many business groups favor the current system in which employers can insist on using secret-ballot elections to determine whether a majority of workers want to join a union.

Business groups assert that elections are fairer, while labor unions assert that elections often involve employer intimidation of workers and the firing of union supporters.

Billions Pledged For Lebanon Government (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 26, 2007

World powers pledged $7.6 billion in loans, donations and other help Thursday for a fragile Western-backed government in Lebanon that faces ruinous debt and paralyzing sectarian street violence.

Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Saniora took a risk by leaving his fortified compound in Beirut to attend a one-day conference on developing ways to help Lebanon recover from last summer's war between Israel and Hezbollah and address its $40 billion in debt.

As the donors met in Paris, government and opposition supporters clashed at a university campus back in Beirut in new violence spilling over from Lebanon's political crisis. The army, struggling to restore order, imposed a nighttime curfew. At least three people were killed and dozens injured.

"Your support will be essential in seeing Lebanon through," Saniora told the conference. "The cost of failure is too great to contemplate."

Saniora stands between the West and Iranian-backed Hezbollah militants trying to bring down his government. Thursday's conference had an urgent tone, with some diplomats and leaders hoping to give Saniora tangible bargaining power in his power struggle with Hezbollah.

"I think this goes beyond the wildest dreams of everyone for the success of the conference," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said of the pledge total. "I think when people really started thinking about what was at stake here ... they decided that this statement had to be made," she said in an interview with The Associated Press.

Rice announced $770 million in new U.S. aid, more than three times the Bush administration's previous commitment.

The United States regards Hezbollah as a terrorist organization. U.S. law forbids funding for terror groups, restrictions that led to a cutoff of direct U.S. aid for the Palestinian government following the election victory of the Hamas militants exactly a year ago.

DOJ_NMG_0122375

The Bush administration has since found ways to segregate money for the Western-backed Palestinian President, Mahmoud Abbas, but it is not clear what the administration would do if the Saniora government falls in Lebanon.

Rice would not give a direct answer when asked if an elected Hezbollah-led government could still collect the U.S. pledge.

"We are dealing with the duly elected government of Lebanon, of Prime Minister Saniora," Rice said at a press conference. "I don't have any desire to get into hypotheticals about Lebanon's future."

Saniora is fighting for his political life against Hezbollah, a military and political organization that has organized deadly street protests.

The Hezbollah-led opposition demands a share of power in the Cabinet and effective veto on key decisions, or it wants the government ousted and new elections held. Saniora has refused to quit or cede power. The opposition's six ministers in the 24-member Cabinet quit in November.

The opposition has been camped out in front of the prime minister's office in downtown Beirut and staged several protests to press its demands since Dec. 1.

Uncertainty over Lebanon's political future did not appear to hold down pledges, estimated before the conference at about $5 billion. Much of the money is tied to promised financial reforms in Saniora's government.

The host, French President Jacques Chirac, played auctioneer, pressuring participants to give. He gently chided Japan for not giving more than $11 million.

"Be brief, be good and be generous," he said at one point, as the more than 40 nations and financial institutions took turns in announcing their aid.

Saudi Arabia said it would commit $1 billion in development funding and an additional $100 million as a direct grant to the Lebanese government. France, a former colonial power in Lebanon, put forward $650 million, much of it in loans. The European Union committed $522 million in loans or aid.

British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said the conference sent a signal of political as well as economic support for Saniora's government and his proposals to reduce public debt.

"This government does have a credible reform program," she told reporters.

Saniora's critics said donors would worsen Lebanon's debt and be pouring good money after bad.

Lebanon's $40 billion in state debt is equivalent to about 185 percent of its annual economic output, making it one of the world's most indebted nations.

Tiny Lebanon had experienced promising economic growth in the past decade, as the scars faded from a 15-year civil war. But much of the progress was undone by the summer war with Israel, which wasted towns in southern Lebanon, and by weeks of political deadlock that have closed shops and businesses.

Lebanon's economy is nearly at a standstill, with jobs, capital and trained workers leaving for better prospects overseas. This was the third in a series of Paris donor conferences since 1998. A separate session in Stockholm, Sweden, in August netted pledged of about $1 billion for postwar reconstruction.

Lebanon _ a country of 4 million people, 17 religious sects, an educated class and a free-market economy _ has historically been a Middle East battleground.

Iran and the United States had a proxy conflict in Lebanon in the 1980s when a series of kidnappings and suicide bombings in Beirut, blamed on pro-Iranian militants, killed more than 270 Americans. The United States pulled its Marines from the city.

Beirut Riots Cast Shadow Over Aid Pledges (FT)

By Ferry Biedermann And Andrew England

Financial Times, January 26, 2007

An international donor conference in Paris at which $7.6bn was committed to support Lebanon was overshadowed on Thursday by renewed political violence in the increasingly divided country.

DOJ_NMG_0122376

The clashes in Beirut were sparked by a fight between pro-government and opposition supporters at the city's Arab University, and then spread to the institution's environs in a predominantly Sunni neighbourhood. Four people were shot dead in the clashes.

The Lebanese army clamped a night curfew on the capital, seeking to quell Sunni-Shia tensions in a country still recovering from a 1975-90 civil war.

It was the second outbreak of violence in Beirut this week and came against the backdrop of political instability in Lebanon following last summer's conflict between Israel and the Islamist Hizbollah movement. Since a United Nations-backed ceasefire came into force in August, the government of prime minister Fouad Siniora has been under pressure to cede more power to Hizbollah and its Christian allies, which are seeking early elections.

The opposition has been running a protest campaign since December aimed at bringing down the Sunni-led pro-western government, which has a parliamentary majority.

Thursday's fighting pitted Sunni against Shia. There were reports that snipers fired from rooftops. Violence on Tuesday, which was triggered by a Hizbollah-enforced general strike and left three dead, was mainly between rival Christian groups.

It was not clear if the clashes, which involved groups of young men brandishing clubs, were triggered by provocation designed to coincide with the donor conference or whether they erupted spontaneously as a result of increasing sectarian tensions, which have led to fears that the country could slide back into civil war.

Both Sunni and Shia blamed each other for the violence and Sayyed Hassan Nasrallah, Hizbollah leader, later told supporters to leave the streets and co-operate with the army.

Jacques Chirac, French president, who organised and chaired the Paris conference, on Thursday openly backed Mr Siniora, stressing the legitimacy of his government, "put in place by democratic elections".

The donor conference was intended to aid the country's reconstruction after last summer's war, as well as address its crippling debt of $40.5bn (€31.2bn, £26.7bn), equivalent to 180 per cent of gross domestic product. Both Mr Siniora and the French president emphasised that the international support was for "all the Lebanese".

But given the increasing political divisions in the country, it is difficult to know how much of the money raised at the conference will be delivered or how the government will be able to implement the economic reforms much of the funding is predicated on.

Big new commitments of support came from the International Monetary Fund and the European Investment Bank (EIB) as well as the US, Europe, Saudi Arabia and other Arab countries.

A Lebanese official said $800m of the $7.6bn was expected to be in the form of grants and almost $2bn was scheduled to be disbursed during 2007.

Mr Chirac praised the economic reform programme that Mr Siniora presented to the conference, elements of which have been criticised by Hizbollah and other opposition groups.

The French president and others linked long-term international aid to implementation of the reforms.

Saudi Arabia pledged $1bn, on top of substantial earlier commitments, while the IMF and the EIB pledged more than $2bn. On Wednesday the European Union committed an extra €400m ($520m, £265m) and France announced €500m in soft loans. Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, confirmed a US pledge announced a day earlier of $770m in new aid.

Other Arab countries, including Kuwait, Qatar and other Gulf states, pitched in with hundreds of millions of dollars each.

Aid Conference Raises $7.6 Billion For Lebanon (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

PARIS, Jan. 25 — Led by Saudi Arabia and the United States, international donors from more than 30 countries on Thursday pledged $7.6 billion in aid for Lebanon, in a bold effort to try to prop up the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora.

But even as Mr. Siniora was shaking hands and thanking world leaders in Paris for exceeding the conference's goal of $5 billion, there was chaos back in Lebanon. Four people were shot dead and 150 wounded in clashes between groups supporting the government and protesters aligned with the Hezbollah-led opposition. Both sides appealed for calm.

The clashes in Lebanon this week, which came just as Mr. Siniora sought to present his country as ripe for investment, were another embarrassment to the prime minister, who has been fighting to keep his government afloat. The political faction led by Hezbollah and backed by Iran and Syria has been calling for his resignation for more than two months.

Lebanon is a battlefield in a larger proxy war. The United States, its Sunni Arab allies and Europe, all represented at the conference, are on one side. Iran and Syria are on the other, backing Hezbollah as it seeks to increase its power. They have been giving an estimated $40 million a month to Hezbollah and other groups in Lebanon, analysts say. The money available to rebuild towns and communities damaged in Hezbollah's war with Israel last summer is seen as pivotal to winning the support of the Lebanese people.

Saudi Arabia, which is seeking to counter the rising influence of Iran in the Muslim world, led the pledges for the government on Thursday with a promise of $1.1 billion in loans and grants. The United States pledged $770 million in loans and grants, bringing to $1 billion the amount it has pledged to the government of Mr. Siniora since September.

The donors in Paris took pains to deflect criticism that their aid pledges were solely meant to prop up Mr. Siniora. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, when asked whether the United States pledge was contingent on Mr. Siniora remaining in power, deflected the question.

Mr. Siniora, seated beside Ms. Rice during an early morning news briefing, quickly interjected, "No conditions, no conditions." Ms. Rice replied that the money was for the Lebanese people.

"Clearly this is a package that is for Lebanon, and that is extremely important to understand," she said. "Lebanon is a democracy. That said, Lebanon is also undertaking some important economic reforms that are critical to making any of this work, and it's not at all unusual that donors expect that those reforms are going to continue, in fact, as the donor community responds to the needs."

When pressed later on whether the American funds would be cut off if Hezbollah gained control of the Lebanese government, she said she did not want to discuss "hypotheticals."

"As you know, Hezbollah is considered a terrorist organization by the U.S.," she said.

The European Union offered $522 million in loans and other aid, while France separately promised $650 million in loans.

The conference, in the Kleber Conference Center near the Arc de Triomphe, had a somewhat surreal air. One after another, foreign dignitaries at a conference table announced, in French, Arabic and English, how much money they were willing to put forward.

"Be brief, be good and be generous," President Jacques Chirac of France, the host, exhorted the group before the event.

The World Bank offered $1 billion in loans, grants and other aid. The European Investment Bank offered $1.2 billion, and the Islamic Development Bank followed with $250 million.

Lebanon is hobbled from the economic and political impact of the Israel-Hezbollah war, and reconstruction efforts have been burdened by the country's $41 billion public debt.

On Tuesday, groups opposing Mr. Siniora's government essentially shut down the country, staging protests in Beirut, blocking roads with burning tires and setting off clashes that killed three people and left more than 130 wounded. Thursday's clashes added to the burdens of Mr. Siniora, whose survival thus far, Lebanon analysts say, is attributed not only to his support from about half of the country, but also to his strong international support.

Even with the $7.6 billion in donations and pledges, Mr. Siniora will still return to Lebanon with a battle on his hands as he tries to establish an international tribunal that could eventually implicate Syria in the assassination of Rafik Hariri, a former Lebanese prime minister who was an outspoken critic of Syria.

Syria occupied Lebanon for 30 years but was forced to withdraw its troops after Mr. Hariri's death. The United States has accused Syria and Iran of trying to bring down the Siniora government to wreck plans for the creation of an international tribunal to try suspects in the case.

$7.6 Billion In Assistance Pledged To Lebanon (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

PARIS, Jan. 25 -- The embattled Lebanese government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora won more than $7.6 billion in pledges of financial assistance Thursday from international donors eager to help rebuild the war-ravaged country, stabilize its economy and improve the security situation.

The package -- including pledges of grants and loans totaling $1.1 billion from Saudi Arabia and $770 million from the United States -- is a major boon for Siniora, whose government has been buffeted since early December by a Hezbollah campaign to topple it.

The power struggle intensified Tuesday when Hezbollah and its allies enforced a nationwide strike that paralyzed the country and sparked sectarian clashes, leaving three people dead and more than 100 injured. Four people were killed in renewed clashes Thursday at Beirut Arab University and other locales, officials said.

Against that backdrop, leaders from 36 countries and 14 international agencies gathered here to express their support for Siniora's democratically elected government and its attempts to implement economic reforms, ease a $41 billion debt burden and rebuild vast areas of Lebanon that were demolished last summer during Israel's 33-day war with Hezbollah. Lebanese officials estimate war damage at $3.6 billion.

"I'm going back really pleased with the level of financial support shown today," Siniora said. "This is for all Lebanon and all the Lebanese."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "The conference today was a very important expression of the international community's intention to stand by Lebanon and the Lebanese people in these difficult times."

Rice would not say whether U.S. money would be delivered if Hezbollah -- an Iranian- and Syrian-backed Shiite Muslim group that the United States has labeled a terrorist organization -- succeeded in overthrowing Siniora's government and came to power, calling it "speculation."

C. David Welch, assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, told reporters in Paris on Wednesday, "We are not going to support people who launch wars and try to bring down governments with the benefit of outside assistance. . . . That's just not going to happen."

French President Jacques Chirac, who hosted the conference and pledged $650 million in low-interest loans to Lebanon, said international support depended on a Lebanese "national consensus on economic and social reforms imperative for the future of the country, and on the implementation of those reforms as soon as possible."

At least $464 million of the funds pledged by the United States would be directed to military aid or security measures, according to a State Department official, quoted by news services, who briefed reporters traveling with Rice.

That included $220 million in military aid to the Lebanese government for the purchase of small arms, ammunition, spare parts and other hardware; $184 million for U.N. peacekeeping forces in southern Lebanon; and $40 million for internal Lebanese security services.

About $250 million in a cash reserve would be released to the Lebanese government as it met targets for reforms that Siniora has pledged to implement to help restore fiscal stability and stimulate the economy. Lebanon's $41 billion debt is equivalent to about 180 percent of its gross domestic product, and about half of the country's annual budget is spent servicing it.

Among the measures the government has promised are to raise the value-added tax from 10 to 12 percent, reduce state subsidies for fuel and privatize the electricity and telecommunications industries.

The U.S. funds, which are subject to approval by Congress, are in addition to $230 million that Washington pledged at an August conference in Stockholm and represent a significant increase in U.S. financial assistance to Lebanon, which in years past was as low as $2 million a year.

Beirut University Dispute Escalates Into Rioting, Killing 4 (NYT)

By Nada Bakri And Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0122379

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Jan. 25 — Violence erupted in Beirut on Thursday for the second time in three days, as an altercation in a university cafeteria escalated into rioting and gunfire.

The army declared a rare night curfew throughout the city amid fears that Lebanon's two-month political crisis had entered a violent phase.

At least four people were shot dead — two supporters of the government and two of the opposition — and 150 were wounded in street fighting that began with a scuffle in the student cafeteria at Beirut Arab University in Tariq Jadidah, a Sunni neighborhood. It spilled into the street, and men arrived and started shooting as each side apparently summoned reinforcements.

Vanloads of antigovernment protesters arrived. They smashed cars parked in the university lot and on adjacent streets, setting them on fire and burning tires.

Arriving Lebanese soldiers fired into the air and used tear gas and stun grenades to try to disperse the crowds, but with little success. In some instances, soldiers stood on sidewalks or took cover in their armored personnel carriers, watching the violence.

Members of the March 14 movement, supporting the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, accused the soldiers of giving the Shiite protesters, most of them backers of Hezbollah, free rein to go on a rampage.

"They allowed them into the neighborhood, they are scared of them," a pro-government protester said.

Others accused Saad Hariri, the leader of the Future Movement a Sunni party that supports the government, of abandoning the residents of the area by not arming them.

The deep-seated anger was palpable as the fighting continued through the afternoon, uncovering a widening sectarian divide in many Lebanese neighborhoods.

"Animals, they are animals," said Abdallah Tassi, in tears, as his car burst into flames. He directed his anger at Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, the Hezbollah leader. "Nasrallah is a liar," he said. "He pretends to be the enemy of Israel, but really he is the enemy of the Sunnis."

The air filled with thick smoke as tires burned and young men hurled stones and shouted epithets.

"The blood of the Shiites is boiling, boiling!" shouted one opposition member, as he watched the fighting.

Television stations run by each side of the political divide blamed the other side for the violence, while leaders on each side urged calm.

Hezbollah supporters were seen firing M-16 rifles, while members of the Future Movement were observed firing pistols. Hezbollah men carrying the group's trademark walkie-talkies mingled among the rioters and managed the crowds.

Some witnesses reported seeing shots fired from roofs. Government supporters said opposition snipers had fired at them from buildings.

Sheik Nasrallah, in a prerecorded message released Thursday night, contended that his group had uncovered information that snipers were brought into the country in recent days by "pro-government militias." Hezbollah's marksmen have long been a point of pride for the group, which used them to great advantage against advancing Israeli soldiers in the summer war with Israel.

Government loyalists also hurled incendiary devices at an office of a pro-Syrian party nearby, setting the building on fire, witnesses said.

But by nightfall, all Lebanese leaders appealed for calm.

Sheik Nasrallah issued a fatwa, or edict, telling his followers to leave the streets and restore calm. The Future Movement urged its supporters to show self-restraint and calm.

Mr. Siniora, at an aid conference in Paris, called on all the parties "to return to the voice of reason."

Nabih Berri, leader of the Shiite Amal party and speaker of Lebanon's Parliament, said, "What everyone should do now is halt the strife." He added, "We must all remain united or we will find our country in the graveyard of history."

Tensions remained high Thursday night, even as the fighting ebbed.

Sheik Nasrallah "wants us to wait until they kill us; he does not want to give us weapons!" an opposition member shouted. "Where is he, why isn't he giving us weapons?"

Rival Groups Clash In Beirut Streets (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

BEIRUT, Jan. 25 -- The Lebanese army imposed a curfew on the capital Thursday after hundreds of government supporters and foes wielded rocks, molotov cocktails and sometimes guns in street battles that dragged on past nightfall. Four people were killed and 150 wounded, officials said, many of them soldiers who at times stood helplessly between the two sides.

The clashes, which began in a university cafeteria and spread to the surrounding neighborhood of Tariq Jedideh, offered a bitter contrast to the optimism of an international conference in Paris, where more than $7.6 billion was pledged to help Lebanon's economy recover from last summer's war between Israel and the Shiite Muslim movement Hezbollah.

As the grants and loans were announced in Paris, bursts of gunfire echoed along the airport road here and columns of black smoke rose from burning cars. The clashes were some of the worst since Lebanon's 15-year civil war ended in 1990 and followed violence Tuesday that left three people dead.

Hundreds of Hezbollah followers, in red and blue helmets, poured into Tariq Jedideh, a Sunni neighborhood, many of them carrying sticks and chains. At one point, their opponents burned a Hezbollah banner, an act that spoke to the jarring rise in tension between Sunni Muslims, largely aligned with the government, and Hezbollah supporters since the crisis began two months ago.

The army and security officers deployed in force after the clashes erupted, but often fired into the air or simply gave way. For hours, crowds surged at each other, then retreated, usually separated by soldiers crouched behind armored personnel carriers. More clashes ensued elsewhere, as Sunni crowds firebombed the headquarters of a party allied with Hezbollah and Shiite youths rampaged along a downtown street lined with bank headquarters.

The images reverberated across Beirut, uneasy since Dec. 1, when Hezbollah and its allies began their campaign to topple the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora with a mass protest in the downtown area. The overburdened cellphone network was paralyzed. In the streets, there were grim reminders of the civil war: Swaggering young men asked residents whether they were Sunni or Shiite; cars were attacked because of their owner's sect; and both sides questioned whether the army could protect them.

"It's going to get worse. Look at all this," said Salah al-Sheikh, a 40-year-old Sunni resident, waving his hand toward a block of incinerated or smashed vehicles, the street littered with rocks, sticks and shattered glass. "A few days ago, they were in the same schools and the same universities. Look what's happening now. Why? That's all I want to ask. Why?"

Behind him, another Sunni resident shouted, "Give us weapons! Give us weapons!"

Across the street, Shiite crowds set fire to cars and released the emergency brakes of buses, letting them slam into concrete walls. Traffic signals were broken; street signs and an iron gate were torn down.

"Let them blow off steam," said an older, bearded man, dressed in the traditional black of Hezbollah's security force.

The fighting was an episode, writ small, of an increasingly precarious Middle East, riven by growing sectarian tension, simmering civil conflict here and in the Palestinian territories, and a deepening war in Iraq that followed the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. Leaders across the political divide called on their supporters to exercise restraint. Lebanese officials said the army insisted that all sides agree to a curfew before it declared its start at 8:30 p.m.

"I call on everyone to return to the voice of reason," Siniora said from Paris, where he attended the aid conference.

Hasan Nasrallah, Hezbollah's leader, issued a religious edict to his followers to withdraw. "This is an order on everyone," he said.

Nabih Berri, the speaker of parliament, whose Amal movement is allied with Hezbollah, warned that events were spiraling out of control: "We must all be united or we have to look for our country in the graveyard of history."

Almost from the beginning of the current crisis, many in Lebanon have predicted that only bloodshed would force a break in the deadlock between the government, supported by the United States and France, and an opposition led by Hezbollah, supported by Iran and Syria. Since then, the struggle -- effectively splitting the country into two camps divided by sect, ideology, perspective and loyalty to leaders -- has escalated. On Tuesday, Hezbollah, Amal and their Christian allies, who are led by Michel

Aoun, enforced a nationwide strike by blocking thousands of roads with tires, uprooted trees and barricades of dirt and dumpsters.

As Thursday's battles raged, the country's politicians frantically called one another. Lebanese officials said Berri and Walid Jumblatt, a Druze leader allied with the government, spoke for the first time since the crisis began. All agreed to try to quiet the streets, although no initiative emerged. After the curfew took effect, the army said the streets were largely calm.

The battles began around noon with an argument between Shiite and Sunni students in the cafeteria of the Beirut Arab University. Each side accused the other of provocation, but within 15 minutes, university security officers separated the two groups. Sunni students said one of their own was then attacked on campus. Shiite students said the army tried to evacuate female students. As they left, Sunni students hit them and ripped off their veils, Shiite students said.

The fighting spilled into the tense Sunni neighborhood of Tariq Jedideh. Shiite students said that residents threw rocks and that at least three people fired on them from balconies. Mohammed Abdel Satir, a 21-year-old engineering student, said he and others then called Hezbollah officials, who dispatched men in trucks and vans.

"We don't trust the Lebanese army, and we saw this today with our own eyes," he said as he stood near knots of female students, some of them crying. "It's Hezbollah's duty to protect us. The government is not protecting us anymore."

The arrival of hundreds of Shiite residents inflamed tensions. Battles spread through the surrounding streets, with the airport road serving as a front line. Troops fired tear gas; at other times, they stood idly next to rock-throwing protesters.

Sunni residents urged the army to push back the Shiite crowds.

"Attack them!" one man yelled at the soldiers, his face contorted in anger.

Along the street, gunfire crackled into the night. Some Sunni residents tossed molotov cocktails into a parking lot, where young Shiite men had wrecked dozens of cars. Others threw rocks, some of them hitting soldiers.

"They came to our turf," said Mohammed Kraim, 23. "We want to face them with guns," he added. "This isn't fair."

Security Council Sees Hope For Mideast (AP)

By Sarah Dilorenzo

AP, January 26, 2007

Security Council members are optimistic that a key meeting next month on the Israel-Palestinian conflict will help revive the stalled peace process, Russia's U.N. ambassador said Thursday.

The so-called quartet of Middle East peace brokers _ the U.S., the European Union, Russia and the U.N. _ will meet in Washington on Feb. 2 to explore ways of reinvigorating peacemaking.

Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said there was hope that the meeting would lead to a wider international conference to end the conflict.

"There was a strong feeling that there were some signs of hope, which should be fully taken advantage of by the international community," Churkin told reporters after a Security Council meeting on the situation in the Middle East.

"Maybe not in such a long run, this process could culminate in an international conference, which needs to be well prepared, but which would bring about a long-awaited settlement of the situation in the Middle East," he said.

A "road map" for peace launched by the quartet in 2003 never got off the ground because each side failed to meet its initial obligations. The plan outlined stages for creating a Palestinian state alongside Israel.

However, there has been flurry of diplomatic activity in recent weeks to revive the peace process, including a meeting Thursday between Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and Palestinian Mahmoud Abbas in Davos, Switzerland.

Churkin said key to next month's meeting will be helping the Palestinians form a unity government.

Abbas, of the more moderate Fatah party, has been locked in a power struggle with the Islamic militant Hamas, which won control of the Palestinian parliament in elections last year. Dozens of people have been killed in fighting between the rival factions.

Abbas has been pushing for a unity government partly as a bid to end Western sanctions imposed on the Hamas-led government for its refusal to renounce violence and recognize Israel's right to exist.

Ibrahim Gambari, undersecretary-general for political affairs, told the Security Council that despite the sanctions, aid to the territories rose nearly 10 percent in 2006 over the previous year.

Gambari said more than half of the aid had come from Arab countries. Some Western countries have continued to fund humanitarian programs for the Palestinians, but the aid bypasses the government in keeping with the embargo.

Despite the increase in aid, Gambari said the territories' GDP per capita fell by at least 8 percent in 2006 and poverty rose by 30 percent.

Without a revived peace process, Gambari said, "the most that aid can do is contain for a limited time the spread of grievances and the spread of instability."

Time Has Come For Mideast Peace : Abbas (AFP)

AFP, January 26, 2007

Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas and Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni shared hopes for a revived Middle East peace process, with Abbas calling for talks to begin straight away.

"The time has come for us .. to make peace a reality," Abbas told an audience at the annual meeting of business and political leaders in Davos.

"We are ready, as of now, to start serious negotiations with our Israeli neighbours," he said during a discussion in which he and Livni shared a stage with Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres.

"The map (to peace) is there, we have all agreed to it. I am convinced we can reach a quick solution," Abbas added.

The United States is due to host a meeting on February 2 of the diplomatic Quartet, whose 2003 "roadmap" for achieving Palestinian statehood and peace with Israel has languished since its inception.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said during a week-long trip to the Middle East and Europe earlier this month that she planned to "accelerate" implementation of the roadmap put forward by the United States, European Union, United Nations and Russia.

Abbas is expected to meet Rice and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert next month.

Speaking after the Palestinian president, Livni was more circumspect about the timetable for a possible resumption of the road map, even as she stressed the need for both sides to stick to the vision of two states living side by side.

"The Palestinian state is not an illusion, its feasible, it's there, it's achievable," Livni said. "The establishment of a Palestinian state and homeland for the Palestinians is the answer, the national answer to the Palestinians wherever they are."

At the same time, Livni stressed that Israel would never "allow" a Palestinian state that was "ruled by a terrorist organisation."

Abbas and his secular Fatah party are locked in a power struggle with the radical Islamic movement Hamas, which controls the Palestinian government and has refused to recognize Israel.

At WEF, A Pledge For Mideast Peace (AP)

By Paul Haven

AP, January 26, 2007

Israel's foreign minister reached out to the Palestinian president in an emotional speech Thursday as she sat next to him at the World Economic Forum, saying lasting peace is the dream of her government and her people, and promising that a future Palestinian state is "not an illusion. It's there, it's achievable."

Tzipi Livni made clear, however, that her government would not compromise on its need for security and urged Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas not to compromise with extremists, a reference to the militant Hamas government's refusal to disavow its call for the destruction of Israel.

But Livni also made a personal and impassioned plea for dialogue to begin, turning to face Abbas.

"I would like to negotiate, to speak, to meet, to talk," she said. On finding peace, she said: "There is nothing I want more ... this is part of our dream, this is part of our goal."

DOJ_NMG_0122383

Abbas, for his part, said he was confident the peace process could be put back on track. "We are ready as of now to start serious negotiations," he said during the public session. Afterward, the two warmly shook hands. They are to meet one-on-one at a hotel on Friday.

"We are creating this momentum ...to put the train on the track and push it after that," Abbas told The Associated Press.

Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert are scheduled to hold three-way talks next month with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, although a date and place have not been set.

The renewed efforts to jumpstart peace talks have come amid widespread worry in recent weeks that unless progress is made, the Mideast in general will continue to deteriorate.

The pledges by Livni and Abbas followed pleas from Israeli and Palestinian youth, speaking via satellite from Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and the West Bank city of Ramallah, that their leaders end the long conflict.

Many in the crowd of some of the world's most powerful business and political leaders seemed deeply moved by their words.

The tone was a sharp departure from the somber mood that took hold of Davos a year ago, when Israeli and Palestinian delegates were stunned by news of the Hamas electoral victory in Palestinian elections. At the time, many predicted 12 months of pain lay ahead for the region, and they were right.

The year brought violent Palestinian infighting and crippling Western sanctions targeted at Hamas that have hit ordinary Palestinians hard. Progress in talks between Israel and the Palestinians ground to a halt in the months after Hamas's victory.

Livni made clear that Hamas was still an obstacle.

"Compromising with extremists will not promote anything, but it can lead to further stagnation," she said, addressing Abbas.

Abbas said he was hopeful that talks with Hamas could result in a unity Palestinian government, despite violence between Hamas militants and his Fatah supporters. He reiterated that he would call early elections if the talks failed but gave no specifics.

"We will fight for this (unity) government. Otherwise, if we totally fail, we will go to early elections," he told the AP.

Abbas met earlier in the day with German Chancellor Angela Merkel, who told reporters that she wished Abbas success in his efforts to form a unity government, but added that "Europe should not overestimate its role" in restarting any broader talks on peace.

Abbas and Olmert met last month to discuss confidence-building measures that would allow the sides to return to the negotiating table, abandoned more than six years ago.

While the Israeli-Palestinian issue provided the day's most dramatic moment, the forum was also an occasion for interesting, quirky and sometimes high-level meetings. In one small corridor early Thursday, UNICEF executive director Ann Veneman _ a former secretary of agriculture in the Bush administration _ had a brief, warm reunion with former Iranian President Mohammad Khatami. Veneman said the two had met previously at a forum on promoting interfaith understanding.

At another forum, a Saudi princess, a Jewish Orthodox rabbi and Khatami talked about Muslim-Christian misunderstandings and the Israeli-Palestinian crisis.

Rice's Strategic Reset (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

What's America's strategy in the Middle East? Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice this week sketched a new framework based on what she calls the "realignment" of states that want to contain Iran and its radical Muslim proxies.

In an interview Tuesday, Rice summarized the new strategy that has been coming together over the past several months. Although many of its elements have been previewed in recent weeks by commentators such as Columbia University scholar Gary Sick, Rice's comments were an unusually detailed public explanation of the new American effort to create a de facto alliance between Israel and moderate Arab states against Iranian extremism.

Rice said the new approach reflects growing Arab concern about Iran's attempt to project power through its proxies: "After the war in Lebanon, the Middle East really did begin to clarify into an extremist element allied with Iran, including Syria, Hezbollah and Hamas. On the other side were the targets of this extremism -- the Lebanese, the Iraqis, the Palestinians -- and those who want to resist, such as the Saudis, Egypt and Jordan."

America's recent show of force against Iran -- seizing Iranian operatives in Iraq and sending additional warships to the Persian Gulf -- was part of this broader effort to reassure the Saudis and others that, despite its troubles in Iraq, America remains a reliable ally against a rising Iran. "The U.S. has to demonstrate that it is present in the Gulf, and going to be present in the Gulf," Rice told me.

Realignment is linked with a new U.S. effort to forge peace between Israel and the Palestinians. Rice is encouraging both sides to explore "final-status issues" -- such as borders, the status of Jerusalem and the right of Palestinian refugees to return to a homeland -- rather than remain deadlocked over the so-called road map.

The effort to contain Iranian-backed pressure took on new urgency this week, as Hezbollah's campaign against the government of Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora spawned a spasm of violence that left at least four dead. America, France and Saudi Arabia quickly organized a $7.6 billion financial rescue package for Siniora, but that hasn't stemmed the rising sectarian tension in Lebanon between Sunnis who back Siniora and Shiite supporters of Hezbollah.

Critics may see Rice's realignment strategy as another high-risk roll of the dice by the Bush administration in a region that is already polarized by the Iraq war and sectarian conflict. These critics may also question the central role of Saudi Arabia, a conservative Islamic monarchy that many Arabs regard as a bastion of the status quo.

"The reception will be very skeptical" among some Arabs, cautioned one prominent official who is normally among the most pro-American in the region. "Increasing the fault line between Sunnis and Shiites is a mistake," he argued. State Department officials would counter that it was Iran that moved the fault line by encouraging Hezbollah's provocative behavior in Lebanon.

The Bush administration's thinking about realignment helps explain why it has resisted engaging Syria and Iran, as recommended by the Baker-Hamilton report. As Rice put it, "You have a 'pan' movement, across the region. The war in Lebanon crystallized it for everyone. You can't just leave it there. . . . If you concentrate on engaging Syria and Iran, you may lose the chance to do the realignment."

On Syria, Rice said the administration is seeking a change of policy rather than regime change. Asked about an offer made in an interview with me last month by Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem to help the U.S. provide greater security in Iraq, she said: "If the Syrians want to stabilize Iraq, why don't they do it?" As for Israeli interest in exploring the Syrian initiative, she noted recent private peace feelers between Syrians and Israelis and suggested that if the Israelis decide there is something important, they will pursue it.

The administration's tougher stance against Iran arguably has already produced some results. Iran's firebrand president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, appears to be in political trouble with the ruling mullahs, in part because his reckless talk alienated other Muslims. But the strongest leverage against Iran appears to be the West's unified diplomatic coalition. "The Security Council resolution [condemning Iran's nuclear program and mandating mild sanctions] has had more of an effect than I thought it would," Rice said.

The realignment strategy poses as many questions as it answers -- not least the anomaly of supporting Sunni resistance to Iran at the same time the U.S. augments its military support for a Shiite-led government in Iraq. But as with any strategy, Rice's realignment idea has the virtue of offering a basis for discussion and careful thinking about a region perched on the edge of a volcano.

U.N. Agency Defers N. Korea Programs (AP)

By Alexandra Olson

AP, January 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0122385

The U.N. Development Program agreed Thursday not to approve new projects in North Korea until an external audit addresses U.S. allegations that the agency has funneled millions of dollars to the communist regime in violation of United Nations rules.

U.S. deputy ambassador Mark Wallace alleged Friday that the UNDP's North Korea operation had been run "in blatant violation of U.N. rules" for years. He demanded an outside audit focusing on concerns that development funds had been used by Pyongyang for "its own illicit purposes."

The audit, announced Monday by U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, is expected to last three months.

UNDP assistant administrator Ad Melkert said the agency also agreed to end cash payments to the North Korean government and local suppliers and to stop hiring staff recruited by Pyongyang. The United States had complained about both practices, which Melkert said would stop by March 1.

The UNDP said it will be responsible for implementing all North Korean projects, addressing U.S. complaints that authorities in the North had been responsible for carrying out certain initiatives.

The U.S. welcomed the new steps.

"We're pleased with the approach that the UNDP administrator has laid out," acting U.S. Permanent Representative Alejandro Wolff told reporters.

North Korea said it would accept the steps, though it condemned them as an attempt to "politicize the system" of the UNDP _ a stance echoed by the representatives of Russia and Cuba.

Japan, however, applauded the agreement and went a step further. It said the U.N. should stop providing aid to North Korea except for humanitarian assistance "directly delivered to the people" because Pyongyang had defied Security Council demands that it end its nuclear program.

Wolff said the Japanese argument was "compelling" and that the U.S. would consider it.

U.S. officials said the United States already withholds its contributions to the UNDP and other U.N. agencies that provide funds to North Korea.

Ban's spokeswoman, Michele Montas, said Monday the audit will initially focus on UNDP spending in North Korea and then be expanded to other U.N. agencies.

The agency said it welcomed the external audit, stressing it was committed to operating in a transparent manner.

U.S. officials said they first received indications there might be irregularities in UNDP's North Korea program last year. They raised concerns the cash might be misused, possibly for Pyongyang's nuclear program.

The U.N. Security Council imposed sanctions on North Korea on Oct. 14 for conducting a nuclear test.

North Korean delegate Jang Chunsik called the U.S. allegations "nonsense," insisting the UNDP's activities in his country had been "conducted in a transparent way."

Wallace has made several allegations in letters to senior UNDP officials, which were first reported by The Wall Street Journal. He has said that UNDP's local staff is dominated by North Korean government employees who managed the agency's programs and finances in violation of UNDP rules.

The U.S. cited three other violations of U.N. rules _ the government's insistence that UNDP pay cash to North Korean government suppliers, and UNDP's failure to oversee projects it funds in the country or to audit its programs.

On Monday, the agency sought to refute the allegations, insisting the North Korean program followed UNDP financial rules. UNDP Administrator Kemal Dervis said there is "no justification for the extreme allegations" made by Wallace, adding that UNDP was "doing its best in very difficult circumstances."

UNDP spokesman David Morrison said the agency has spent about $3 million annually in the last 10 years on programs in impoverished North Korea, in addition to about $600,000 in office costs, which include local salaries and supplies. The programs focus on food production, rural and environmental sector management, economic management and social sector management.

Morrison said UNDP international staff have visited nearly all their project sites in the past two years to ensure funds are being used appropriately.

The UNDP has conducted three internal audits of its North Korean program in the last eight years, the last in 2004. Another internal audit was scheduled for this year, Morrison said.

N Korea Bows To Audit Of UN Agency (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, January 26, 2007

North Korea agreed on Thursday to an external audit and tighter rules for the UN Development Programme's operation in the country, after US allegations that the agency was funnelling hard currency to Pyongyang.

The UNDP's executive board adopted the measures after Washington's concerns were leaked last week to the press and Ban Ki-moon, secretary-general, called for a sweeping investigation into UN agencies.

Approval of a future UNDP programme will be contingent on the audit's findings.

The board agreed to end direct payments in hard currency, to stop the hiring of North Korean government officials, and to cease support to government ministries. Officials said the UN would still need to buy local currency through the central bank.

One diplomat said the decision could herald for the UN a new approach to doing business with autocracies under international scrutiny. It would also inject transparency into UN agencies, which operated under different rules from the secretariat and had refused to make internal audits available, the diplomat said.

Pyongyang, which sits on the 36-member board, went along with the decision and did not force the issue to a vote, even though it dismissed the allegations as politically motivated.

Russia, Cuba, Guatemala and Bangladesh expressed discomfort at the singling out of North Korea and warned that the decision should not set a precedent. Cuba described the decision as an effort to "introduce manipulation" to UN development activities.

But Japan argued that the UN should not give aid other than humanitarian assistance to a country that has rejected two UN Security Council resolutions – an argument the US found "compelling".

In a letter sent on January 16, Washington alleged that "at least since 1998 the UNDP [North Korea] programme has been systematically perverted for the benefit of the Kim Jong Il regime – rather than the people of North Korea".

Some commentators said the situation bore echoes of the UN's Iraq oil-for-food scandal.

But one UNDP official asked why it had been singled out when other UN agencies and governments operated in a similar way in North Korea.

U.N. Program Facing New Curbs In N. Korea (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 25 -- The U.N. Development Program's executive board decided Thursday to stop paying for its local staff and supplies in foreign currency, and to call for the U.N. General Assembly's board of auditors to determine within three months whether the development agency violated its own guidelines by doing so.

The board also decided to delay approval of the program's 2007-2009 budget until the audit is finished.

The action comes just weeks after the United States charged that the U.N. program had been "systematically perverted" by channeling millions of euros in hard currency to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il's repressive government. Alejandro D. Wolff, the acting U.S. ambassador, expressed concern Thursday that the money could be used to finance North Korea's illicit activities, including a nuclear weapons program.

The debate over the United Nations' oversight of its North Korea operations coincides with renewed calls for the Development Program to pull out of North Korea.

Japan said the United Nations should end its development assistance to North Korea, citing the country's defiance of two U.N. Security Council resolutions calling for an end to its nuclear weapons program. The United States -- which has stepped up efforts to cut off hard currency to Pyongyang after its October test of a nuclear device -- said it is considering supporting Japan's position.

"A member state that does not comply with the obligations of the U.N. Charter should not receive funds from [the] United Nations," said Koji Tsuruoka, director general for global affairs in Japan's Foreign Ministry. "Assistance to such a country should be limited to that of a humanitarian nature directly delivered to the people."

North Korea's delegate, Jang Chun Sik, said that the board's decision was "unfair and unacceptable" and that it was designed to further U.S. and Japanese efforts to "isolate and stifle" North Korea's people.

Russia, China and scores of developing countries voiced concern that the board was responding to political pressure from its most influential powers and they insisted that it should not set the stage for audits of other poor countries.

The Development Program is one of four U.N. agencies, including the World Food Program and UNICEF, that carry out development and relief work in North Korea. They are required to hire government-appointed workers and pay salaries through state-controlled offices.

The program's operations in North Korea, which are managed by eight international workers, cost about $3.7 million, according to its figures. Between $1.5 million and $2.5 million of that is spent each year inside North Korea, including hundreds of thousands of dollars to pay for local staff, supplies and accommodation, according to program officials. Last year, it spent more than $1 million in salaries, rent and travel costs, as much as half of which was distributed through government-controlled agencies, according to a spokesman.

Thursday's action will freeze all development operations managed by the North Korean government, including training programs in trade and international finance. It also calls for more extensive monitoring of assistance programs and bans the recruitment of government-selected workers.

Mark D. Wallace, the U.S. representative for U.N. management, said the United States would press the World Food Program, UNICEF and the U.N. Population Fund to follow suit and stop using foreign currency to pay staff and hiring government-selected employees in North Korea.

U.S. officials have privately pressed the Development Program to ask the auditors to hire a private firm to conduct an independent review of its operations. They expressed concern that the auditing board had previously failed to flag problems in the North Korea program.

"We need a fresh set of eyes," Wallace said.

Less Cash For Kim (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

The case of U.N. hard currency for Kim Jong Il continues to evolve, with the Executive Board of the United Nations Development Fund agreeing yesterday to suspend new operations in North Korea until an audit can be completed and provide better oversight of existing programs.

Most UNDP meetings are snoozefests. But yesterday's got lively, after the U.S., Japan and other countries requested the "deferral" over concerns that tens of millions of dollars in hard currency have been funneled to Kim's dictatorship. A compromise deal requires that projects in progress adhere to UNDP rules regarding hard currency, staff and on-site visits. Projects managed by Pyongyang will be handed over to the UNDP, which will restrict activities to those that directly improve the lives of North Koreans and get out of the business of helping the government.

Dragged along kicking and screaming were the North Koreans, whose delegate condemned "the distorted and fabricated allegations made by the U.S. through its media." This was a tad ungracious, since his business class airfare to New York was paid by the U.N. But no doubt he had orders from Pyongyang, where a Foreign Ministry spokesman asserted that "The U.N. operations in North Korea are conducted in a transparent manner and meet U.N. regulations." Yes, so "transparent" that U.N. officials have been barred from visiting some of the "project" sites.

Meanwhile, U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki Moon issued a statement this week elaborating on the "urgent, system wide and external inquiry" into "all" activities of U.N. funds and programs that he promised last Friday. The good news is that he is moving swiftly on North Korea, ordering a full investigation within three months.

The disappointing news is that Mr. Ban appears to be stepping back from his larger reform promise. It's understandable that he'd want to limit his audit order in some fashion; investigations of every nook and cranny world-wide would take years. But that's no justification for defining "external" audits as those done by the U.N.'s own Panel of Auditors and its subset, the Board of External Auditors. These are the same auditors who found nothing suspicious in the Oil for Food program.

There's nothing to prevent the U.N. from hiring outside audit firms to look at specific problems. Oil for Food was investigated by the Volcker Commission, which devoted half its budget to a forensic audit by Deloitte Touche. An independent task force investigating procurement has also hired AON Corp. for forensic auditing.

Also troubling is that Mr. Ban's elaboration appears to limit the audits to "hard currency transactions, independence of staff hiring, and access to reviewing local projects." Those are key problem areas, to be sure. But the auditors should be free to follow the trail wherever it takes them. We also hope the audit will include other U.N. programs in North Korea that operate under the same rules as UNDP, including Unicef, the Population Fund and the World Food Program.

It's good to see the cash for Kim programs reined in. But to realize his promise of making the U.N. more transparent, the new Secretary-General has to keep pressing and bring in the outside auditors.

New India Accords With Russia Include More Nuclear Power Plants (NYT)

By Amelia Gentleman

New York Times, January 26, 2007

NEW DELHI, Jan. 25 — India sealed a wide-ranging package of agreements with Russia on Thursday, the first day of a summit meeting intended to demonstrate that their longstanding relationship had not deteriorated as a result of India's growing engagement with the United States.

In a joint statement issued after President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia met with Prime Minister Manmohan Singh of India, Russia offered to build four new nuclear power plants in India, in addition to the two reactors it is already building here.

"Energy security is the most important of the emerging dimensions of our strategic partnership," Mr. Singh said. "Russia's position as a global leader on energy issues is widely recognized."

As India's economy booms, the prospect of growing energy shortages has become a major driver of its foreign policy. Describing Russia as a "special friend" of India, Mr. Singh added that despite the "sea change" that had occurred in international affairs over the past decade, "Russia remains indispensable to India's strategic interests."

This was Mr. Putin's first visit to India since the United States agreed to cooperate with India on its civilian nuclear power program last year, and the Indian government was at pains to show that the agreement had done nothing to dilute the warmth of India's affection for its historic partner, Russia.

Mr. Singh went to the airport to meet the Russian leader as he stepped off his plane, a pointed gesture of respect previously extended only to President Bush and King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia.

Mr. Putin will be the guest of honor at India's Republic Day celebrations on Friday. Much of the weaponry on display will be Soviet-made, a testament to the earlier close friendship between the countries in the 1970s and 1980s.

Pentagon Eyes Missile Defenses In Eastern Europe (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, January 26, 2007

The Pentagon is moving rapidly to build new missile defenses in Poland and the Czech Republic to counter the threat posed by Iranian long-range missiles, the head of the Missile Defense Agency said yesterday.

"The immediate threat in terms of emerging threats that we see is obviously the Iranians, and they're putting a lot of energy into that [long-range missile] program," said Air Force Lt. Gen. Henry "Trey" Obering, the agency's director.

The three-star general said plans call for deploying 10 long-range anti-missile interceptors in Poland along with a tracking radar in the nearby Czech Republic by 2011 or 2012.

"We want to have this in place by the 2011, 2012 time frame because we think the Iranians, for example, shortly thereafter will be able to have a long-range capability," he said.

The Iranian long-range missile threat is emerging, and as a result "it's prudent for us to be thinking about that now and to begin to build toward that so we're in a position that we can do something about it in that time frame," Gen. Obering said.

The Eastern European missile defense site will cost about $3.5 billion and is part of a global integrated missile defense designed to counter "rogue" nations' missiles, including those from Iran and North Korea, he said.

The Polish interceptor base will be the third global long-range missile interceptor base and will be similar to the current base at Fort Greeley, Alaska, where 14 interceptors are deployed. A second U.S. missile defense base at California's Vandenberg Air Force Base now has two interceptors. Both sites will have 24 or 25 by the end of the year.

Gen. Obering sought to calm Russian fears that the European-based interceptors will be capable of shooting down Russian long-range missiles. He said the interceptors pose no threat to Russian intercontinental ballistic missiles because they cannot intercept either the large numbers of Russian ICBMs, nor will they be capable of chasing them successfully from the Polish location.

Russia is opposing the Polish and Czech sites, and Moscow officials have threatened to take unspecified action to counter the interceptors.

Iran has no long-range missiles, but its Shahab-3 medium-range missiles, with ranges of 620 miles, are thought capable of reaching some parts of Europe.

Iran is working on Shahab-4, Shahab-5 and Shahab-6 missiles that have ranges from 1,240 miles to 4,154 miles, which also could be used as nonmilitary space launchers.

"We see what's happening right now in Iran, we know that they have a very aggressive test program that they have demonstrated in public, and they have avowed themselves that they are going to obtain a space launch capability," Gen. Obering said.

The magazine Aviation Week & Space Technology reported on its Web site last night that Iran was poised to take that very step: launching a satellite into space.

A recently assembled 30-ton ballistic missile turned space launcher "will liftoff soon" with an Iranian satellite, the magazine quoted Alaoddin Boroujerdi, chairman of the Iranian parliament's National Security and Foreign Policy Commission, as saying during a speech to religious students and clerics in Qom.

Gen. Obering said that once Iran succeeds in building a space launch vehicle, "you have demonstrated all the basic building blocks for a long-range ICBM capability, in terms of staging, controlling a vehicle through the staging and burns."

"All indications are they are working to be able to achieve that," he said.

On China's recent anti-satellite weapons test, Gen. Obering said it does not pose an immediate threat to the space-based elements of the U.S. missile defense system. But in the long term it could pose a threat, he said.

Iran Set To Try Space Launch (AVWEEK)

By Craig Covault

Aviation Week, January 26, 2007

Iran has converted its most powerful ballistic missile into a satellite launch vehicle. The 30-ton rocket could also be a wolf in sheep's clothing for testing longer-range missile strike technologies, Aviation Week & Space Technology magazine reports in its Jan. 29 issue.

The Iranian space launcher has recently been assembled and "will liftoff soon" with an Iranian satellite, according to Alaoddin Boroujerdi, the chairman of the Iranian parliament's National Security and Foreign Policy Commission.

The move toward an independent space launch capacity is likely to ratchet up concern in the U.S. and Europe about Iran's strategic capabilities and intents. Orbiting its own satellite would send a powerful message throughout the Muslim world about the Shiite regime in Tehran.

U.S. agencies believe the launcher to be a derivation of the 800-1,000-mi. range Shahab 3 missile. A Shahab 3 fired from central Iran could strike anywhere in Israel, Saudi Arabia, the entire Persian Gulf region and as far west as southern Turkey.

There are concerns in the West that space launch upgrades, however, could eventually create an Iranian intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM) with a range of nearly 2,500 mi., giving Tehran the ability to strike as far as central Europe, well into Russia and even China and India.

The U. S. Defense Intelligence Agency has told the Congress that Iran may be capable of developing a 3,000-mi. range ICBM by 2015.

"But ultimately, their space program aims to orbit reconnaissance satellites like Israel's "Ofek," using an Iranian satellite launcher from Iranian territory, says Uzi Rubin, the former head of the Israel Missile Defense Organization. Rubin made his assessment in a report for The Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs.

"A reconnaissance satellite of reasonable performance should weigh about 300 kg. [660 lb.] Once Iran learns how to put 300 kg. into earth orbit, it could adapt the satellite launcher into an ICBM that could drop more than 300 kg anywhere in the world.

Boroujerdi's made his remarks about the imminent Iranian launch in a speech before a group of religious students and clerics in the city of Qom near where Iran has conducted some of its ballistic missile tests. Iran is now in the midst of military exercises that include a series of shorter-range missile tests, Iranian officials say.

Although designed as a technology demonstrator, the planned satellite launch would be a potent political and emotional weapon in the Middle East.

The new space launcher and ongoing missile development is also significant in that it highlights close technological ties between the Iranian and North Korean missiles programs, intelligence agencies agree.

Analysts at the strategic think tank GlobalSecurity.org believe that the new Iranian modification could be a stepping stone to an Iranian clone of the North Korean Taep'O-Dong 2C/3 ballistic missile that failed in a launch attempt from North Korea last July 4.

A November 2006 Congressional Research Service report reinforced concerns over Iranian and North Korean missile development ties. It notes that Israel's military intelligence chief has information indicating that North Korea has shipped to Iran eighteen 1,500 mi. range BM-25 ballistic missiles capable of carrying a nuclear warhead.

"Largely with foreign help, Iran is becoming self-sufficient in the production of ballistic missiles," says the report's author, Kenneth Katzman. And he reminds that a 2006 U.S. National Security Strategy Document notes, "The United States may face no greater challenge from a single country than Iran."

U.S. Military Rejects Russian Worries (AP)

By George Gedda

Proposed U.S. missile defense sites in Poland and the Czech Republic will not affect Russian security but will be designed to intercept missiles planned by Iran that would be capable of reaching Eastern Europe, a senior defense official said Thursday.

Air Force Lt. Gen. Henry A. Obering, director of the Missile Defense Agency, rejected Russian claims that the U.S. plan would upset the security balance. Russian officials have warned of the possibility of countermeasures.

Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov said Wednesday that U.S. systems being considered could not be directed against Iran because that country has no intercontinental ballistic missiles and will not have any in the future.

Obering, speaking to reporters in a telephone briefing, said that while Iran poses no long-range threat to Eastern Europe today, "we have to stay ahead of what we think that threat is."

Beyond that, Obering said, the interceptors the United States plans for Poland and the Czech Republic are insignificant compared with Russian capabilities.

"There is no way, shape or form that 10 interceptors can neutralize the hundreds of missiles in the Russian arsenal," Obering said. "I can't be any more plain than that."

He said U.S. defense officials have traveled to Russia to explain U.S. intentions and plan more such consultations in the future.

Asked if Russia would be allowed to send observers to the sites, Obering said, "We have nothing to hide. But any invitation would be subject to consultations with the host governments."

The $3.5 billion program for Poland will be completed in 2011 or 2012, Obering said.

At one point, he said the program will be designed to deal with "rogue nations," but he mentioned no country in that category besides Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0122391

A Polish journalist asked whether any compensation would be paid to the country in exchange for Poland's willingness to serve as a host missile defense country. Obering said no such benefit is planned because the project will enhance Polish security.

He added that the United States has other Eastern European countries in mind if negotiations with Poland and the Czech republic over terms of the deployments are unsuccessful.

China's successful antisatellite-missle test Jan. 11 carries potential implicationsÂ for the international community, which has collectively placed at least 316 satellites within the missile's proven range (528 more orbiters, such as GPS and early-warning satellites, fly even higher). At issue are military surveillance satellites--the very ones that detected Beijing's test--which represent only 6% of the total number but almost all of which fly within reach. Until now, only Russia and the U.S. have downed space objects, and despite Beijing's assurances that the test was not adversarial, the U.S. sees a threat to its spy satellites--and a possible catalyst to a space arms race. Venezuela May Ask U.S. Envoy To Leave (AP)

By Christopher Toothaker

AP, January 26, 2007

President Hugo Chavez warned Thursday that the U.S. ambassador could be asked to leave the country if he continues "meddling in Venezuela's affairs."

The outspoken Venezuelan leader lashed out after William Brownfield said U.S. companies and investors must receive a fair price for their shares of Venezuela's largest telephone company when Chavez's government nationalizes it.

"If you continue meddling in Venezuela's affairs, first of all, you are violating the Geneva agreements and getting yourself involved in a serious violation and could ... be declared a persona non grata and would have to leave the country," Chavez.

The top American envoy to Venezuela told Caracas' Union Radio the planned takeover of CA Nacional de Telefonos, or CANTV, should proceed "in a transparent, legal manner" and that Venezuela's government must offer "fair and quick compensation to the people who are affected or the owners."

"These are the only obligations that a government has when it decides to nationalize an industry," Brownfield added.

U.S. officials have accused Chavez of becoming increasingly authoritarian and of being a destabilizing force in Latin America. The Venezuelan leader has repeatedly accused Washington of scheming against his left-leaning government.

Virginia-based Verizon Communications Inc. holds the largest minority share of CANTV, which was privatized in 1991. The takeover jeopardizes an agreement by Verizon to sell its 28.5 percent stake in CANTV to a joint venture of America Movil and Telefonos de Mexico SA, controlled by Mexican billionaire Carlos Slim.

The sale had been awaiting Venezuelan government regulatory approval.

Chavez, a self-proclaimed "revolutionary" who is steering Venezuela toward socialism, has said he wants an immediate state takeover of the telephone company and will not pay shareholders the market value. The Venezuelan leader has said the price for CANTV would take into account debts to workers, pensions and other obligations to the state.

Brownfield said he was optimistic that shareholders would be fairly compensated.

"I think it can be a process that concludes in a satisfactory manner for all those involved, that's my hope," he said.

Chavez _ a close ally of Cuban leader Fidel Castro _ also has said he plans to nationalize the electricity sector, and take state control of four lucrative oil projects and the natural gas sector.

Relations between Caracas and Washington have been tense since Chavez was briefly ousted in a 2002 coup that he claimed the U.S. played a role in. The Bush administration has repeatedly denied involvement, although it recognized an interim government established by coup leaders.

Brownfield said he wanted to improve relations through "a serious and pragmatic dialogue between the two governments, to identify issues of mutual interest and to look for solutions to those issues."

Legislation Would Relax Cuba Policy (WT)

By Steve Hirsch

The Washington Times, January 26, 2007

Legislation to chip away at the Bush administration's hard-line Cuba policy is in the works in the House, where Republicans and Democrats are planning a variety of measures aimed at easing the U.S. policy on Cuba.

The first bill, which would lift the ban on Americans traveling to Cuba, was introduced yesterday by Rep. Jeff Flake, Arizona Republican.

The Cuban economic embargo, which dates to the 1960s, allows cash sales only for food, medicine and medical equipment and restricts travel to the island.

U.S. citizens are generally barred from travel to Cuba without a specific license, although there are exceptions for working journalists, researchers and some others. Permits for visits to immediate family members in Cuba may be issued every three years.

The measures to ease the policy will be filed as stand-alone legislation or as amendments to appropriations bills or other legislation.

Mr. Flake, who introduced his bill with House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat, said that nearly 50 years of the current policy have "done little" to bring democracy to Cuba.

Instead of aiding democratic reform, the policy has given Cuban President Fidel Castro "a convenient scapegoat for his own regime's failures," Mr. Flake said.

Rep. Bill Delahunt, Massachusetts Democrat, plans legislation to ease restrictions on Cuban-American family travel.

Other possibilities include legislation to ease payment restrictions for cash sales of food to Cuba.

Rep. Jerry Moran, Kansas Republican, is planning to introduce one such payment-regulation bill next week. He said Wednesday that stand-alone Cuba legislation is more likely to reach the House floor now than under Republican leadership, partly because Republican leaders were adamantly opposed to dealings with Cuba.

President Bush's continuing tough stance toward Havana, however, means that a full-scale lifting of the Cuba embargo could encounter a veto threat.

Rep. Jo Ann Emerson, Missouri Republican, who plans to co-sponsor Mr. Moran's proposal, said that Congress may be able to make some changes in the Cuba policy, but that even with a new Democratic majority, any such changes would be "pretty incremental."

Mr. Rangel criticized Mr. Bush as being "locked into punishing Castro," but suggested that Mr. Bush would not veto bills that have Republican support.

"He's in enough trouble for the war that the best he can look for is trying to be able to accomplish something among Republican members. He owes them big time," Mr. Rangel said.

The White House had no comment on the bills yesterday. National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe only said: "Our Cuba policy is unchanged."

The bills come as the state of Mr. Castro's health remains a mystery.

Mr. Castro, who has not been seen in public since July, has temporarily handed over power to his younger brother, Raul, but it is not clear whether a permanent succession would result in a fundamental change in Cuba's government.

Some observers have suggested recently that Fidel Castro's departure from the scene might not cause any fundamental change in Cuba's political system.

Earlier this month, a senior U.S. intelligence official told congressional intelligence panels, "Raul Castro is firmly in control as Cuba's acting president and will likely maintain power and stability after Fidel Castro dies, at least for the short term."

Army Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, told the committees that the younger Castro "has widespread respect and support among Cuban military leaders who will be crucial in permanent government succession."

Blueprint Sees Kosovo As Ward Of EU (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Mark Turner

DOJ_NMG_0122393

Financial Times, January 26, 2007

The special UN envoy charged with negotiating the future status of the Serbian province of Kosovo plans to submit his compromise recommendations on Friday, with Nato peacekeepers braced for a backlash from ethnic Albanians demanding full independence.

Martti Ahtisaari, a former Finnish president, has already disclosed that his proposal "foresees strong international civilian and military presences within a broader future international engagement in Kosovo".

In effect, Kosovo would be given the attributes of independence but remain under the wing of the international community, diplomats said. Neither "independence" nor Serbia's continued sovereignty are expected to be mentioned. Ultimate authority will be transferred to a special representative of the European Union from the United Nations, which has administered the province since Nato intervened in 1999 to stop Serbia's campaign of ethnic cleansing.

Mr Ahtisaari will also set out provisions for the protection of minority rights, in particular for the Serbs living mostly in small enclaves.

After submitting his report to the six-nation Contact Group in Vienna on Friday, the UN envoy, who was appointed in November 2005, will take the report to Belgrade and Pristina on February 2. Neither side is expected to embrace the plan, but both are under intense pressure not to reject it outright.

The formula of supervised independence is similar to the status given to Bosnia in 1995, except that the concept of sovereignty in Kosovo's case will remain vague.

Analysts said the Bush administration did not appear to have the political will to take on Russia over the issue, perhaps because of other priorities needing Moscow's acquiescence, namely Iran, North Korea and energy security.

"I think there are all sorts of possibilities which can be there, if the parties get into creative discussions," Vitaly Churkin, Russia's envoy to the UN, told the FT, indicating Moscow's willingness to continue along this tack.

Russia has previously said it would block an effort at the UN Security Council to recognise Kosovo as a breakaway sovereign state against the will of Belgrade.

A senior US official said Mr Ahtisaari would propose "a very generous package" to protect the Serb minority and the ancient Orthodox churches that remain a powerful symbol of Serbia's national identity.

The Right Muddle For Kosovo (LAT)

HERE'S A PLACE you probably haven't thought about much in the last seven years: Kosovo. But the Balkan province is about to make a comeback bid for your attention, and not necessarily in a good way.

The former Yugoslavia, a steaming kettle of ethnic and religious resentments, has been comparatively peaceful since the wars of the 1990s — not because the region's territorial disputes have been settled but because NATO has kept a close watch on the stove (in the case of Kosovo, with 16,000 troops). But an upcoming United Nations ruling on Kosovo's bid for independence from Serbia stands to set the burner on high.

Kosovo, a province the size of Connecticut, has about 2 million residents, 90% of them ethnic Albanians. It was an autonomous region within the Yugoslav federation until 1989, when Slobodan Milosevic jump-started his career as dictator by asserting Belgrade's authority over what is, for Serbs, a land of nationalist importance. The crackdown led to a Kosovar rebellion nine years later that was ruthlessly suppressed until halted by NATO bombardiers. The region has been under U.N. supervision while the international community fumbles for a more permanent settlement.

That U.N. blueprint will be unveiled privately today in Vienna to the six-nation Contact Group that sets policy for Kosovo — the U.S., Britain, France, Germany, Italy and Russia. Leaked pieces of the plan seem a bit of a mess. It is expected to propose "supervised autonomy," a sort of "independence lite," watched over by an international monitor. Kosovo will reportedly be allowed to join international organizations such as the U.N. and the World Bank and even maintain a tiny army. But the minority Serb population would largely be self-governed, with direct links to Serbia.

The plan isn't going to please many in proindependence Kosovo, and next to no one in pro-federation Serbia. Anticipation of an unfavorable U.N. recommendation probably helped the ultranationalist Radicals — led by a Serb awaiting a war crimes trial in The Hague — win the most votes of any party in Serbia's recent elections.

Yet flawed and temporary as it is, the U.N. compromise is the only practical solution for now. Full independence would mean using the U.N. to dictate and enforce a secession movement. Besides setting bad precedent, it would certainly be vetoed by Russia. And Kosovars would sooner revolt than accept a full reunion with Serbia. The two sides aren't ready to be peaceful neighbors, but taking small steps in that direction, while preserving the peace, would help them get used to the idea as their societies heal from communism and war. Impatient NATO members will just have to get used to sticking around.

First Test For New UN Chief: Darfur (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y.

Putting an end to the violence there, which the United States calls "genocide," is also turning into the UN leader's first major test – of his credibility as a global moral force and of his ability to cajole the international community, and in this case Sudan, beyond words to action.

Mr. Ban is underscoring his commitment to resolving the conflict in Darfur by making the African Union summit, to be held in Ethiopia Monday, the focus of his first international trip. There he plans to meet Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir and to press him to accept deployment of a "hybrid" African Union-UN force of 20,000 peacekeepers for the war-ravaged province.

UN officials say Ban, who has been in his job since Jan. 2, does not want to lose the "momentum" that was thought to have been made at the end of last year, when Mr. Bashir sent a letter to outgoing UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan in which he seemed to accept the idea of a hybrid force.

"The problem is that the Sudanese agree to things, but then they backtrack and dawdle. So the worry here is that they made a gesture but then saw they could use the change from Annan to Ban to stall," says one UN official close to the thinking in the secretary-general's office. "The idea will be to move ahead with what has already been approved," says the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Ban's meeting with Bashir is a good first step, some analysts of conflict diplomacy say, but they add that he can do much more.

"The most important thing is to get countries to make significant pledges of troops for a Darfur force, so that it is something more than an idea approved last year by the Security Council," says Lee Feinstein, an expert in international institutions at the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington. "That's something Ban can do that would send a particularly stern message of determination to the Sudanese."

Mr. Feinstein says that Ban, whose candidacy to the secretary-general's post was backed by both Washington and Beijing, should turn to China now for a troop commitment to a peacekeeping force in Darfur. Given Beijing's significant economic partnership with Khartoum, no other power could equal the message that would send, he adds.

Increasingly sensitive to its international image, China is openly discussing its growing involvement in Africa in general and in Sudan in particular. But it is also emphasizing that its cooperation toward a resolution of the Darfur conflict will be diplomatic and not military in nature.

Chinese President Hu Jintao announced this week his plans to visit Sudan next month for talks that will include the Darfur crisis.

Wang Guangya, the Chinese ambassador to the UN, who met with Ban this week in New York, says he made clear China's support for a diplomatic solution in Darfur.

DOJ_NMG_0122395

"I told [Ban] we support him in setting his priority on Darfur, and that we will work with him for progress on that issue," Mr. Wang says. Referring to Sudan's recent hints of openness to outside involvement, he adds, "We have seen some important signals over the past few weeks, and I think we are seeing indications that we can expect more."

Ban also met this week with a Sudanese foreign-ministry official, registering his concern over continued aerial bombardments by the government of Sudan in north Darfur. He also brought up increasing harassment of and attacks on UN staff members in Darfur.

But pressure for more robust international action is mounting in other quarters. Several rights organizations, including Human Rights Watch and the Save Darfur Coalition, are calling on the African Union to reject Sudan's candidacy for the presidency of the 53-member organization. In letters to AU countries, the groups said the AU's effectiveness and role in a Darfur resolution would be undermined with a Sudanese presidency.

At the same time, a bipartisan group of US senators is calling on President Bush to divulge any plans the administration has to strengthen its measures addressing the Darfur conflict. Andrew Natsios, presidential envoy for Darfur, had warned the Sudanese government in a Khartoum meeting last month that the US would move on to a new plan of more aggressive measures if Sudan did not begin opening up to a larger international force than the 7,000 soldiers the AU has in the vast western region.

Feinstein, who has authored a new paper on international responsibilities in internal conflicts like that in Darfur, says Ban must also start looking to changes that can help prevent future Darfurs. "Ban should use the advantage he has of the 'fresh start' to move ahead more long term on developing the means to prevent conflicts from becoming international tragedies, as Darfur has," he says.

Among other things, he says Ban should build on the UN General Assembly's adoption in 2005 of the so-called "responsibility to protect" doctrine, which calls on the international community to protect civilians in countries where the government is unable or unwilling to do so.

Doha Breakthrough Not Far Away (FT)

By Alan Beattie

Financial Times, January 26, 2007

Trade ministers continued to jockey for position ahead of their meeting on Saturday at the World Economic Forum in Davos, with the EU saying a big breakthrough on the Doha round could come within weeks.

Peter Mandelson, EU trade commissioner, told the FT that the broad outlines of a deal in multilateral trade talks, with overall indicators of cuts in farm tariffs and subsidies and goods tariffs, was not far away.

“I believe we can get a breakthrough on the big numbers in agriculture and industrial goods in the next month or so,” he said.

But he continued to argue that the onus was on the US to offer more cuts in farm subsidies. Despite intensive talks between the EU and US negotiators in recent weeks, officials say that gaps remain.

“The agricultural consultations between the EU and the US are through the worst,” Mr Mandelson said. “We are approaching the end of the endgame in that regard.”

Saturday’s meeting will discuss whether to reopen the multilateral talks, which were suspended last July.

The outstanding issue in agriculture was between the US and developing countries, said Mr Mandelson. The US has asked for substantial new access to the consumer markets of big emerging market countries such as India, Indonesia and the Philippines.

Susan Schwab, US trade representative, said that a framework agreement was possible “in a matter of months”, but that would require rapid progress in the next few weeks.

She declined to discuss what cuts in farm tariffs and subsidies would be required for agreement. “There are two things I am not going to get into this weekend,” she said. “I am not going to point fingers and I am not going to quote top-line numbers.”

Detailed discussions with individual countries about the protection they wanted to maintain for various farm commodities was necessary to reach agreement, she said.

Rachid Mohammed Rachid, Egypt's trade minister, said that the EU and US both had to do more, but that the task was harder for the US.

He added that few developing countries, apart from Brazil and India, had been properly consulted. "Africa has been totally neglected," he said. "Africa has been dealt with more by threats than by anything else. They have been told: 'You should not be the ones blocking this deal. You should be supporting it'."

Mr Rachid said there appeared to be a belief that the poorest developing countries could be bought off with a few concessions in the last few hours of a trade deal.

The agricultural talks will focus on the number of so-called sensitive products for rich countries and special products for developing countries which they can shield from across-the-board cuts in farm tariffs.

Rules Dispute Imperils Khmer Rouge Trial (NYT)

By Seth Mydans

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

PHNOM PENH, Cambodia, Jan. 25 — The Cambodian judges were on one side and the foreign judges on the other this week in a dispute that captures a decade of difficulties in bringing to trial the last surviving leaders of the murderous Khmer Rouge.

If they cannot agree on procedural rules soon, analysts and officials at the tribunal say, some foreign judges may walk out. That would cast a deeper shadow over a process that some critics say is already so compromised as to be of doubtful value.

Seventeen Cambodians and 12 foreigners took office as judges and prosecutors in July, inaugurating a United Nations-sponsored process that mixes Cambodian law with international standards of justice. It is an awkward formula made more questionable by the meager qualifications of the Cambodian judges, who are seen as poorly trained and subject to political manipulation.

Pragmatists say that a flawed trial is better than none and that there is no choice but to proceed with the tribunal you have rather than the tribunal you may wish to have.

Almost three decades have passed since the Khmer Rouge ruled Cambodia, from 1975 to 1979, causing 1.7 million deaths through killings, torture, starvation and overwork.

The potential defendants are aging and some have died, notably the Khmer Rouge leader, Pol Pot, in 1998. The targets of the trial are top leaders and "those most responsible" for the crimes and is expected to focus on at most a dozen defendants. Among the handful of names often mentioned, only one is in custody, with the rest living freely in Cambodia.

The foreign co-prosecutor, a Canadian named Robert Petit, has been pursuing the evidence vigorously but has not said where it is leading him. In an interview, he said he was ready to propose his first indictments once the judges formalized the rules at a plenary session tentatively set for March. A trial might then begin by the end of the year.

Cambodia and the United Nations agreed on the structure of the mixed tribunal in 2003 after years of negotiations that involved technical and political differences. Those differences remained at the heart of the disagreements that have stalled the trial since November, say experts on the tribunal.

A rules committee of nine judges is trying to resolve the differences. Sean Visoth, the tribunal's Cambodian coordinator, said, "If there is no compromise and there is no plenary, the international judges will walk away."

The delay has revived a concern that Prime Minister Hun Sen may not in fact want the trial to proceed and may be throwing up the latest in a long series of roadblocks that have stalled it over the years. Among other things, he is believed to be under pressure from China, which does not want to see a trial that would be likely to demonstrate its close ties to the Khmer Rouge government.

The core disputes appear to involve a long-running issue: the independence of the trial from Cambodian political manipulation.

On the Cambodian side, an important issue is control, said the American ambassador to Cambodia, Joseph A. Mussomeli. "The government in general tries to keep tight control over the judiciary and anything that could have negative consequences," he said.

The first concern is the scope of indictments in a country where the politics of the present remain tangled in the past. Some former middle-ranking Khmer Rouge are prominent in the current government, including Mr. Hun Sen — although experts say he is not culpable. Other potential defendants may have powerful patrons trying to protect them.

One point of contention among the judges, said people close to the negotiations, is a provision that would in effect allow an indictment to proceed without the agreement of the Cambodian side. That provision is one of several balancing acts in the tribunal's super-majority system that at most junctures allows foreign and Cambodian judges to cast what amount to vetoes over one another's decisions.

The Cambodian side is also seeking to limit the right of defendants to be represented in court by foreign lawyers, which it says is a violation of Cambodian legal sovereignty. Foreign analysts say the Cambodian concern is that aggressive foreign lawyers would be independent of any political guidance and could send the case in unpredictable directions.

A British lawyer, Rupert Skilbeck, who will coordinate the lawyers' work, said defendants would be placed at a disadvantage if they could not select their own lawyers.

"It's important that the trials are very fair, because if they're seen as show trials, then there will be no justice," he said in November.

Mr. Mussomeli said the Cambodian government, accustomed to controlling the judiciary, might be reacting defensively to Mr. Petit, who has taken on his job as prosecutor with an energy and independence that is unfamiliar here.

In the interview, Mr. Petit sought to calm these concerns, saying he was aware that the tribunal could be derailed by an overaggressive prosecution. "We have to apply the law in the context of Cambodia," he said. "I'm not stupid. You have to exercise discretion."

Mr. Petit has been involved in tribunals in Rwanda, Sierra Leone, Kosovo and East Timor, and he said he understood that in cases like these it was not possible to follow the law blindly, without reference to its context. "We all have a sense of our responsibilities," he said. "Our primary responsibility is to deliver justice to the victims of these crimes." That will not be possible, he said, if the process is shut down for any reason.

He said he did not know how many cases he would forward to the next level of the tribunal, the investigating judges, who are to issue indictments. "In this particular tribunal there are very specific expectations," he said. "Everyone 'knows' what happened. We've got the evidence there; you just have to pick it up and carry it into court — well, it doesn't work that way."

"We have to grasp events of great magnitude that happened 30 years ago and be legally and morally convinced that we have cases against individual people," he said.

Carter Apologizes For 'Stupid' Book Passage (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, January 26, 2007

Jimmy Carter has apologized for what he called a "stupid" passage in his book that critics say is a de facto endorsement of Palestinian violence against Israelis.

The former president had spent most of the past two months defending his new book, "Palestine: Peace not Apartheid," after 15 board members at his Atlanta-based Carter Center resigned in protest of the book's content.

"I apologize to you personally and to everyone here," Mr. Carter said when asked about the passage by a student during his appearance at Brandeis University on Tuesday. After explaining that the passage was "worded in a completely improper and stupid way," Mr. Carter said he has asked publisher Simon & Schuster Inc. to change the wording in future editions of the book.

The questionable passage, which appears on Page 213 of the book, reads: "It is imperative that the general Arab community and all significant Palestinian groups make it clear that they will end the suicide bombings and other acts of terrorism when international laws and the ultimate goals of the Roadmap for Peace are accepted by Israel."

Some of Mr. Carter's critics, including the Carter Center board members who resigned, say the text reads as defending terror tactics until a peace accord can be reached between Israel and Palestinians.

"Repeatedly I call on all to terminate the use of violence," Mr. Carter said in response.

He also addressed critics who said the book title unfairly compared Israeli policy to the racial separatist policies of South Africa's government, which ended apartheid in the early 1990s. Mr. Carter said he did not mean to "equate Zionism with racism" when choosing the title.

"I chose that title knowing that it would be provocative, but in the long run it has precipitated discussion and there has been a lot of positive discussion," he said.

Emory University history professor Kenneth W. Stein, who served as the Carter Center's first executive director, was one of the first board members to resign after the book was published in December.

Last week, in a statement released through Emory's Institute for the Study of Modern Israel, Mr. Stein criticized Mr. Carter's book for suggesting that the Palestinian terror group Hamas is "ready for dialogue." Mr. Stein noted that Hamas has never recognized the legitimacy of the Jewish state and that, as recently as October, a Palestinian official said at a Hamas gathering that Israel is "a vile entity."

On Wednesday, Mr. Carter released the transcript of a discussion he held as president with Pope John Paul II. During the Oct. 6, 1979, discussion, Mr. Carter urged the pope to publicly acknowledge Israel during one of his speeches.

"I reported that the Jews in our country at least thought that he was biased against them because he had never yet mentioned Israel in one of his speeches," the transcript reads. "He replied, 'I have mentioned Jerusalem.' I replied, 'This is not adequate for the Jews.' " The transcript was first released to the Associated Press.

Mr. Carter's appearance at the Brandeis campus in Boston was followed by an appearance by Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz, who has been critical of the book. Although Mr. Carter refused to debate him and even to appear with him, Mr. Dershowitz told the students in attendance that he appreciated the former president's apology.

"You heard the Brandeis Jimmy Carter today, and he was terrific," Mr. Dershowitz said. "I support almost everything he said. But if you listen to the Al Jazeera Jimmy Carter, you'll hear a very different perspective."

Judgment Day (WSJ)

By Yossi Klein Halevi

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

JERUSALEM -- The Israeli presidency is largely a ceremonial position and has only one real purpose: to uphold the honor of the Jewish state. Yet over the last six months, as accusations of sexual crimes accumulated against him, President Moshe Katsav resisted demands to resign, insisting on his right to remain in office until being formally charged -- even though, by tainting the presidency with scandal, he has betrayed the job's core requirement. Now, with impending charges that include rape, sexual harassment, obstruction of justice and fraud, he is being dragged out of office: Yesterday, the Knesset approved the president's temporary suspension. But not before Mr. Katsav called a hysterical press conference in which he blamed the media, the police and the attorney general for hounding him.

For Israelis, this is a time of near-despair. A former justice minister is on trial for sexual harassment, leading tax authority officials have been arrested for fraud, the finance minister is under investigation, and any of a half-dozen alleged financial scandals could topple Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. "There is no judgment and no judge," Israelis tell each other, quoting a Talmudic phrase. With the looming threat of a nuclear Iran, and jihadist Hamas and Hezbollah pressing against its borders, Israel faces an internal challenge that is no less daunting than the external ones: to recreate a society that is worth fighting for. Never before has Israel faced greater dangers, and never before has it been so bereft of trustworthy leaders.

The roots of Israel's ethical crisis go back, ironically, to the heroic founders of the state. Personally stoic, the leaders of Mapai, the socialist party that led the state in its formative years, created a culture of cronyism. Possession of a "red card," marking Mapai membership, was often a precondition for securing scarce employment. Cronyism was coupled with frontier recklessness: Under constant siege, and overwhelmed with impoverished refugees, Israel created a culture of improvisation, a bending of the rules. With the country's survival constantly in the balance, Israelis indulged the sexual improprieties of their military heroes; Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion defended the philandering general, Moshe Dayan, by noting that King David was also an adulterer. But they knew their leaders were devoted to the nation. The same can hardly be said about today's politicians, who absorbed the wiles of the founders but not their self-sacrifice.

Perhaps the greatest threat to the political system today is a corruption of the spirit of leadership. In refusing to accept responsibility for sullying the presidency, Mr. Katsav represents a new class of Israeli leaders who reject accountability for failure. Though last summer's war didn't achieve any of its objectives, none of the architects of Israel's first military defeat admitted responsibility. Mr. Olmert continues to insist that Israel won, even though Hezbollah has rearmed and Israeli deterrence has been weakened by the very war that was intended to restore it. True, the army chief of staff, Dan Halutz, did resign last week -- but only to pre-empt a call for his dismissal from a commission of inquiry investigating the war, and without any admission of failure on his part.

It used to be different. When Avraham Ofer, housing minister in the first government of Yitzhak Rabin during the mid-1970s, was accused of corruption, he shot himself, leaving behind a note that insisted on his innocence while adding that he couldn't bear the shame. And when the wife of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin was found to have kept a bank account in Washington, in violation of the law at the time forbidding Israelis to hold foreign currency, Rabin took personal responsibility and resigned -- incomprehensible by today's standards.

Corruption among Israel's leadership is arguably no worse than anywhere else. But a nation facing immediate existential threats needs leaders who can inspire. No citizen in the West makes the kind of sacrifices, from compulsory military reserve duty to punishingly high taxes, that Israelis routinely endure. To a large extent, they endure those hardships willingly: Teenagers vie for every slot in elite combat units; at times of national emergency, even reservists who haven't been called up volunteer for service. Israelis deserve a leadership worthy of their sacrifices.

The founders of Zionism hoped to turn the Jews into a "normal" people, a nation like all other nations. They envisioned a country maintaining normal international relations while creating an admirable society -- externally normalized, internally exceptional. Given Israel's precarious status and the current state of its political culture, that vision seems to have been reversed.

But the good news is that change is coming. Mr. Katsav, after all, is being brought to trial. The plethora of sex-related accusations against prominent Israelis is an indication of a maturing society no longer indulging the excesses of its leaders. With Lt. Gen. Halutz gone, Mr. Peretz will almost certainly soon have to follow: He will be forced to resign either by the commission of inquiry into the Lebanon war or by a rebellion within the Labor Party, which he currently heads. Finally, Mr. Olmert's own day before the commission of inquiry is approaching, and so is a decision by the attorney general about whether to pursue criminal charges against him for financial improprieties. There is judgment and judge, after all.

Days Of Decision In Ulster (NYT)

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

The militant Irish republican Gerry Adams and the fire-breathing unionist preacher Ian Paisley have long symbolized the irreconcilable extremes of Ulster politics. But over the next few days, they have the chance to lead the province into a new era of democratic self-rule.

Mr. Adams's opportunity comes this Sunday, when he will ask his party, Sinn Fein, to end its long refusal to cooperate with Northern Ireland's reformed police service. If Sinn Fein accepts his advice, it will be the turn of Mr. Paisley and his Democratic Unionist Party to live up to its end of the bargain and agree to form a power-sharing coalition with Sinn Fein — as the top parties elected by the Protestant and Roman Catholic communities are supposed to do under the Good Friday peace agreement on Northern Ireland.

If both sides come through, elections will be held and a coalition cabinet formed in March. If either falters, there can be no power sharing, and Northern Ireland will remain ruled by appointed British officials for the foreseeable future.

The Good Friday agreement of 1998 all but ended years of sectarian bloodshed in Northern Ireland. In 2005, the Irish Republican Army took the further crucial steps of permanently renouncing political violence and destroying its weapons. But the agreement's full promise has never been met as Sinn Fein and the Unionists have sparred over political power sharing and police reform.

The importance of police reform was clearly demonstrated this week with the release of a devastating ombudsman's report on years of police collaboration with a Protestant paramilitary death squad. Most, but not all, of that collaboration occurred before the present professional police service was created to replace the old Protestant-dominated Royal Ulster Constabulary.

Further reforms put in place by the head of the new force make any repetition of such shocking abuses unlikely. But the best safeguard would be oversight of the police by a democratically chosen executive and legislature. That is the courageous and sensible argument Mr. Adams will make to Sinn Fein this weekend. If his view prevails, Mr. Paisley's time to be courageous and sensible will follow.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Justice Department Wants Domestic Spying Lawsuit Dropped (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press

AP, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON - The Bush administration sought on Thursday to drop its appeal of a federal court ruling that concluded the government's domestic spying program is unconstitutional, saying the entire issue is moot since the surveillance now is monitored by a secret court.

Responding, lawyers for the American Civil Liberties Union said they would continue to push for their day in court since President Bush retains authority to continue the warrantless spying program.

The Justice Department's request has been expected since last week, when Attorney General Alberto Gonzales disclosed that the secret panel of judges who oversee the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act had begun reviewing and approving applications to spy on people believed to be linked to al-Qaida.

The ACLU's lawsuit against the terrorist surveillance program "is now moot," the Justice Department wrote in a 21-page brief, filed Thursday with the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati. "The surveillance activity they challenge - electronic surveillance not subject to the FISA court - does not exist."

The Bush administration secretly launched the spy program, run by the National Security Agency, in 2001 to monitor international phone calls and e-mails to or from the United States involving people suspected by the government of having terrorist links. The program, which did not require investigators to seek warrants before conducting surveillance, was revealed in December 2005.

Last August, a federal judge in Detroit declared the program unconstitutional, saying it violates the rights to free speech and privacy and the separation of powers. In October, a three-judge Cincinnati appeals panel ruled the administration could keep the program in place while it appeals the Detroit decision.

The ACLU plans to file a response Friday, asking for the appeal to continue, said assistant legal director Ann Beeson. The watchdog group contends that Bush retains his authority to return to the warrantless program if it needs to.

"The case could not be less moot," Beeson said. "The case is not moot if there's any remote possibility that the government is going to violate the law again."

Dismissal Of Lawsuit Against Warrantless Wiretaps Sought (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

A lawsuit challenging the legality of the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program should be thrown out because the government is now conducting the wiretaps under the authority of a secret intelligence court, according to court papers filed by the Justice Department yesterday.

In a filing with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 6th Circuit, in Cincinnati, Justice Department lawyers said the lawsuit of the American Civil Liberties Union and other plaintiffs -- which received a favorable ruling from a federal judge in Detroit -- should be considered moot because the case "no longer has any live significance."

The ACLU called the government's arguments implausible and said it plans to file its response today.

The brief is the latest volley in the legal battle over the controversial spying effort, dubbed by the administration as the "Terrorist Surveillance Program," or TSP. Under the program, the NSA monitored, without obtaining warrants, telephone calls and e-mails between the United States and overseas if the government determined that one of the parties was linked to al-Qaeda or other terrorist groups.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales announced last week that the government was terminating the program and that eavesdropping will be overseen by a secret 11-member court that administers the law governing clandestine spying in the United States, known as the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA.

The government contends that the new arrangement essentially invalidates an August ruling in the ACLU case by U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor, who declared the surveillance program unconstitutional and ordered it halted. The government appealed to the 6th Circuit court. It wants Taylor's ruling vacated and the lawsuit dismissed.

"Plaintiffs' challenge to the TSP is now moot," the government said in its filing yesterday. "The surveillance activity they challenge . . . does not exist. And the specific relief they sought and were awarded -- injunction of the TSP -- cannot redress any claimed injury because no electronic surveillance is being conducted under the TSP."

Crucial to the Justice Department's argument is the contention that the government did not act voluntarily to stop the NSA program. "This is not an instance of 'voluntary cessation' of allegedly unlawful activity," the government lawyers wrote. "The government has not ceased surveillance -- instead, the facts and legal authorities have changed."

But Ann Beeson, the ACLU's associate legal director, said that argument is "not plausible." She added that previous court rulings made it clear that the government cannot escape a legal judgment merely by voluntarily halting its illegal activity.

"The FISA court didn't reach out on its own to do something; the government asked it to do something," Beeson said. "And absent a ruling, they are free to return to their illegal conduct again."

The new lines of argument in the ACLU case come less than a week before a hearing scheduled for next Wednesday in Cincinnati where both sides are set to offer oral arguments.

Most of the details of the new spying arrangement are considered classified by the Bush administration, including a set of orders issued by a FISA judge on Jan. 10 that authorizes the eavesdropping. As a result, the precise outlines of and legal justifications for the monitoring remain unclear.

The government signaled in its filing that it would oppose a public release of the orders, saying that "the longstanding practice is that FISA Court orders remain classified and not subject to public dissemination." Senate Judiciary Committee leaders have asked to see copies of the orders but have, so far, been rebuffed.

Secrecy Is At Issue In Suits Opposing Domestic Spying (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

The Bush administration has employed extraordinary secrecy in defending the National Security Agency's highly classified domestic surveillance program from civil lawsuits. Plaintiffs and judges' clerks cannot see its secret filings. Judges have to make appointments to review them and are not allowed to keep copies.

Judges have even been instructed to use computers provided by the Justice Department to compose their decisions.

But now the procedures have started to meet resistance. At a private meeting with the lawyers in one of the cases this month, the judges who will hear the first appeal next week expressed uneasiness about the procedures, said a lawyer who attended, Ann Beeson of the American Civil Liberties Union.

Lawyers suing the government and some legal scholars say the procedures threaten the separation of powers, the adversary system and the lawyer-client privilege.

Justice Department officials say the circumstances of the cases, involving a highly classified program, require extraordinary measures. The officials say they have used similar procedures in other cases involving classified materials.

In ordinary civil suits, the parties' submissions are sent to their adversaries and are available to the public in open court files. But in several cases challenging the eavesdropping, Justice Department lawyers have been submitting legal papers not by filing them in court but by placing them in a room at the department. They have filed papers, in other words, with themselves.

At the meeting this month, judges on the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit asked how the procedures might affect the integrity of the files and the appellate records.

In response, Joan B. Kennedy, a Justice Department official, submitted, in one of the department's unclassified filings, a detailed seven-page sworn statement last Friday defending the practices.

"The documents reviewed by the court have not been altered and will not be altered," Ms. Kennedy wrote, and they "will be preserved securely as part of the record of this case."

DOJ_NMG_0122406

Some cases challenging the program, which monitored international communications of people in the United States without court approval, have also involved atypical maneuvering. Soon after one suit challenging the program was filed last year in Oregon, Justice Department lawyers threatened to seize an exhibit from the court file.

This month, in the same case, the department sought to inspect and delete files from the computers on which lawyers for the plaintiffs had prepared their legal filings.

The tactics, said a lawyer in the Oregon case, Jon B. Eisenberg, prompted him to conduct unusual research.

"Sometime during all of this," Mr. Eisenberg said, "I went on Amazon and ordered a copy of Kafka's 'The Trial,' because I needed a refresher course in bizarre legal procedures."

A federal district judge in the case, Garr M. King, invoked another book after a government lawyer refused to disclose whether he had a certain security clearance, saying information about the clearance was itself classified.

"Frankly, your response," Judge King said, "is kind of an Alice in Wonderland response."

Questions about the secret filings may figure in the first appellate argument in the challenges, before the Sixth Circuit, in Cincinnati, on Wednesday. The three judges who will hear the appeal met with lawyers for the Justice Department and the American Civil Liberties Union on Jan. 8 in a judge's chambers in Memphis.

"The court raised questions about the procedures the government had used to file classified submissions in the case and the propriety and integrity of those procedures," said Ms. Beeson, associate legal director of the A.C.L.U., which represents the plaintiffs in the appeal.

"They were also concerned about the independence of the judiciary," given that "the Justice Department retains custody and total control over the court filings." Ms. Beeson said.

Nancy S. Marder, a law professor at the Chicago-Kent College of Law and an authority on secrecy in litigation, said the tactics were really extreme and deeply, deeply troubling.

"These are the basics that we take for granted in our court system," Professor Marder said. "You have two parties. You exchange documents. The documents you've seen don't disappear."

A spokesman for the Justice Department, Dean Boyd, said employees involved in storing the classified documents were independent of the litigators and provided "neutral assistance" to courts in handling sensitive information. The documents, Mr. Boyd said, are "stored securely and without alteration."

The appellate argument in Cincinnati will almost certainly also concern the effects of the administration announcement last week that it would submit the program to a secret court, ending its eavesdropping without warrants.

In a brief filed on Thursday, the government said the move made the case against the program moot.

Ms. Beeson of the A.C.L.U. said the government was wrong.

At least one case, the one in Oregon, is probably not moot. It goes beyond the other cases in seeking damages from the government, because the plaintiffs say they have seen proof that they were wiretapped without a warrant.

In August 2004, the Treasury Department's Office of Foreign Assets Control, which was investigating an Oregon charity, al-Haramain Islamic Foundation, inadvertently provided a copy of a classified document to a foundation lawyer, Lynne Bernabei.

That document indicated, according to court filings, that the government monitored communications between officers of the charity and two of its lawyers without a warrant in spring 2004.

"If I gave you this document today and you put it on the front page of The New York Times, it would not threaten national security," Mr. Eisenberg, a lawyer for the foundation, said. "There is only one thing about it that's explosive, and that's the fact that our clients were wiretapped."

Ms. Bernabei circulated the document to two directors of the charity, at least one of them in Saudi Arabia, and to three other lawyers. She discussed them with two more lawyers. A reporter for The Washington Post, David B. Ottaway, also reviewed the document.

The full significance of the document was apparently not clear to any recipient, more than a year before The New York Times disclosed the existence of the N.S.A. program in December 2005.

The F.B.I. learned of the disclosure almost immediately in August 2004, Judge King said at a court hearing last year, but made no effort to retrieve copies of the document for about six weeks.

When it did, everyone it asked apparently returned all copies of the document. In a statement reported in The Post in March, for instance, Mr. Ottaway said he the F.B.I. had told him that the document had "highly sensitive national security information."

"I returned it after consulting with Washington Post editors and lawyers, and concluding that it was not relevant to what I was working on at the time," Mr. Ottaway said.

In a sworn statement in June, a lawyer who had the document, Asim Ghafoor, said the bureau took custody of his laptop computer "in order that the document might be 'scrubbed' from it."

The computer was returned weeks later.

In February 2006, the charity and the two lawyers who say they were wiretapped sued to stop the program, requesting financial damages. They attached a copy of the classified document, filing it under seal. They have not said how they came to have a copy.

Three weeks later, the lawyers for the foundation received a call from two Justice Department lawyers. The classified document "had not been properly secured," the lawyers said, according to a letter from the plaintiffs' lawyers to the judge.

As Mr. Eisenberg recalled it, the government lawyers said, "The F.B.I. is on its way to the courthouse to take possession of the document from the judge."

But Judge King, at a hurriedly convened hearing, would not yield it, and asked, "What if I say I will not deliver it to the F.B.I.?"

A Justice Department lawyer, Anthony J. Coppolino, gave a measured response, saying: "Your Honor, we obviously don't want to have any kind of a confrontation with you. But it has to be secured in a proper fashion."

The document was ultimately deposited in a "secure compartmented information facility" at the bureau office in Portland.

In the meantime, copies of the document appear to have been sent abroad, and the government concedes that it has made no efforts to contact people overseas who it suspects have them.

"It's probably gone many, many places," Judge King said of the document at the August hearing. "Who is it secret from?"

He added, "The document must be completely removed from the case, and plaintiffs are not allowed to rely on it to prove their claims."

Judge King wondered aloud about the implications of that position, saying, "There is nothing in the law that requires them to purge their memory."

Mr. Eisenberg, in an interview, said that was precisely the government position. "They claim they own the portions of our brains that remember anything," he said.

In a decision in September, Judge King ruled that the plaintiffs were not entitled to review the document again but could rely on their recollections of it. In October, they filed a motion for summary judgment, a routine step in many civil litigations. In a sealed filing, they described the classified document.

Government lawyers sent Judge King a letter saying the plaintiffs had "mishandled information contained in the classified document" by, among other actions, preparing filings on their own computers.

In a telephone conference on Nov. 1, Judge King appeared unpersuaded. "My problem with your statement," he told Mr. Tannenbaum, "is that you assume you are absolutely correct in everything you are stating, and I am not sure that you are."

Mr. Boyd of the Justice Department said the government "continues to explore with counsel ways in which the classified information may be properly protected without any intrusion on the attorney-client privilege."

Terrorism Jury Suffering 'Mental Fatigue,' Cuts Work Hours (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, January 26, 2007

CHICAGO - Jurors in the trial of two men charged with furnishing money and fresh recruits to Hamas terrorists announced Thursday that they are getting tired and are cutting their work hours.

"We have taken very few breaks," the jurors said in a note to U.S. District Judge Amy J. St. Eve who is presiding at the trial, described when the indictment was made public as a step in the war on terrorism.

Jurors said in the note that they are suffering from "mental fatigue."

Former Chicago grocer Muhammad Salah, 53, and Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, a former assistant business professor at Washington's Howard University, are charged with racketeering conspiracy and other offenses.

They are accused among other things of funneling thousands of dollars through American bank accounts to Hamas terrorists on the West Bank and the Gaza strip seeking to topple the government of Israel.

Both men say any money they furnished was destined for such purposes as clinics and day-care centers. Hamas is blamed for a number of murders, bombings and kidnappings. But the group also operates various charities and holds a 60 percent majority in the Palestinian legislative council.

Jurors heard three months of testimony in the case and have deliberated on the evidence for nine days.

In their note, they told St. Eve that they had been working diligently to reach a verdict. But they went home Thursday without reaching one.

Instead, they said that they would work a half day on Friday and from now on start work at 9 a.m. and normally quit for the day at 4 p.m.

When lunch was delivered to the jury room around noon on Thursday, the laughter and chatter that came through the open door was relaxed and friendly sounding.

Correct This Wrong (MH)

The Miami Herald, January 26, 2007

The best thing to do when you make a mistake is to admit the error, apologize for the harm it caused, make amends if possible -- and then move on. Somebody should explain this to Bush administration officials who are stubbornly refusing to acknowledge error or responsibility for the wrongful detention and subsequent torture of Canadian citizen Maher Arar.

Mr. Arar is the Syrian-born Canadian who was detained by U.S. authorities as a terrorism suspect in 2002 when he was changing planes in New York after a vacation in Tunisia. He was deported to Syria without a hearing or judicial review. There, he was imprisoned for a year in a tiny cell and routinely tortured.

All of this is now known because of findings by a Canadian Commission of Inquiry and an independent investigation by a former McGill University law dean. The commission cleared Mr. Arar of any terrorism ties. The independent investigation documented the torture he suffered in Syria.

Despite the findings, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff say that Mr. Arar's name will remain on the terrorism watch list. Why? Messrs. Chertoff and Gonzales claim to have secret information to justify his inclusion on the list. This is profoundly disturbing -- not to mention unconscionable, morally repugnant, legally suspect and just plain wrong.

No self-respecting democracy that adheres to the rule of law would allow itself to be party to torture and injustice on the basis of secret information. "This practice is abhorrent and stains America's reputation as a defender and protector of human rights," said Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., who is chair of the Senate Judiciary Committee. Sen. Leahy is right. The United States owes Mr. Arar an apology and compensation for the harm he has suffered. That is the least we can do.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI Reaches Out To Local Muslims (KINGDM)

By Aaron Royster, Miner Staff Writer

Dr. Farid Farooqi, the imam of Masjid-E-Ibrahim, welcomed the head of all FBI operations in Arizona, John E. Lewis, to help open communication between the two groups.

Farooqi said he felt the night went well. He invited Lewis and two accompanying agents to share a meal with Muslim community members.

The evening began with Farooqi providing an explanation of Islam and the beliefs of its members. He said the Islamic faith is based upon a total submission to God and establishing a means of peace on earth.

"Islam is the religion of peace," Farooqi said. "Muslims are the people of peace."

Lewis followed Farooqi, explaining the FBI to the more than 20 community leaders present to help dispel misconceptions about his organization.

Lewis and Farooqi had met at the Phoenix FBI office in December, which led to the visit by Lewis.

Lewis explained the different focuses of the FBI: counter-terrorism, counter-intelligence, cyber-crime, public corruption, violent crimes, white-collar crimes, organized crime and drug trafficking.

He said counter-terrorism is the current No. 1 priority of the FBI, but white-collar crime was the No. 1 priority before 9/11.

Lewis said that he is here to serve the community, but didn't gloss over the actions of the FBI.

"It is a rare event for us to be on the street conducting an investigation between us and a private citizen that would be a positive experience," Lewis said. "We're not in business, unfortunately, to deliver good news to you."

Individuals in attendance expressed concerns over the name checklist, profiling at airports and at the borders, and a general poor attitude from law enforcement during all interactions they had. Lewis offered few solutions or answers to the tough questions presented to him, but was attentive and expressed concern to the community leaders.

Lewis added he has received complaints in the past from citizens who felt scared or mistreated following interactions with his office. But with that stark reality, he presented some hope for the future.

"The only way that we're going to correct the way we are today is ... time," Lewis said. "We got to push forward in time and get past this."

Lewis said he felt when he started over 30 years ago with the FBI that the open forum and discussion with community members wouldn't have happened. He said that one purpose of the outreach to the community by the FBI is to make it easier for community members to get involved with the FBI.

"We cannot do our job effectively if we believe we can do it alone," Lewis said.

USA Today, January 26, 2007

President Bush's State of the Union address Tuesday included few surprises. He opened up with domestic policy and was predictably myopic about our quagmire in Iraq, seemingly immune to the pressure coming from both parties to get out of the ill-advised war. The president gets points for talking about immigration policy and for putting new ideas for health care reform on the table. But how dare he talk of the State of the Union without mentioning the Gulf Coast, and especially New Orleans. Has our president decided that one of our nation's greatest devastations does not merit a mention?

To be sure, the federal government has set aside billions of dollars for the region's recovery. But 15 months after Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast and the levees broke in New Orleans, tens of thousands of people still are displaced.

Some people are desperately trying to get home, but Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco's "Road Home" program has been paved with good intentions and poor delivery — just a fraction of the thousands who have applied for relief have received it. Habitable housing is being torn down to make way for "mixed-use" housing, and no provisions have been made for the poor who used to live in those projects. Children are being turned away from schools because there are too few to accommodate them. Citizens want to "stop the violence," but the social infrastructure to deter crime is essentially nonexistent.

Granted, all of the challenges in New Orleans and along the Gulf Coast can't be solved by federal government action alone. But a more sensitive president might at least acknowledge the slow pace of recovery and pledge to do whatever he can to help its citizens. A more sensitive president might acknowledge the pain that people still feel, but then again, this is a president whose mother observed that the Houston Astrodome, where people fled, was "working very well for them."

After the levees broke, wealthy New Orleaneans openly said that the city's footprint needed to shrink and that it should look different demographically, geographically and politically. At least one member of Congress said Katrina had done what public policy could not do. And Loyola Law School professor Bill Quigley, who is litigating on behalf of New Orleans' poor, has said recovery policies have been so biased that "you might as well put up a sign that says, 'Poor people, do not enter.' "

How could President Bush say that the state of our union is "good" when New Orleans has not yet recovered? If we can attempt to rebuild Baghdad but not New Orleans, what does that say about this country? And if Bush can spend so much of his address talking about Iraq, while Katrina recovery doesn't merit a mention, what does this say about his priorities?

No Words For The Gulf (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

More infuriating than anything George W. Bush said in his State of the Union address was what he didn't say. Congress and the nation heard nothing, zilch, nada, not a single, solitary word about New Orleans, the Gulf Coast and the devastation that remains from the worst natural disaster in United States history.

A disaster that happened on his watch. How nice that the White House has been able to move beyond the trauma of September 2005 -- wind and water, death and destruction, poverty and race, "Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job." Too bad the people of New Orleans, St. Bernard Parish, Pass Christian, Biloxi and the rest of the coast will never have the luxury of forgetting.

They can't forget that, days after Hurricane Katrina made its tragic landfall, President Bush stood in New Orleans's historic Jackson Square, while most of the city still lay beneath brackish floodwaters, and said that nature's trials "remind us that we're tied together in this life, in this nation -- and that the despair of any touches us all."

Must have been a very light touch.

That night, Bush promised that "we will do what it takes, we will stay as long as it takes, to help citizens rebuild their communities." He vowed that "this great city will rise again." Then, as usual, he acted as if saying something were enough to make it true.

Bush said there was "no way to imagine America without New Orleans." No imagination is needed -- the New Orleans that we knew before the flood no longer exists. The remnant of a city that survives between the Mississippi River and Lake Pontchartrain has less than half the population of the New Orleans we used to know. Vast neighborhoods are full of houses abandoned to mold and decay.

Hundreds of thousands of residents still have no way to come home -- or no homes to return to. Vicious hoodlums have returned, however, and are preying on the diehards who never left and the pioneers who are doing their best to help the city rebuild. Yes, Brad Pitt and Angelina Jolie have just bought a house in New Orleans and say they will make the city their home. But they're likely to have better security than their neighbors.

New Orleans was doomed not just by Hurricane Katrina but by the failure of levees and flood walls that should have provided ample protection. The Army Corps of Engineers has worked day and night to patch the flood control system, and if a Katrina hit again tomorrow, most of the city should stay dry. But if a similar hurricane hit from a different angle -- or, heaven forbid, a stronger hurricane hit from any angle -- what's left of New Orleans would probably be destroyed.

The man who inspired Bush's immortal "Brownie" remark, Michael Brown, will go down in history as the Federal Emergency Management Agency director who botched the federal response to Katrina. But he intends to take others in the White House down with him. Last week, speaking to a group of graduate students, Brown claimed that he recommended that the White House assert federal control of the disaster response in the whole affected area.

"Certain people in the White House," Brown said, wanted to "federalize" the response in Louisiana to embarrass Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, a Democrat, but avoid taking any steps in Mississippi that would cast Gov. Haley Barbour, a Republican, in an unfavorable light. Brown did not name the White House officials who were behind these alleged machinations; a White House spokesman denied his claims.

I'm about as cynical as anyone about George W. Bush and his administration, but what I mostly saw in the days after Katrina was incompetence, not political gamesmanship. The scale of the disaster was almost unimaginable, and even if the federal government had done its job, lives would have been lost and the Gulf Coast left in ruins.

What is unconscionable is that a president who fundamentally does not believe in government has allowed market forces to take the lead in the reconstruction effort, which ensures that the New Orleans he promised to rebuild is gone forever. The logjam of insurance claims, construction permits, flood maps and levee projects keeps things from moving forward; businesses can't function without workers, and workers can't come home if they have no place to live.

What kind of president can see one of the nation's greatest, most historic cities ruined and not make its rebirth his highest priority? What kind of president gives a State of the Union and doesn't even mention New Orleans?

WAR NEWS:

Republican Senators May Offer Alternative Iraq Resolutions (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2007

Scrambling to head off a potentially embarrassing congressional rebuke for President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq, Senate Republicans are working on alternative legislation that would attach specific "benchmarks" to the White House plan.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who has been the leading congressional advocate of deploying additional troops to quell the sectarian violence in Iraq, said Thursday that he was interested in drafting a resolution to ensure that the effectiveness of the troop increase could be gauged.

And Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), one of the president's most loyal supporters on Capitol Hill, said he might introduce a similar resolution.

"It says we need to give it a chance," Cornyn said, echoing the president's State of the Union plea to lawmakers Tuesday to give his plan "a chance to work." "We owe it to our servicemen and servicewomen to say what we're for, not just what we're against."

The legislative maneuvering comes after a rough two weeks for GOP lawmakers, who have been struggling to respond to Bush's deeply unpopular proposal to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq by 21,500 in the coming months.

If McCain and Cornyn introduce resolutions, they could draw support away from other resolutions that directly oppose the buildup and cast Democrats as impediments to progress in Iraq.

Six Republican senators have already expressed support for one of two resolutions that explicitly criticize the Bush plan, bringing Senate Democrats close to the GOP support needed to override any filibuster.

DOJ_NMG_0122411

The first, more critical of the resolutions — sponsored by Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) — was approved by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee Wednesday and sent to the Senate floor.

The second — put together by Sens. John W. Warner (R-Va.), Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine) — has the support of seven other senators, including two Republicans.

The White House has been working hard to derail both of the resolutions, which — although nonbinding — would mark the first time Congress has challenged Bush's leadership of the 4-year-old war.

"What they really want to come out of this is no resolution," said Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi, the No. 2 Republican leader in the Senate.

Cornyn said he had talked with the White House about his plans, as well as Senate Republicans and Sen. Joe Lieberman, a Connecticut Democrat who won reelection as an independent in November. Lieberman has been one of the strongest supporters of the president's plan.

Cornyn's and McCain's comments come days after House Republican leaders proposed their own measure to establish benchmarks, which they challenged Democrats to support.

"The new majority has two choices," House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said Monday. "They can either try to stop the president's new strategy and block funding for our troops, or they can join us in aggressively holding the Bush administration and the Iraqi government accountable for achieving success."

But Democrats — buoyed by public disapproval of the president and his Iraq plan — are pushing ahead with their plans to take on the White House.

Thursday, Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) took to the floor of the Senate to accuse Vice President Dick Cheney of being "out of touch with reality" for telling CNN that the administration has had "enormous successes in Iraq."

McCain Suggests Iraqi Government Meet Benchmarks (MERCN/MCT)

By Margaret Talev

The San Jose Mercury News, January 26, 2007

McClatchy Newspapers

(MCT)

WASHINGTON - Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., one of the most stalwart supporters of the war in Iraq, said Thursday that he might propose that the Iraqi government meet certain benchmarks for the United States to continue its engagement.

Fellow senators and independent political scientists said McCain's thinking reflected growing concerns within the Republican Party about the course of the war, and also might mark a turning point for the likely 2008 presidential contender, whose previous unconditional backing of the war may have hurt his prospects.

McCain said Thursday that he hadn't yet decided on precise benchmarks. "They'd have to be specific and they (the Iraqi government) would have to meet them."

Asked what penalty would be imposed if Iraq failed to meet his benchmarks, he said: "I think everybody knows the consequences. Haven't met the benchmarks? Obviously, then, we're not able to complete the mission. Then you have to examine your options."

Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott, R-Miss., a McCain ally, said many Republicans might back a resolution of the sort that McCain is suggesting. He noted that Republicans in the House of Representatives earlier this week proposed establishing a set of benchmarks and asking the Bush administration to report monthly on progress.

"Everybody wants the situation to change. Everybody wants to lay down some markers," Lott said. "We need to see some results here. A lot of people would like to be on record on something or for something."

Andrew E. Smith, a political science professor and the director of the University of New Hampshire Survey Center, said: "I think it certainly could be politically significant." New Hampshire will hold the first presidential primary of the 2008 cycle.

"This seems to me like he's trimming his sails a little on the issue," Smith said, adding: "He has a lot of company with this. He's not out on a limb. I think there is probably a deep sense of frustration among Republicans."

McCain in no way is withdrawing his backing for the war or President Bush's plan to add 21,500 troops. It was unclear what consequences or timetables McCain would spell out or whether he believes that Congress has the authority to enforce them.

Still, several Senate Democrats who oppose the troop buildup and also may seek the presidency said they were struck by McCain's comments.

"We Catholics call that an epiphany," said Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Joseph Biden, D-Del., who's sponsoring the main Democratic resolution opposing the troop buildup.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., said, "I called for that . . . several weeks ago. I'm glad that John McCain agrees with me.

DOJ_NMG_0122412

"He's somebody who has enormous influence with the White House. He's been one of the key champions of this escalation of troops," Obama said, "and I think the fact that he recognizes the potential lack of follow-through on the part of the Maliki government, I think that's good."

Congress is preparing to debate up to a dozen proposals addressing Bush's plan to increase U.S. troops in Iraq. Voting could begin as soon as next week. Senate Democrats are working with a group of moderate Republicans to seek compromise language opposing the buildup. McCain isn't among them. He's long advocated that more troops are needed.

Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., said lawmakers on all sides of the war issue were weighing whether to set performance benchmarks for Iraq's government. "Maybe that's a way to bring some of these things together," Coleman said, referring to the various resolutions before Congress.

GOP Senators Wrestle With Iraq War Resolution (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

Senate Republicans, scrambling to head off GOP defections to a resolution opposing President Bush's war policy, are considering their own resolution demanding benchmarks to measure progress in Iraq and possibly a new diplomatic effort to end the war, senators said yesterday.

Senators from both parties began preparing for a showdown with President Bush over his plan to increase troop levels in Iraq, although that showdown may be pushed back to the week of Feb. 5. Two rival camps opposed to the additional troop deployments continued to dicker over the wording of a resolution expressing the Senate's opposition, while GOP leaders and White House loyalists plotted a response.

Minority Whip Trent Lott (Miss.) conceded that his party's leadership could not head off a vote, as the White House wants. But GOP leaders will try to force a vote on a resolution that they hope will satisfy Republicans who are leery of the president's approach but are reluctant to oppose him.

"What we need is to put together a list of benchmarks that are tough and measurable, with requirements that the administration report back on the progress," said Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), who has expressed deep concern with the Bush policy but voted against a Foreign Relations Committee resolution of opposition Wednesday.

Democrats said the GOP efforts might keep some Republicans from signing a resolution opposing the troop increase, but not all of them. At least half a dozen Republicans have already signed on to one of two nonbinding resolutions, a strongly worded measure that passed out of the Foreign Relations Committee and a more deferential version drafted by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.).

Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and his resolution's co-author, Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), requested a meeting with Warner and his supporters to try to negotiate a single resolution that could attract broad bipartisan support. Last night Warner rebuffed those overtures, saying that he will introduce his resolution on the floor as it is written and that any amendments will have to be made during open debate.

The two resolutions come to similar conclusions, opposing the introduction of an additional 21,500 troops, calling for more diplomacy and a regional peace effort, and demanding that U.S. troops be deployed away from urban sectarian hotbeds to guard Iraq's borders, hunt down terrorists and train Iraqi security forces.

But Warner's version starts with deferential language accepting Bush's constitutional powers as commander in chief, leaves rhetorical room for some additional troop deployments and treats the fight with Sunni extremists in Anbar province as a matter separate from the sectarian violence in Baghdad.

While the lawmakers negotiate, antiwar groups are launching a public relations blitz to sway Congress. A march on Washington is planned for the weekend. And a coalition of labor unions, liberal activists and Iraq war veterans, called Americans Against Escalation in Iraq, will barnstorm through Minnesota, Indiana, Ohio, Maine, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania and Virginia next week to pressure wavering Republican senators.

In each state, television advertising will show six ex-soldiers intoning: "When it comes to Iraq, America is divided. On the one hand, you've got two-thirds of the American people, a bipartisan majority in Congress, the Iraq Study Group and veterans like us, all opposed to the escalation."

Then, one of the veterans, who is missing an arm, concludes: "On the other hand, there's George Bush, who supports escalation. If you support escalation, you don't support the troops."

No Compromise Seen On Iraq Resolutions (AP)

By Anne Flaherty

AP, January 26, 2007

The leader of a bipartisan effort to rebuke President Bush's Iraq strategy said Thursday he would not strike a compromise with a harsher Democratic resolution the Senate will debate next week.

Sen. John Warner, R-Va., former chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said he won't negotiate with Democrats to develop a single proposal on Iraq. His comments _ along with the emergence of other resolutions the Senate might consider _ underscored how a Congress largely against Bush's proposal to send more troops to Iraq remained divided over what to do about it.

Warner's decision bolsters chances that his resolution will be the one to win final Senate approval. Democrats are expected to vote for his proposal if their measure fails, and several Republicans said they prefer Warner's approach because it is less divisive.

His decision to avoid bargaining also decreases the odds that a single resolution would emerge that would garner a strong, bipartisan vote reproaching Bush's plan, which the White House hopes to avoid.

Warner's resolution would put the Senate on record as opposing Bush's decision to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq. It leaves open the possibility that a small number of forces could be sent to the western Anbar Province, where al-Qaida members are believed to be operating.

The nonbinding measure is less critical than one approved Wednesday in a 12-9 vote by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. That resolution _ introduced by Sens. Joseph Biden, D-Del., Carl Levin, D-Mich., and Chuck Hagel, R-Neb. _ states flatly that sending more troops into Iraq is "not in the national interest."

Any agreement on the two resolutions "should occur as a consequence of the will of the Senate, working in 'open' session," Warner wrote in a letter to Biden and other co-sponsors of the Democratic-driven resolution.

A full Senate vote could come as early as the week of Feb. 5, with debate beginning next week. The House is expected to follow with a vote on a similar measure.

Amid the maneuvering, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., led House members on a fact-finding trip to Iraq. And other Democrats attacked Vice President Dick Cheney for comments in a CNN interview Wednesday defending administration policy in Iraq.

"To have Vice President Cheney suggest that we have had a series of enormous successes in Iraq is delusional," said Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill.

As the Democratic-led Senate steams toward a vote on Iraq, Republicans crafted their own proposals in hopes of staving off GOP defections. Sens. John Cornyn, R-Texas, and Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., drafted separate resolutions that would voice support for the administration's Iraq policies.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said he is interested in drafting a resolution that would establish benchmarks by which the U.S. could measure the effectiveness of the troop increase.

Republican leaders, however, were unlikely to try to corral members behind a single position. Also, any agreement probably would look unfavorable for the White House because so many members have grown tired of the nearly four-year war.

David Satterfield, the State Department's senior adviser on Iraq, told a Senate panel Thursday that the increased security afforded by extra troops will make it easier to oversee rebuilding efforts in Iraq.

"We know there are no silver bullets, no guarantees regarding the question of Iraq. ... But the situation now in Iraq, and the stakes for the United States, the region and the international community, are extraordinary," Satterfield said.

Members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee responded that they were wary of pouring more money into rebuilding without a political settlement and improved security.

"I want you to know that I am not inclined to support any additional funding in this area without strong assurances that this sort of mismanagement has been alleviated," said Sen. Jim Webb, D-Va.

White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten said in an interview Thursday with National Public Radio that the administration does not expect Congress to cut the purse strings for the war. But he said the administration has some concern that the ill will that U.S. policy in Iraq has generated on Capitol Hill could hamper the ability for lawmakers to work with the White House on other issues.

"To some degree there will inevitably be some hangover of that issue into other areas, but that doesn't mean we shouldn't do the people's business," Bolten said.

US Senators Feel Weight Of Iraq Vote (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock
The Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2007
WASHINGTON

DOJ_NMG_0122414

Back in 1971, Vietnam veteran John Kerry gave a face to the antiwar movement with a single question in televised testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee: "How do you ask a man to be the last man to die for a mistake?"

This week, Senator Kerry reprised the argument before the same panel: "How many of you here at this table believe what's happening [in Iraq] is a mistake today?" he asked, as the Foreign Relations Committee took the first congressional step opposing the strategy in Iraq since lawmakers authorized the use of force in 2002.

In the end, 12 senators – all the Democrats on the panel plus one Republican, Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska – backed a non-binding resolution opposing President Bush's "new way forward" in Iraq. The vote came 16 hours after Mr. Bush appealed to lawmakers, in his State of the Union address, to give his plan to add 21,500 US troops to the forces fighting in Iraq "a chance to work."

As the resolution moves to the full Senate next week, it's clear that deep disagreements exist within each party over how best to express doubts about the Iraq war. The result is a vivid – and very public – grappling over the terms of their disagreement.

At issue is whether the new Democrat-controlled Congress should aim for the strongest resolution opposing the troop buildup, or the one most likely to draw the largest bipartisan vote.

Even Republican senators on the foreign relations panel who did not vote for the resolution expressed serious doubts about the way the president is waging the war. But these were not enough to overcome their worries that their words could have unintended consequences – from undermining US troops to further isolating a commander in chief determined to go his own way.

"The president is deeply invested in this plan, and the deployments opposed by the resolution have already begun," warned Sen. Richard Lugar (R) of Indiana, the committee's ranking Republican, before the vote on Wednesday. "This resolution will increase the divide between the executive and legislative branches that is already unacceptably wide," he added, cautioning his colleagues not to give in to frustration with a White House that has not listened to the Congress in the past.

Those concerns are at the center of intense negotiations, as senators grapple with how to find words that will bring enough Republicans on board to get the attention of the White House, but not send a message of defeat to the troops.

The White House and its supporters on Capitol Hill want to avoid any language that will undercut the troops or undermine the mission of Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, whom the Senate on Wednesday unanimously confirmed to command US and multinational forces in Iraq.

"The goal is to try to salvage this thing and not send additional troops over with a message of disapproval from the Congress," says Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona, who supports the president on sending more troops to Iraq.

In a first move toward achieving a bipartisan consensus, the resolution's supporters agreed to drop any reference to the president's "escalating" the war in Iraq. For many Republicans, it's a loaded term that both recalls the Vietnam quagmire and appears to give Congress a claim to "micromanage" the commander in chief. Sens. Joseph Biden (D) of Delaware, Carl Levin (D) of Michigan, Olympia Snowe (R) of Maine, and Hagel, cosponsors of the resolution, agreed to drop it.

"We can't have 535 commanders in chief, and if you think the US is doomed to fail, please remember that the enemy is listening," says Sen. Lindsey Graham (R) of South Carolina, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, who opposes the resolution.

In a sharp disagreement with Kerry, Sen. Jim Webb (D) of Virginia cautioned colleagues to avoid comparisons between the Iraq war and the Vietnam War. "We're losing the support of a lot of people who supported the Vietnam War and who have problems with this [war in Iraq] if we try to lump [them] together," he said.

In the Vietnam era, senators also struggled to maintain a distinction between opposing Vietnam War policy and opposing the US forces fighting it.

"The dean of the antiwar resolutions in Vietnam, [Idaho's Democratic] Sen. Frank Church, was constantly trying to make this distinction," says Julian Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University. In the congressional debate over the Iraq war, "there's a very similar rhetorical strategy now to that period," he adds.

In the next few days, sponsors of a second resolution opposing the new White House strategy on the war – especially the involvement of US forces in combating sectarian violence – will be trying to line up backers. "Our resolution does not provide a reduction of the US forces now or provide a timetable, but it calls on the president to consider all options," specifically along the lines of the Iraq Study Group recommendations, says Sen. John Warner (R) of Virginia, the top Republican on the Armed Services Committee.

After the vote of the Foreign Relations Committee, backers of the alternative resolution – Senator Warner and cosponsors Susan Collins (R) of Maine, Norm Coleman (R) of Minnesota, and Ben Nelson (D) of Nebraska – said they had five other Democratic cosponsors for it. Both resolutions could come to the floor as early as next Wednesday.

Some criticize the resolutions as soft-pedaling. "This is not a time for legislative nuancing," said Sen. Russ Feingold (D) of Wisconsin Wednesday. "This is a time to stop the needless deaths of American troops in Iraq."

Brownback Could Back Rival Resolution Against Troop Increase (MERCN)

By Sam Hananel

The San Jose Mercury News, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON - Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback said Thursday he would not support a resolution drafted by Democrats opposing President Bush's Iraq plan, but he could back a rival proposal that contains less partisan language.

Brownback, among the first Republican lawmakers to publicly break with the president over a troop increase in Iraq, said the resolution approved this week by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is too divisive.

"I think what we ought to be discussing now as these resolutions move forward is what we should support, not what we're opposed to, and what we can pull together on, not what we're divided on," Brownback said during a conference call with reporters.

The Senate panel on Wednesday passed a resolution that rejects Bush's plans to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq as "not in the national interest." The vote on the nonbinding measure was largely along party lines, though Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., joined Democrats in offering his support.

Brownback, who is running for the 2008 GOP presidential nomination, said he prefers a milder resolution drafted by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., that leaves open the possibility of Bush sending in a much smaller number of troops.

"I believe we've got to get to a political solution. We cannot impose a military solution," Brownback said. "I also believe we have to be united here to win over there. You can't have a war with one party supporting it and one party opposing it."

Several GOP Senators, including Susan Collins, R-Maine, Norm Coleman, R-Minn., and Ben Nelson, D-Neb., have backed Warner's resolution and other Republicans, like Brownback, say they might be willing to sign on as well.

Despite his opposition to the resolution, Brownback he remains against the idea of sending more troops to Iraq.

"The Iraqis need to do the patrolling in Iraq and we should be fighting terrorists and not becoming targets for terrorists," Brownback said. "I think sending more troops delays some of those requirements that we need to have."

Asked if he would vote against funding an increase in troops, Brownback said, "I'm not at that point."

He has called on the Bush administration to step up diplomatic efforts to quell the violence in Iraq. Ultimately, Brownback said he expects to see a "three-state, one country solution" for Iraq, where the nation is divided into Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish regions, with Baghdad as a federal city.

Pataki Breaks Ranks, Opposes Iraq Troop Proposal (AP)

By Mark Humbert,

AP, January 26, 2007

ALBANY - Former New York Gov. George Pataki, breaking ranks with President Bush and the front-runners for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, says he opposes the president's plan to send more than 20,000 additional American troops to Iraq.

Pataki's position, at odds with the support offered Bush by Sen. John McCain, former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, was made public Thursday as aides released excerpts of a speech the former governor was to deliver Friday at Georgetown University.

"A functioning democracy throughout Iraq is not essential to our achieving a military victory over al-Qaida in Iraq," said Pataki, who is eyeing a run for the 2008 nomination. "And I share the doubt of many that 20,000 additional troops alone will assure a successful democracy."

"Sending more American troops into Baghdad is unnecessary to achieve the core victory over al-Qaida in Iraq," he added. "A troop 'surge' is better suited as part of the effort to achieve a broader victory. But I oppose carrying out this surge unless the prospects for that broader victory are much greater than they appear today."

Pataki, whose eldest son is a Marine facing possible deployment to Iraq, said "before the United States government puts more troops in harm's way in Baghdad we must have confidence that the Maliki government will be an active partner in this effort."

Pataki spokesman David Catalfamo said the former governor wasn't ruling out possible future support for the Bush-backed initiative, but only if the Iraqi government proved it was getting control of the country and taking on more of the responsibility for security there.

"We must detail to the Iraqi government the terms under which we will continue to prop up its weak and struggling institutions," said Pataki. "If they want Americans to continue to die in defense of their government, if they want Americans to continue to pour tens of billions of dollars into their people's schools, services, and security, we can and must first demand action on their part."

While Pataki's comments appeared as a sharp departure from his past support of Bush on the Iraq war, the former governor began expressing reservations about the U.S.-Iraq policy after a November trip to the war zone when he said the Iraq government "is not delivering the security or the services that the people of Iraq need. That has to change and that has to change quickly."

The remarks released Thursday make it clear Pataki believes that had not happened.

"An oppressive majority can ignore the rule of law or use the power of government to deny opposition groups basic human rights," he said. "Unconstrained majorities can act in the interest of good or evil, or simply choose not to react to the evil of others. To a large extent, that has happened in Iraq."

Catalfamo said he did not expect Pataki to use the speech to announce his intentions about running for president. Pataki chose not to seek re-election last year after three terms as governor. National polls have shown Pataki trailing far behind McCain, Giuliani and Romney.

Feingold Pushes Plan To Cut Off War Funds (POL)

By John Bresnahan

The Politico, January 26, 2007

Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., has scheduled a hearing next Tuesday in his Judiciary Committee subcommittee to explore whether Congress has the authority to cut off funding for the U.S. military campaign in Iraq. The move comes as Congress prepares to vote on a congressional resolution opposing President Bush's escalation of the war.

Feingold, a fierce war critic, will force Democrats to consider an option many consider politically suicidal: denying funds to the military and U.S. soldiers to force a quicker end to the war. Democratic leaders have privately called on members to restrain from cutting off funding and focus on congressional resolutions condemning the Bush policy. The resolutions are nonbinding and therefore symbolic.

Republicans "would like this debate to be as whether or not we are going to be cutting off money for the troops," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid recently told The Politico. "The logical conclusion is that a lot of things can happen. But right now, the most important thing is to tell the president that what he has done with the escalation is wrong. And that's what we are doing, bi-partisanly."

Feingold, who chairs the Subcommittee on the Constitution, will question several witnesses, including a Library of Congress official and legal experts from Harvard, Duke, and the University of Virginia, on the issue. Senior Bush administration officials have publicly argued that Congress' has no such right, but Feingold plans to introduce legislation to force President Bush to American forces out of the troubled country.

"Congress holds the power of the purse and of the president continues to advance his failed Iraq policy, we have have the responsibility to use that power to safely redeploy our troops from Iraq," Feingold said in a statement released by his office on Thursday. "I will soon be introducing legislation to use the power of the purse to end what is clearly one of the greatest mistakes in the history of the nation's foreign policy."

Well at least we can all have a dialogue about all this.

Interesting that everyone went crazy at Hotspur's comments, even tho they're entitled to an opinion.

Obviously some people have not been around the last 6 years when Bush said -- about every single thing -- we're doing it my way and thats that. He definitely feels that he's king, and that the lord speaks to him personally, and thats fine. But not everyone subscribes to this ideology, and now some ideas are being bandied out. Man, everyone gets real freaked out when ideas are bandied about! Remember ideas?

No one wants "failure" in Iraq -- another buzzword bandied about ridiculously. What these congresspeople are doing is to try to steer the course towards something that WILL work.

As a last resort, if we all check our news sites, is that we can blast everyone with the new 'heat ray' and they'll all scatter.

I think its immaterial whether 70 or 7 percent are against the war. I think we should get out of Iraq. I imagine Bin Laden and al-Sadr feel the same way. Does that mean NOT getting out of Iraq is a better idea? No, it's worse. It's worse because it proven to be an endeavor that is not nearly worth the cost. I don't think we should have to sacrifice 3000 lives and tens of thousands maimed, AND almost 400 billion dollars....so that a country can have a democracy that did not develop organically withouth any lasting social or economic institutions held over from the previous regime. It doesn't matter that evil people want the same result that I do. No one will seriously doubt American power if we plan a stategic rereat (yes, RETREAT I have no problem with that word.)No one disputes America's unrivaled capability to execute a lightning fast, compeltely integrated (in terms of air, land, and sea), and surgically peformed invasion. No one will dispute that for a long time. The U.S is at least thirty years ahead of any country in terms of military capabilities. We have zero moral authority, it was exhausted with this fiasco. If we do pull out of Iraq, people will still think we can bomb the crap out of their country, and they'll think we can't occupy it, which is both true and something we shouldn't be doing anyway.

by ATLMerlinAF on 01.26.2007 at 12:09 AM

I think, instead of throwing personal attacks at the SENATOR (elected by his people), we need to consider the merit or lack of merit his proposition. The Senator is correct in his assertion that the Congress can allocate funding how it so chooses, especially as it pertains to the military [U.S. Constitution Article 1 Sections 7 and 8]. If we were to divulge into a Constitutional debate, there would be ?experts? for and against such an assertion but in the end, the Supreme Court will refuse to settle this dispute between the Executive and the Legislature, as it has done on no less than 3 occasions in the past. The core issue is: does this plan lack credibility, and I think it does. Why? Because by virtue of proposing this extreme to the President?s extreme of introducing more troops (humor me for a moment), the Congress is forced to fill in the gaps between the two extremes. At this juncture, the only true, enforceable alternative to President Bush?s plan is to withdraw funding but, I am almost certain that in order to avoid voting on a Fiengoldesque piece of legislation, members of Congress will be forced to develop more alternatives, which is a good thing. Who knows, maybe from the firestorm that will start because of the introduction of such a bill we may reach a happy medium and a true course in Iraq for the entire country to get on board with, which is, I think, how the framers would have envisioned such a quandary to play out. Ladies and gents, this is politics at its best. People are going say and do things that appease certain portions of the electorate so that they can maneuver themselves politically, especially as it pertains to their constituency. In politics, you can never take something at face value; as McNamara said about the Cuban Missile Crisis in the movie 13 days ?this is language to the likes of which the world has never seen. This is President Kennedy communicating [indirectly] to Premier Kruschev?. I would like to rephrase that as ?this is Cong

I hear a lot of comparasion of Iraq to WWII, but if we hadn't bombed everything and killed anything and everything the war would have lasted a lot longer. The insane and homo Hitler was one of our biggest allies and didn't even know it. He killed off so many of his brightest generals, tied their hands and wouldn't let the fight the way they needed to and couldn't properly supply them. If we hadn't been fighting their second stringers, replacement units and units recovering from the eastern front we might be speaking German or still fighting. Ever hear of the "Battle of the Bulge" again unable to supply his army. If we had to fight WWII the way were fighting in Iraq we would be speaking German. You cann't win a polically correct war in short order. And you cann't win with a bunch of cowardly "DEMOCRATS" running the show.

by Dexter on 01.26.2007 at 12:02 AM

If the same sort of polling technology that we have today were available in the late 1700s, we might still be British colonies. in the 1870s, the South might be their own nation.

The cold hard fact is that we are a Representative Republic. We are not a Democracy. The Founders were smart enough to realize that a Democracy is too unstable, in that the emotion of the public on any given day is too fluid. If the public on one day polled to got the troops out, and IF we were a democracy, then we might move the troops out. If on the next day we polled and found that the majority wanted the troops, do we move them back in?

The founders designed our government to be deliberate and slow to act. I government that can react quickly dissolves into a reactionary one, that gets nothing (or too much) done. The President is, by DESIGN, the sole Commander in Chief. The Founders wanted it this way, so that the people elect a person they trust to be the international REACTOR for the government for four years, who doesn't have to worry about the pulse of the Nation.

The Founders designed this Republic to operate as it is now. Who are we to argue with this design?

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

A recent Harris poll finds 29% of Americans feel the U.S. is losing in Iraq, compared with 10% who feel the U.S. is winning and 52% who said the U.S. is neither winning nor losing.

The poll, which was conducted Jan. 11 to 18, after President Bush proposed increasing troops in Iraq but before his State of the Union address, shows attitudes toward the president's handling of Iraq haven't budged since November: 70% of Americans said his handling of Iraq has been fair or poor over the last several months, compared with 26% who see it as good or excellent.

The online survey of 2,337 U.S. adults shows most Americans are also maintaining a negative outlook for the situation in Iraq: 61% said they aren't confident U.S. policies in Iraq will be successful, compared with 19% who have confidence in U.S. policies. Likewise, 55% say the situation for U.S. troops in Iraq is getting worse, compared with 13% who say it is getting better.

However, the poll indicates more Americans may be falling behind Mr. Bush's proposal to boost U.S. troops in Iraq: 27% of those polled said the U.S. should send more troops for a few months to stabilize the situation, up from 19% in November. Forty-four percent think a timetable should be set for the withdrawal of troops from Iraq, down from 51% in the previous poll, and 20% said the U.S. should withdraw all troops now.

When asked whether Mr. Bush appears to be listening to his generals on Iraq, 39% of respondents said they believe he is listening, but he isn't taking generals' advice and another 17% said he isn't listening to them at all; 19% think he is following their advice, while 25% aren't sure.

Here are full results of the poll: * * * "Overall, how would you rate the job President Bush has done in handling the issue of Iraq over the last several months?"

Methodology:

Harris Interactive conducted this online survey in the U.S., Jan.. 11-18, 2007, among a nationwide cross section of 2,337 adults. Figures for age, gender, race/ethnicity, education, income and region were weighted where necessary to align with population proportions. Propensity score weighting was also used to adjust for respondents' propensity to be online. In theory, with probability samples of this size, one can say with 95% certainty that the overall results have a sampling error of +/- 3 percentage points of what they would be if the entire U.S. adult population had been polled with complete accuracy. This online sample is not a probability sample.

Big Antiwar Rallies Set For L.A., D.C. And Other Cities Saturday (LAT)

By Adam Schreck And Valerie Reitman

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Emboldened by the Democratic takeover of Congress and shrinking public support for the Iraq war, antiwar groups are planning what they hope will be a massive protest Saturday on the National Mall.

Similar events are planned in dozens of cities around the United States, with some of the largest expected in Los Angeles and San Francisco. Organizers said they aim to put pressure on both the White House and Congress to end the war.

"The message will be 'Mr. President, bring our troops home,' " said Rep. Lynn Woolsey, D-Calif., one of several politicians, activists and actors scheduled to speak in Washington.

The Rev. Jesse Jackson, director of PUSH/Rainbow Coalition, one of the rally sponsors, is also scheduled to appear on the Mall, organizers said, as are Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich, D-Ohio, a longshot candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination, and actors Jane Fonda, Danny Glover, Susan Sarandon and Tim Robbins.

"We're predicting this will be one of the largest demonstrations since the war began," said Leslie Cagan, national coordinator for United for Peace and Justice, the umbrella group organizing the Washington protest.

About 300 busloads of protesters are traveling from more than 30 states to attend the rally, said United for Peace and Justice spokesman Hany Khalil.

Sgt. Scott Booker of the U.S. Park Police said organizers had initially requested a permit for 50,000 people on the Mall, but Khalil said Thursday that organizers are now expecting numbers to reach into the hundreds of thousands. When asked if he thought the revised estimate was realistic, Booker said, "It's quite possible."

The protests come at a time when polls show public support for Bush's Iraq policy and for the war itself are at all-time lows. A Times/Bloomberg poll last week found that 62 percent of those surveyed said the war was not worth fighting, and only one-third approved of the president's handling of the war. Three out of five respondents said they disapproved of Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 U.S. troops to Iraq, and about half said they wanted Congress to prevent the deployment.

Saturday's rally and march in Washington will be followed by a coordinated lobbying effort Monday to pressure lawmakers into supporting Senate and House resolutions against the deployment of additional troops to Iraq. Cagan said around 800 protesters are planning to speak with members of Congress.

Former Rep. Tom Andrews, D-Maine, national director of Win Without War, said the rally and appeal to lawmakers are part of the "most sophisticated and focused effort so far" against the war. Organizers are also calling on Congress to fully fund benefits for veterans and pay for reconstruction in Iraq.

"This is truly a movement," Andrews said. "We intend to step up and keep up pressure on Congress."

He added that plans by lawmakers to pass nonbinding resolutions against the war, such as one approved by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Wednesday, are not enough.

Schreck reported from Washington and Reitman from Los Angeles.

Antiwar Protesters Target Congress (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2007

When thousands of Iraq war protesters gather in Washington Saturday, their chants and amplified speeches are likely to be heard inside the secure grounds of the White House where the commander in chief has made his case for sending more troops into combat.

But the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue – the Capitol and the Democratic-led Congress – is where they most aim their message.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi is the main political target. War protesters want something tougher than nonbinding resolutions opposing the "surge" in additional US forces. Some want hearings on the controversial basis for the war itself, perhaps leading to the impeachment of President Bush.

It's not just the nation's capital, where busloads of people from at least 30 states are headed to make their voices heard.

Around the country, lawmakers' district offices are feeling the heat as well through Quakers' peaceful "vigils" and the occasional act of civil disobedience. In one recent case, the Episcopal bishop of northern California was arrested for blocking the door of the federal office building in San Francisco. And marches and rallies are planned in other cities, including Orlando, Fla., Seattle, San Diego, and Newark, N.J.

Major organizations are working to ensure that events do not include fringe groups and speakers, such as anarchists or socialists. Until recently, "people on the far left got control of the agenda and it became marginalized, even though the sentiment in the country increasingly became antiwar," says one organizer, who wished to remain anonymous. These days, such events feature labor union members, environmentalists, and especially active duty military people, says this source.

Organizers of the Washington event are anticipating between 300,000 and 500,000 people. Among Americans, 70 percent opposed a troop surge, according to a recent AP-Ipsos poll.

Movement organizers are careful not to indicate anything other than strong support for the troops.

"A big difference between the antiwar movement now and the one in Vietnam is that there has not been – even among the most radical of them – attacks on the troops themselves," says political scientist John Allen Williams of Loyola University Chicago. "That is absolutely crucial."

He turned against the war when he had to send his soldier son in Iraq proper body armor and night-vision equipment. "I got ticked off, and it snowballed," says Mr. Kahlor. "I started out as an upset parent trying to protect my son's unit and ended up spending hours every day writing letters and e-mails," he says, adding, "I'm just as ticked at the Democrats as the Republicans."

Nearly four years into the war, new antiwar recruits planning to travel to the rally in Washington include people like Judy Hess, who hasn't protested anything since she was in college during the Kent State shootings in 1970 when four Vietnam War protesters were killed by US National Guard troops.

"I was politically aware, politically interested, and always voted...." says Ms. Hess of Chula Vista, Calif. "But it was this war and how we got into it that really got me active."

Across the country, retiree Beverley Wiskow of Inverness, Fla., whose son-in-law has been serving in Iraq since July, will drive with three others to Washington for the protest rally and march.

"Congress clearly is not doing anything," she says. "The only hope for ending this is for the American people to say if you won't listen to us at the ballot box, perhaps you'll listen to us in the streets. I think our democracy is at stake."

Charlie Williams will leave his coffee shop in Daytona Beach, Fla., to drive north. "I think it's the moral thing to do, the right thing to do," he says. "I don't want my country getting involved in all this stuff."

These days, Phil Restino of Daytona Beach, Fla., has been spending most of his waking hours fielding calls from people in Florida and Georgia who are looking for rides to Washington or wanting to donate money.

"The phone has been ringing off the hook," says Mr. Restino, an Army veteran active with Veterans for Peace. "I haven't shaved in two days."

Eileen Fleming of Clermont, Fla., already has appointments with representatives of her two US Senators Mel Martinez (R) and Bill Nelson (D) in Washington. "We just have to hold [members of Congress] to the fire to do what we elected them to do, which is rise up and question this president, not just rubber-stamp everything."

Antiwar activities began earlier this week. A coalition of student, labor, church, and veterans' groups visited the offices of 17 US senators the morning after Mr. Bush's State of the Union address to Congress. Veterans for Peace formed up for a political assault in Washington beginning Thursday and scheduled to include a "grass-roots congressional education day" when lawmakers return to work Monday.

"The 109th Congress shirked their responsibility," says Michael McPearson, executive director of the veterans' group based in St. Louis. "The 110th Congress must stand up to the president. This is why they were elected."

Meanwhile, state legislators in half a dozen states are expected to introduce resolutions opposing what critics say is an "escalation" of US forces in Iraq.

But nonbinding resolutions don't satisfy many war opponents. Some activists want Speaker Pelosi to launch an investigation under congressional powers of impeachment.

"We're pressuring her to see if she'll let the Judiciary Committee do their work," says Norah Foster, co-chair of a San Francisco-area antiwar group that's also launched a "Pelosi Watch" to keep the spotlight on the new House speaker. "We feel that it's too important to wait; it's too serious."

"What's happening is, the left is trying to stiffen the resolve of the mainline Demo-crats," says Dr. Williams, who's also a retired naval reserve captain. The question for the political left on the eve of major demonstrations, he says, is "Do you want to be effective, or do you want to be cathartic?"

Groups Head To Capital To Step Up Antiwar Drive (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — Tens of thousands of demonstrators are set to arrive in the capital this weekend for a major antiwar march, staging the first of several protests intended to persuade the new Democratic-controlled Congress to do more than simply speak against President Bush's Iraq policy.

But do not look for senators to be standing among the protesters on the Mall on Saturday. Despite a consensus building around a Senate resolution to oppose sending more troops to Iraq, even the most liberal Democratic senators do not appear eager to align themselves with a traditional antiwar protest.

So the groups that are organizing the demonstrations against the president's strategy are also carrying out a sophisticated, well-financed lobbying campaign on Capitol Hill. Their behind-the-scenes efforts are intensifying, relying on tactics deployed in a cutthroat political race.

Americans Against Escalation in Iraq, a coalition of labor unions, MoveOn.org and other groups that have traditionally rallied against wars, has raised $1.5 million since it was formed two weeks ago. The group is singling out Republicans and Democrats who have spoken out against the war, but who have so far declined to pledge support for a resolution denouncing Mr. Bush's plan to increase the number of troops.

Next week, the group intends to fly Iraq veterans to the home states of Republican senators who serve on the Foreign Relations Committee and voted Wednesday against the resolution condemning the administration plan, including Senators Norm Coleman of Minnesota and John E. Sununu of New Hampshire. Television advertisements are scheduled to be shown in some of the same states in an effort to apply pressure before the Senate vote on the resolution in early February.

"The face of antiwar is not what it was in the '70s," said Jon Soltz, a veteran of the Iraq and Afghanistan wars who is the chairman of a group called VoteVets.

If members of Congress are slowly finding their voice opposing the administration's Iraq plan, aides to lawmakers say, it is in no small part because of the face-to-face lobbying campaign that is a central piece of the strategy employed by Americans Against Escalation in Iraq. The group plans to spend up to $9 million, said its spokesman, Brad Woodhouse, which they expect to raise through Internet solicitations and individual donations.

Mr. Soltz and nearly a dozen other veterans have been walking the halls of Congress, and they have had no problems getting appointments. One day last week, they held back-to-back meetings with Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, Democrats who are running for president in 2008.

"This battle to oppose the escalation is as important as the original battle in Iraq," said Jonathan Powers, who spent 14 months serving in Iraq as a captain with the First Armored Division. He laced up his beige combat boots and put on a blue suit as he went to Congress on a recent day of lobbying.

Senate leaders said Thursday that it appeared unlikely that any vote on an Iraq resolution would occur until the week of Feb. 5. Efforts to meld differing resolutions opposing the troop buildup faltered Thursday when Senators John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, and Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska, chose not to negotiate with those behind a competing plan approved by the Foreign Relations Committee.

Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., the Delaware Democrat who is the chairman of the panel, and his allies had offered to try to merge the resolutions, saying the differences could be overcome, clearing the way for a consensus measure.

But Mr. Warner has been reluctant to consider the idea of merging the two, a move that could bring a strong bipartisan vote against the president. In a written response to Mr. Biden, Senators Warner and Nelson said they would rather work out any disagreements on the floor "as a consequence of the will of the Senate."

In an interview on Thursday evening, Mr. Biden expressed disappointment that Mr. Warner did not agree to negotiate, but he added that a full-fledged debate on the Senate floor would be "healthy."

Mr. Coleman said he saw the Warner approach as less partisan than the plan offered by Mr. Biden and allies who included Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska.

"The Warner resolution, I think, offers an opportunity for a lot of us to express a concern about an aspect of the policy without taking a shot at the president," Mr. Coleman said.

The White House spokesman, Tony Snow, acknowledged the administration had been talking with Mr. Warner about his initiative. "We're trying to take his temperature on what he intends," Mr. Snow said.

Supporters of the president's policy were developing resolutions of their own. Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, said he would propose giving the Iraqis a series of benchmarks to demonstrate progress. A draft proposal from Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, declares that "the United States military leadership in Iraq should be given a reasonable chance to execute the new plan for Iraq."

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the majority leader, began trying to frame what could be a muddled procedural fight in the Senate by emphasizing that in the end, there is likely to be a bipartisan majority of senators going on record in opposition to Mr. Bush's approach in Iraq.

"For the first time in an intractable war," Mr. Reid said, "a bipartisan group of senators is going to tell the president that 'what you are doing is wrong."

But it remained an open question whether critics of the war would wait patiently for Democrats and Republicans to reach agreement.

DOJ_NMG_0122422

"The country has told us they don't like what's happening, and they want us to do something about it," said Representative Lynn Woolsey, a California Democrat who is one of four members of Congress (none of them senators) scheduled to attend the rally on Saturday. "Congress has yet to keep up with the public."

Americans Against Escalation in Iraq receives its organizational and financial muscle, at least in part, from the Service Employees International Union, the largest labor organization in the country, which wields significant influence in Democratic politics. For the first time, the union is speaking out against the plan to increase troops in Iraq.

"There was an election that showed clear consequences," said Andrew L. Stern, the president of the union. "It's incumbent on Democrats to express their disagreement with the president."

While Democrats have shown little reticence speaking against the president's plan, there is little agreement on the next step. Next week, Senator Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin, is convening a hearing to discuss the ways in which Congress can begin blocking the financing for the war, an idea that remains deeply controversial inside the party.

"It's a walk in the park right now to oppose the idea of this war. It's also very easy to oppose the escalation," Mr. Feingold said. "They are once again being too timid and too cautious."

USA Today, January 26, 2007

BAGHDAD — Iraq's prime minister vowed Thursday that his crackdown in Baghdad will leave militants nowhere to hide.

In a speech to the parliament that drew praise from the White House, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki urged politicians on all sides to support his new Baghdad security plan, backed by 17,000 additional U.S. troops who have begun arriving in the capital. President Bush has said Iraq's government must crack down on sectarian militias as a first step to reducing violence.

"There will be no safe haven — no school, no home, no (Sunni) mosque or Shiite mosque. They will all be raided if they are turned into a launch pad for terrorism, even the headquarters of political parties," al-Maliki said. He said his determination had already borne fruit. "I know that senior criminals have left Baghdad, others have fled the country," he said.

White House spokesman Tony Snow called al-Maliki's speech "a very assertive address. … We certainly welcome that, because it demonstrates the kind of vigor we've been talking about … and also responds specifically to concerns members of Congress have been expressing, in terms of the aims of and the determination of the government of Iraq."

Al-Maliki vowed to reverse the sectarian violence that has driven thousands from their homes. "We will detain every person who is living in the house of a displaced person in order to open the door for those displaced to return," he said.

The ensuing debate was contentious. Abdul-Nasser al-Janabi, a Sunni legislator and cleric, took the floor and accused the Shiite-dominated government of carrying out purges against Sunnis. Al-Maliki angrily denied the accusation and refused to shake hands with al-Janabi after the session.

Al-Maliki Promises A Safe Iraq (WT/AP)

By Bassem Mroue

The Washington Times, January 26, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki pledged in a speech to parliament yesterday that the militants who have made life intolerable in Baghdad would not be safe anywhere in Iraq in the face of a coming U.S.-Iraqi security sweep.

Mr. al-Maliki did not reveal the details of the plan, which he has dubbed "Operation Imposing Law," or say when it would begin. But he made clear that it would not be the last such battle against the militants.

"We are full of hope. We have no other choice but to use force and any place where we receive fire will not be safe even if it is a school, a mosque, a political party office or home," he said. "There will be no safe place in Iraq for terrorists."

As if to underline the urgency of the security drive, an extremist exploded a suicide bomb in the Shi'ite neighborhood of Karradah, killing at least 26 persons just hours after the prime minister spoke. In other violence, two rockets slammed into the Green Zone not far from the U.S. Embassy.

Meanwhile, the mayor of Baghdad's Sadr City said he reached agreement with political and religious groups to keep weapons off the streets of the heavily populated Shi'ite militia stronghold, and has presented the deal to U.S. and Iraqi government officials in an apparent attempt to avoid a crackdown on the area.

Rahim al-Darraji said Iraqi troops will be in charge of security in the sprawling district in eastern Baghdad. His comments come amid fears that Sadr City, the main headquarters of the Mahdi Army militia, could be a major target in the planned crackdown.

U.S. officials have indicated that the security operation, to which President Bush has pledged an additional 21,500 troops, should start in earnest about Feb. 1. A brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division already has arrived for the mission.

The prime minister vowed yesterday to go after those behind Baghdad's rampant violence regardless of their sectarian beliefs, promising at the same time to ensure the human rights of innocent Iraqis.

Past attempts to secure the capital have failed, and many critics said it was because Mr. al-Maliki intervened to protect members of the Mahdi Army militia that is run by one of his prime political backers, Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Cleric Abdul-Nasser al-Janabi yesterday accused the Shi'ite-dominated government of carrying out purges against Sunnis, the minority Islamic sect in Iraq.

"The firing of officers and civil servants under the pretext of de-Ba'athification should stop. What kind of national reconciliation are you talking about when you are implementing rules that marginalize" Sunnis, he asked.

"Stop sentencing innocent people to death because such sentences are politically motivated," Mr. al-Janabi implored, adding that Sunnis do not trust the government.

Mr. al-Maliki counterattacked by implying that Mr. al-Janabi was responsible for the kidnapping of 150 persons in Anbar province, the Sunni stronghold west of Baghdad.

"This brother will trust the Cabinet when I come forward with your file and show that you are responsible. There are 150 people detained in Buhayrat area, and you don't speak about them," Mr. al-Maliki snapped. Buhayrat is an insurgent stronghold in Anbar.

In his address, Mr. al-Maliki also called on lawmakers to enact laws on distribution of the country's oil wealth and reverse measures that have excluded many Sunnis from jobs and government positions because of Ba'ath Party membership.

Mr. al-Maliki also promised to stop the so-called practice of sectarian cleansing that has driven thousands from their homes.

"You should know that today or tomorrow we will detain every person who is living in the house of a displaced person in order to open the door for those displaced to return," Mr. al-Maliki said.

White House spokesman Tony Snow called the speech "a very assertive address. ... We certainly welcome that, because it demonstrates the kind of vigor we've been talking about and that the American people expect, and also responds specifically to concerns members of Congress have been expressing, in terms of the aims of and the determination of the government of Iraq."

After the car bombing, angry Karradah residents took to the streets chanting, "We want the Sunnis out." It was the second suicide bombing in three days in the neighborhood. The explosion destroyed three minivans, 11 cars and dozens of shops, as well as the local post office, a resident said.

Seven charred bodies were visible in one of the vans, including that of a woman who was half out a window in an apparent attempt to escape the inferno. Another women dressed in black was seen screaming in front of her son's shop, where he was killed. Ambulances raced from the scene, at least one with the back door still open and bodies stacked in the back.

A second huge explosion later rattled the capital, but police said it was a controlled blast to destroy a second car explosive that had been disabled before its suicide bomber could detonate it.

As the rockets fell and bombs exploded across the Tigris River, the public-address system inside the Green Zone compound could be heard warning in English that people should take cover because "this is not a drill."

Five persons were wounded in the rocket attack, none seriously. Mortar and rocket attacks hit the zone frequently, but reported casualties are rare.

Police yesterday reported 61 killed in sectarian violence nationwide, including the bodies of 22 torture victims dumped in Baghdad, and a parliamentary debate was suspended briefly after arguments broke out between Sunnis and Shi'ites over security.

Iraq Leader And Sunni Officials In Sectarian Clash On Security (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0122424

BAGHDAD, Jan. 25 — Iraq's Shiite prime minister and Sunni lawmakers hurled insults at one another during a raucous session of Parliament on Thursday, with the prime minister threatening a Sunni lawmaker with arrest and the Sunni speaker of Parliament threatening to quit.

The uproar revolved around the new Baghdad security plan, but it came as the prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, is under increasing pressure to demonstrate even-handedness. President Bush's new strategy for Iraq hinges in large measure on the Iraqi government's ability to rein in both Shiite and Sunni militants.

In Parliament on Thursday, Mr. Maliki focused his anger on Sunni lawmakers, accusing one of being involved in sectarian kidnappings. The confrontation erupted after Mr. Maliki described the outlines of the new Baghdad security plan and pledged there would be no "safe haven" for militants.

The leader of a powerful Sunni bloc, Abdul Nasir al-Janabi, provoked Mr. Maliki, saying over jeers from Shiite politicians, "We cannot trust the office of the prime minister."

His microphone was quickly shut off, and Mr. Maliki lashed into him, essentially accusing him of being one of the outlaws he had just said would not be granted sanctuary.

"I will show you," Mr. Maliki said, waving his finger in the air. "I will turn over the documents we have," implying that the legislator was guilty of crimes.

While the politicians battled in Parliament, the sectarian battle on the streets went on unabated, with 25 people killed by a suicide car bomb in a Shiite neighborhood in Baghdad.

It was the latest in a series of attacks directed at Shiites, claiming more than 200 lives in little more than a week and increasing pressure on Mr. Maliki to restrain his supporters from exacting revenge. Sunni leaders and critics of the administration's strategy remain deeply skeptical about Mr. Maliki's ability or desire to confront the Shiite militias, particularly the Mahdi Army of Moktada al-Sadr, one of his most important political backers.

American military officers say they have seen evidence in the past of the Maliki government using its influence with Iraq's security forces to further a sectarian agenda, turning a blind eye to Shiite militia death squads while cracking down on Sunni insurgents.

Mr. Maliki spent much of his speech before Parliament trying to counter that image, going further than he has before by promising to stop sectarian militias from driving rivals out of their neighborhoods and to return houses to their rightful owners. It is a daunting challenge given that the map of Baghdad has been almost completely redrawn along sectarian lines over the past year, displacing hundreds of thousands of people.

"Let it be known today or tomorrow, we will start arresting anybody who took by force the house of a displaced family," he said.

The prime minister's claims were challenged by Mr. Janabi, who leads the Sunni-dominated Tawafiq Party.

Mr. Janabi, over jeers from the Shiite politicians in the room, said that the government should suspend executions, which he said were being used for political purposes, and called for parliamentary oversight of the new security plan to be sure Sunnis were not unfairly singled out.

It was when he questioned Mr. Maliki's trustworthiness that the prime minister issued his vague threat to turn over incriminating information about Mr. Janabi. With that, the speaker of Parliament, Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, a Sunni, slammed his gavel down and condemned the prime minister and those who applauded him.

"That is unacceptable, Mr. Prime Minister," Mr. Mashhadani said over the tumult. "It is unacceptable, Mr. Prime Minister, to make such accusations against a lawmaker under the dome of Parliament."

But Mr. Maliki pressed on.

"What about the 150 people kidnapped near Al Bairaat?" he said, referring to an area by a lake south of Baghdad where Mr. Janabi has his base of support.

Mr. Janabi could not be reached for comment but another member of his party, Dhafer al-Ani, said Mr. Maliki was trying to "terrify" his opponents into silence. "If there are documents against him showing crimes, why were they not revealed until this session?" he said in an interview. "What kept him silent all this time?"

In the Parliament room, politicians shouted over one another trying to be heard. Mr. Mashhadani finally yelled for everyone to "shut up." He then used an ancient Arabic phrase, literally meaning to "put your stuff on the camel," which roughly translates as, "We expect more of this body." He said in disgust, "I cannot see how it is possible that a new security plan can work."

The session of Parliament was attended by nearly all members, a rarity in recent months, and was broadcast live on Iraqi national television.

The lawmakers had their shouting match while sitting beneath a banner with a phrase from the Koran that extols the importance of a civil debate in making good decisions.

DOJ_NMG_0122425

Shatha al-Mousawi, a lawmaker from the Mr. Maliki's leading Shiite bloc, the United Iraqi Alliance, said some politicians were simply grandstanding for the cameras. But she said the fighting continued after Mr. Mashhadani abruptly called an end to the session and the cameras were turned off.

Mr. Mashhadani demanded that the prime minister apologize to Mr. Janabi. Members of Mr. Maliki's party said Mr. Janabi was the one who should apologize, Ms. Mousawi said.

Mr. Mashhadani then threatened to quit.

"Someone said you do not need to quit, we will dismiss you," she said.

Mr. Mashhadani called a Shiite politician a "psychopath," as the bitter exchanges continued.

Eventually, though, the tensions eased and Parliament approved the security plan.

No sooner had they finished their business than three rockets exploded in the heavily fortified Green Zone, where Parliament is housed. Lou Fintor, a spokesman for the United States Embassy, said that no one was killed in the attacks.

Um Mohammed, a woman who lives across the street from the site of the bombing, said she saw two buses full of people burn with the passengers trapped inside, dying agonizing deaths.

The attack occurred as people were leaving work, the streets crowded with traffic and local clothes stores packed with customers.

Her neighbor had just sent her 9-year-old boy, Amar Ali Habib, out to play with friends, she said.

"He took his ball and left the house."

Moments later, he was dead. The explosion was so powerful, she said, that pieces of one man's body were blown about 50 yards from where the car detonated.

Afterward, she said, many young men took to the streets. Some called for vengeance against Sunnis while others condemned the government for failing to do anything.

Looking At The Surge From The Other Side (WP)

By Gary Anderson

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

Policy Memo From the Planning Directorate, Mahdi Army:

We have completed a review of the new American surge strategy announced by their president. In analyzing possible courses of action, we must make two key assumptions:

First, it represents their administration's last chance to change course given the reported mood of the American public and their legislature. For us, this presents both opportunity and danger. We have to assume that we are the primary Shiite target of this plan. How we respond will largely determine how we position ourselves for operations after the Americans are gone.

Second, our Sunni adversaries will not be able to react in a coordinated manner; they are expected to remain divided in their actions and motivations.

Our first potential course of action would be to openly resist government and American efforts to gain control over Sadr City and other predominately Shiite neighborhoods. Potential advantage: Waging a stand-up battle could create such chaos and so many disturbing images of casualties -- American and Iraqi -- that the American public and Congress will demand an immediate withdrawal.

The disadvantages here are that such a battle would weaken us by causing attrition to our best fighters. We are just now recovering from the casualties that we sustained in the 2004 fighting with the occupiers. We must keep in mind (and be prepared for) the inevitable post-American battles with the Sunnis and the Badr Organization.

A second potential course of action is classic insurgent strategy: going to ground when confronted by enemy strength. The object here would be to lull the enemy into a false sense of security, perhaps enough for him to begin decreasing his strength early. Once the Americans have carried out a significant drawdown, we could openly challenge the government forces and attempt to push them out of our areas of influence. It is very likely this would have the effect of the Vietnamese Tet Offensive in convincing the Americans that nothing they do will work. It is also unlikely that their administration could get support for reinforcing Baghdad once they have begun to reduce troop levels.

Potential drawbacks:

First, there is always the chance that the Americans and the Maliki government will use this period to significantly increase the capability of the security forces and actually gain public support through increasing public service and employment, rendering us far less useful to Maliki. Given their performance to date, this is a remote possibility, but it cannot be totally discounted.

More likely is that some of our more enthusiastic fighters will resist on their own authority. Given the decentralized nature of our command-and-control system, this possibility must be considered. One solution would be to create training camps outside of Baghdad where we could hone their skills for urban combat (necessary if we are to succeed in the future). This would keep them occupied and out of the way.

A third course would be to avoid challenging the Americans and government forces directly but continue to attack them with IEDs and snipers. There will be many more American targets on the street, and a continuing stream of casualties would further undermine American public support. This has the advantage of keeping our fingerprints off such operations because the Sunnis will probably do this regardless of what we do. This also conserves our combat power. It shares the potential disadvantage that the American "hearts and minds" strategy may actually work and that the security forces will increase in capability. Again, we think this is unlikely.

Consequently, this final course seems to be the one most likely to serve our long-term interests by preserving our capabilities and allowing the Sunnis to bear the brunt and take the blame for most anti-government action. Clearly, America's time here is limited. Hurrying its exit at the cost of weakening our position does not make sense. We have been patient for a thousand years; another year or so is nothing.

If God wills it, we will be successful.

Inside The Ring (WT)

By Bill Gertz And Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 26, 2007

Vague rules

Defense officials tell us one of the rules of engagement for U.S. combat troops in Iraq is vague and written by lawyers with little or no battle experience. The result is that troops are at risk of getting killed in action because of military lawyers' penchant for ambiguity.

One troubling rule that is among several printed on the card given to troops going into combat is "use minimum force necessary to decisively eliminate the threat." It is viewed by many in the military as ambiguous and confusing.

"Does it mean you are obligated to wrestle with a threat rather than shoot him or her?" one defense official asked. "That is how a lot of police officers lose their lives each year, as the criminal gains control of the police officer's firearm. How about approaching and/or wrestling a threat who, it turns out, is a homicide bomber?"

Bottom line: There is no way in law to define "minimum deadly force," the official said.

It is not known whether the imprecise rules directly led to the deaths in action of U.S. troops in Iraq, but some say it is likely because the rules are overly cautious and vague, an apparent outgrowth of destructive political correctness applied to war.

"A major part of the problem is that military commanders have surrendered their responsibility for ROE [rules of engagement] preparation and approval to lawyers lacking the knowledge, training and experience to prepare ROE. Unsure of themselves, they err to caution and ambiguity," the official said.

Said a second official: "Only someone who hasn't been in a close gunfight could find that a reasonable set of ROE."

And a third official said of the "minimum" requirement: "Interesting. Someone did not take the Napoleon Orders class" — a reference to making sure that orders issued to troops are clear.

We're told that one of the first things Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the next commander of forces in Iraq, needs to do is demand an overhaul of the rules of engagement by line officers, not lawyers, so that ambiguities will be eliminated and lives saved.

A spokesman for Multinational Forces-Iraq could not be reached for comment.

Petraeus prediction

Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, asked Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the incoming commander in Iraq, what happens if the United States leaves Iraq.

"There is the very real possibility of involvement of countries from elsewhere in the region, around Iraq, entering Iraq to take sides with one or the other groups," Gen. Petraeus said at his Senate Armed Services confirmation hearing this week. "There is the possibility, certainly, of an international terrorist organization truly getting a grip on some substantial piece of Iraq. There is the possibility of problems in the global economy, should in fact this cause a disruption to the flow of oil — and a number of other potential outcomes, none of which are positive."

World government

DOJ_NMG_0122427

House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Tom Lantos, California Democrat, announced his committee's organization this way: "Members formed subcommittees with jurisdictions spanning the Earth and covering a range of the most pressing global challenges."

Korea, not Vietnam

Sen. James H. Webb Jr., Virginia Democrat and decorated war hero, gave the Democrats' response to President Bush's State of the Union address, and likened Iraq to the 1950-53 Korean War.

Mr. Webb said, "As I look at Iraq, I recall the words of former general and soon-to-be President Dwight Eisenhower during the dark days of the Korean War, which had fallen into a bloody stalemate. 'When comes the end?' asked the general who had commanded our forces in Europe during World War II. And as soon as he became president, he brought the Korean War to an end."

We think that is an apt comparison, but probably not for the same reason as Mr. Webb's.

Like Iraq, the U.S. war in Korea was dogged by poor planning, the wrong types of troops, failed tactics and major miscalculations, such as China coming to the communist north's defense. The American death toll: 36,000 in theater.

But in the end, America won. The north's invasion was reversed and the south was preserved. It matured into one of the world's great democracies, free markets and U.S. allies. And a free South Korea helped blunt Josef Stalin's plan for a communist Asia. What some have called the "forgotten war" was messy and unpopular. It drove Harry S. Truman from office. But it made the world a better place. It just took 30 years to realize it.

Moving on

Word in the Pentagon is that Eric Ruff, press secretary to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, will leave the building later this year.

Mr. Ruff had worked as a special assistant for more than two years in May when Mr. Rumsfeld named him press secretary. Mr. Rumsfeld left office in December, succeeded by Robert M. Gates.

Mr. Ruff forged a close working relationship with Mr. Rumsfeld, advising him on communication strategy.

He is generally liked by the Pentagon press corps, which finds him accessible and responsive.

Mr. Ruff has served in a number of government public affairs jobs, including press secretary to Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, and Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, Texas Republican.

The un-Rumsfeld

Our colleague David Sands traveled with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates last week. He filed this report:

Mr. Gates made a quickie post-confirmation trip to Baghdad last month. But Secretary Gates' seven-country, five-day, 13-flight swing through Western Europe, Central Asia and the Middle East last week was the real shakedown cruise for the secretary, his generals and admirals, his schedulers, his staff and the Pentagon press corps. All were still recovering from six years of verbal and policy jousts with former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

The new boss relies on notes from index cards in his public remarks, using few of the colorful metaphors or eloquent hand gestures favored by his predecessor. For journalists, the good news is that low-key, soft-spoken Mr. Gates rarely challenges the premises of their questions, another favorite Rumsfeld tactic. The bad news is that he answers only as much of the question as he wants.

Mr. Gates did let slip a few personal insights on the trip. His long years in the CIA served him well, as he could recall previous visits to virtually every stop on the tour. He even reminisced with Romanian journalists in Iraq about his 1975 trip there.

He frankly acknowledged the "risk" to his reputation in leaving a job he dearly loved as president of Texas A&M University to head the Pentagon in the depths of the Iraq war. But he added, "I think if you put your personal interests — including protecting your reputation — ahead of a sense of duty, you've got your values screwed up."

And the Pentagon chief strongly hinted that his future fact-finding missions will feature either fewer stops or more days.

"I've found at least one fact," he said in Iraq on the trip's final full day. "I'm too old to do seven countries in 5½ days."

Suicide Car Bombing Kills 26 In Baghdad (AP)

By Bassem Mroue

AP, January 26, 2007

Iraq's prime minister insisted Thursday there will be "no safe place in Iraq for terrorists," hours before a suicide car bombing killed at least 26 people in the Shiite neighborhood of Karradah and two rockets slammed into the heavy fortified Green Zone not far from the U.S. Embassy.

DOJ_NMG_0122428

Angry Karradah residents took to the streets chanting "We want the Sunnis out!" after the blast, the second suicide bombing in three days in the neighborhood. The explosion destroyed three minivans, 11 cars and dozens of shops, as well as the local post office, according to a resident.

Seven charred bodies were visible in one of the vans, including that of a woman who was half out a window in an apparent attempt to escape the inferno. Another women dressed in black was seen screaming in front of her son's shop, where he was killed. Ambulances raced from the scene, at least one with the back door still open and bodies stacked in the back.

A second huge explosion later rattled the capital, but police said it was a controlled blast to destroy a second car explosive that had been disabled before its suicide bomber could detonate it.

As the rockets fell and bombs exploded across the Tigris River, the public address system inside the Green Zone compound could be heard warning in English that people should take cover because "this is not a drill."

Five people were wounded in the rocket attack, none seriously. Mortar and rocket attacks hit the zone frequently but reported casualties are rare.

The attacks came on a day that police reported 61 killed in sectarian violence nationwide, including the bodies of 22 torture victims dumped in Baghdad, and a parliamentary debate was suspended briefly after arguments broke out between Sunnis and Shiites over security.

Parliament held yet another raucous session, this time witnessing a heated exchange between Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and Sunni legislator and cleric Abdul-Nasser al-Janabi, who accused the Shiite-dominated government of carrying out purges against Sunnis, the minority sect in Iraq.

The prime minister was seeking support for his and President Bush's plan to crush sectarian violence in Baghdad.

Al-Maliki gave no details for the plan, which he named "Operation Imposing Law," nor did he say when it would begin. U.S. officials have indicated the security operation, to which Bush has pledged an additional 21,500 American soldiers, should start in earnest about Feb. 1. A brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division already has arrived for the mission.

The prime minister vowed to go after those behind Baghdad's rampant violence no matter where they try to hide and regardless of sectarian beliefs, promising at the same time to ensure the human rights of innocent Iraqis.

"We are full of hope. We have no other choice but to use force and any place where we receive fire will not be safe even if it is a school, a mosque, a political party office or home," he said. "There will be no safe place in Iraq for terrorists."

But al-Janabi took the floor and said al-Maliki's government had gratuitously and summarily fired former members of Saddam Hussein's ousted Baath party from government jobs, sentenced people to death for political reasons and detained without reason Sunni pilgrims returning from the hajj in Saudi Arabia this month.

He also accused al-Maliki of running a sham program to reconcile Sunni-Shiite differences that have produced a near-civil war in Baghdad and prompted the new security drive _ the third since al-Maliki took office May 25.

"The firing of officers and civil servants under the pretext of de-Baathification should stop. What kind of national reconciliation are you talking about when you are implementing rules that marginalize" Sunnis, he asked.

"Stop sentencing innocent people to death because such sentences are politically motivated," al-Janabi implored, adding that Sunnis do not trust the government.

Al-Maliki counterattacked by implying al-Janabi was responsible for the kidnapping of 150 people in Anbar province, the Sunni stronghold west of Baghdad.

"This brother will trust the Cabinet when I come forward with your file and show that you are responsible. There are 150 people detained in Buhayrat area and you don't speak about them," al-Maliki snapped. Buhayrat is an insurgent stronghold in Anbar.

Legislators believed to be Shiites applauded the remark.

Parliament speaker Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, a Sunni, then organized a short suspension of the debate, called a vote on the security plan _ which was approved unanimously _ and continued with normal business.

Al-Maliki refused to shake hands when al-Janabi approached him after the session.

Angry and insulting exchanges have become normal in Iraq's 275-member parliament, but the involvement of the nation's leader heightened the tension.

Parliamentary sessions previously were broadcast live, but the government has since ordered them to be aired with a 30-minute delay to allow editing.

During Thursday's session, state-run Iraqiya television stopped airing the session shortly after the exchange and later aired an edited version.

In his address al-Maliki also called on lawmakers to pass laws on distribution of the country's oil wealth and reverse measures that have excluded many Sunnis from jobs and government positions because of Baath party membership.

Al-Maliki also promised to stop the so-called practice of sectarian cleansing that has driven thousands from their homes.

"You should know that today or tomorrow we will detain every person who is living in the house of a displaced person in order to open the door for those displaced to return," al-Maliki said.

White House spokesman Tony Snow called the speech "a very assertive address. ... We certainly welcome that, because it demonstrates the kind of vigor we've been talking about and that the American people expect, and also responds specifically to concerns members of Congress have been expressing, in terms of the aims of and the determination of the government of Iraq."

Until Monday, parliament had not had a quorum since late November, when 30 legislators and five Cabinet members loyal to renegade Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr announced a boycott of the government and the National Assembly to protest al-Maliki's meeting with Bush in Jordan.

The boycott was a blow to al-Maliki, who owes his job to support from the Sadr bloc in parliament.

On Sunday the Sadr legislators ended their walkout under threat that they would be ousted from the political process and that their allied militia, the Mahdi Army, could face wholesale attack by American soldiers in the coming security sweep.

At Least 24 Killed In Car Bombings In Baghdad (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 25 -- Two car bombs detonated in a busy commercial area of central Baghdad on Thursday afternoon, killing at least 24 people and injuring dozens more, Iraqi officials said.

The bombs were placed in Karrada, a predominantly Shiite Muslim sector of the city, and wounded at least 60 people when detonated, according to a spokesman for the Iraqi Interior Ministry. A set of car bombs killed at least 79 people in a Shiite market in central Baghdad on Monday.

The Karrada explosions occurred shortly after at least two rockets struck the U.S. Embassy compound in the fortified Green Zone. The rockets injured six people, one of them seriously, the U.S. military said in a statement.

U.S. Embassy spokesman Lou Fintor said the rounds landed inside the compound shortly after 4 p.m.

"The damage was minor, and the embassy is functioning normally," Fintor said. "It wasn't a densely populated area." He said that no U.S. citizens were injured and that none of the injuries was life-threatening.

Also Thursday, a soldier from the U.S.-led coalition was killed northwest of Baghdad when a roadside bomb exploded near his vehicle, the military said in a statement. The soldier's identity was withheld pending notification of next of kin.

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki asked lawmakers Thursday to embrace his security plan for the capital, which he said would target militants aggressively regardless of sect.

"Some people are saying that it targets the Shiites, and others say that it targets Sunnis," Maliki said. "While I say that it targets everyone."

Maliki offered few details of the initiative. While acknowledging the support of U.S. forces, he said the security plan is being driven by the Iraqi government. "This is a 100 percent Iraqi plan and under Iraqi command," he said, adding that the American military's role is "just to provide backup."

Reporters who have accompanied U.S. and Iraqi forces on joint missions in recent months have described American forces as taking control of the operations. Several U.S. soldiers have told reporters they don't trust the ability, competence or commitment of their Iraqi counterparts.

Maliki, a Shiite, has faced questions at home and abroad about his ability and willingness to enforce the law uniformly amid unrelenting sectarian violence in a country with a weak criminal justice system. He urged lawmakers during his speech to help him keep sectarian tensions from hindering the security plan.

But Thursday's session showed the extent to which sectarian tensions influence the political process. Abdul Nasser al-Janabi, a Sunni Muslim legislator who belongs to a bloc that wants U.S. troops to leave and has criticized Maliki for favoring Shiites, lashed out at the prime minister and criticized his security plan.

An exasperated Maliki appeared to threaten Janabi: "This brother will trust the prime ministry when I bring your file forward and hold you responsible." He did not elaborate.

Numerous other violent acts were reported in the capital and elsewhere Thursday.

A suicide bomber on a motorcycle slammed into a market in central Baghdad, killing eight people and injuring 18, according to a spokesman at the Interior Ministry. At least seven people were killed by improvised explosive devices elsewhere in the city.

Insurgents Post Video Of Downed Copter (AP)

By Maamoun Youssef

AP, January 26, 2007

An insurgent group that has claimed responsibility for the downing this week of a U.S. helicopter in Baghdad that killed five Americans posted a video Thursday on an Islamic Web site showing the wreckage and two bodies.

The 1-minute, 14-second video carried the logo of the 1920 Revolution Brigades, a known Sunni militant group. It showed wreckage of a helicopter with bricks scattered around it. The naked bodies of two men, one with gray hair and the other with dark hair, were seen near the wreckage.

"Our heroes were able to shoot the film of the helicopter wreckage after they downed it over a roof of a house of a citizen," said a statement from the group.

Iraqi and U.S. officials said earlier that four of the five Americans who died in the downing of a U.S. security company's helicopter in a dangerous Sunni neighborhood in central Baghdad on Tuesday were shot in the head execution-style _ though it was unclear if they were alive when shot.

The two bodies shown in the video had no visible gunshot wounds to the head or any other visible wounds. The dark-haired man's hair was tangled and matted but it was difficult to see from the footage if it was blood or dirt.

Another militant group, Ansar al-Sunnah Army, which also has claimed responsibility for downing the helicopter, said in a statement posted Wednesday on an Islamic Web site that its fighters "rushed toward the crash of the helicopter while under fire from a second (U.S.) helicopter and killed three U.S. soldiers."

The authenticity of the two statements could not be verified.

The helicopter, owned by Blackwater USA, swooped into electrical wires and crashed after racing to help a U.S. Embassy ground convoy that had come under fire in the Sunni neighborhood. U.S. officials said it was not clear if gunfire brought down the aircraft or caused its pilot to veer into the wires during evasive maneuvers.

A second helicopter also was hit but there were no casualties among its crew, a Washington official said.

The Ansar al-Sunnah Army posted with its statement an ID card it claimed was from a man who was on the helicopter. The card bore the name of Arthur Laguna, later identified by his mother as among those killed. Laguna was a 52-year-old pilot for Blackwater, which provides security for State Department officials in Iraq, trains military units from around the world, and works for corporate clients.

The crash of Blackwater's small surveillance helicopter was the second in a week associated with the U.S. war effort in Iraq.

A U.S. Army Black Hawk helicopter went down Saturday northeast of Baghdad, killing all 12 service members on board, including two colonels, one lieutenant colonel and two command sergeants major. It was the largest number of key officers and sergeants killed in a single incident since the Iraq war started nearly four years ago.

Iraq's Violence Tests Limits Of Humanitarians' Resolve (USAT)

By Emily Bazar

USA Today, January 26, 2007

The slaying last week of an American working for a democracy-building project in Iraq is just the latest in a series of attacks testing the resolve of relief groups and other international organizations working there.

Since 2003, at least 82 Iraqi and international aid workers have been killed, 80 kidnapped and 245 wounded in Iraq, says Kasra Mofarah of the NGO Coordination Committee in Iraq, which assists non-governmental organizations (NGOs) such as charities and relief groups.

Those figures do not include attacks on staff members with democracy-building groups such as the Washington-based National Democratic Institute. Last week, institute staffer Andrea Parhamovich, 28, was killed when her convoy was ambushed in Baghdad.

As the violence gets worse, groups that aim to help rebuild Iraq and provide medical and other services are pulling out or relocating to less violent parts of the country, even as the need for their assistance has grown.

"The bigger organizations have made a decision to pull out," usually after a staffer has died, says Samuel Worthington, president of InterAction, an alliance of about 165 humanitarian organizations. "We have the world's largest unfolding humanitarian disaster … and our ability to function on the ground compared to the size of the disaster is completely out of sync."

Typically, 40 to 50 InterAction groups respond to a crisis, he says. There are fewer than 10 in Iraq.

Mofarah says there are about 80 international aid groups still active in Iraq. There were 300 in 2003.

Most humanitarian organizations have moved their non-Iraqi staff members to safer locations, such as northern Iraq or Jordan, says Greg Hansen, a consultant to the Feinstein International Center at Tufts University. The organizations maintain a low profile, he says: They don't display their logos, they work out of homes instead of offices, and they avoid coordinating with other groups to keep their actions quiet.

As dangerous as the situation is, some groups avoid seeking protection from soldiers or armed guards because they don't want to be seen as taking sides or be mistaken for government or military personnel, Hansen says.

Les Campbell, the National Democratic Institute's regional director for the Middle East, declined to say how many people the institute has in Iraq or where they are, except that they work outside the high-security Green Zone in Baghdad.

The group, which trains locals in democratic political processes, has been soul-searching since Parhamovich's death. "We're going to try to assess whether or not we can still make a difference," he says.

The Los Angeles-based humanitarian group Relief International pulled its non-Iraqi staff out in mid-2004, says program manager Lindsay Mathieson. The Iraqi staff that remains works in less dangerous parts of the country

In some cases, projects are delayed by violence and instability.

"In an ideal world, we would be working in the more dangerous places because there's such a significant need," she says. "But there is a line you can't cross. You need to take care of your staff."

Christian Peacemaker Teams, a group based in Chicago and Toronto that promotes human rights in war zones, has been in Iraq since October 2002, before the invasion.

In November 2005, four members were kidnapped. American Tom Fox was killed; the other three were released in March 2006. Many of the Iraqis who had worked with the group have left the country or gone into hiding, co-director Doug Pritchard says.

The group pulled out in April 2006 but returned in July. It is limiting its activities to safer areas of northern Iraq, Pritchard says.

"It's certainly gotten worse and worse," he says. "If anything, it makes us more determined to work with Iraqis who are still willing to face this and hold out hope of a better society."

Troops Authorized To Kill Iranian Operatives In Iraq (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

The Bush administration has authorized the U.S. military to kill or capture Iranian operatives inside Iraq as part of an aggressive new strategy to weaken Tehran's influence across the Middle East and compel it to give up its nuclear program, according to government and counterterrorism officials with direct knowledge of the effort.

For more than a year, U.S. forces in Iraq have secretly detained dozens of suspected Iranian agents, holding them for three to four days at a time. The "catch and release" policy was designed to avoid escalating tensions with Iran and yet intimidate its emissaries. U.S. forces collected DNA samples from some of the Iranians without their knowledge, subjected others to retina scans, and fingerprinted and photographed all of them before letting them go.

Last summer, however, senior administration officials decided that a more confrontational approach was necessary, as Iran's regional influence grew and U.S. efforts to isolate Tehran appeared to be failing. The country's nuclear work was advancing, U.S. allies were resisting robust sanctions against the Tehran government, and Iran was aggravating sectarian violence in Iraq.

"There were no costs for the Iranians," said one senior administration official. "They are hurting our mission in Iraq, and we were bending over backwards not to fight back."

Three officials said that about 150 Iranian intelligence officers, plus members of Iran's Revolutionary Guard Command, are believed to be active inside Iraq at any given time. There is no evidence the Iranians have directly attacked U.S. troops in Iraq, intelligence officials said.

But, for three years, the Iranians have operated an embedding program there, offering operational training, intelligence and weaponry to several Shiite militias connected to the Iraqi government, to the insurgency and to the violence against Sunni factions. Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the director of the CIA, told the Senate recently that the amount of Iranian-supplied materiel used against U.S. troops in Iraq "has been quite striking."

"Iran seems to be conducting a foreign policy with a sense of dangerous triumphalism," Hayden said.

The new "kill or capture" program was authorized by President Bush in a meeting of his most senior advisers last fall, along with other measures meant to curtail Iranian influence from Kabul to Beirut and, ultimately, to shake Iran's commitment to its nuclear efforts. Tehran insists that its nuclear program is peaceful, but the United States and other nations say it is aimed at developing weapons.

The administration's plans contain five "theaters of interest," as one senior official put it, with military, intelligence, political and diplomatic strategies designed to target Iranian interests across the Middle East.

The White House has authorized a widening of what is known inside the intelligence community as the "Blue Game Matrix" -- a list of approved operations that can be carried out against the Iranian-backed Hezbollah in Lebanon. And U.S. officials are preparing international sanctions against Tehran for holding several dozen al-Qaeda fighters who fled across the Afghan border in late 2001. They plan more aggressive moves to disrupt Tehran's funding of the radical Palestinian group Hamas and to undermine Iranian interests among Shiites in western Afghanistan.

In Iraq, U.S. troops now have the authority to target any member of Iran's Revolutionary Guard, as well as officers of its intelligence services believed to be working with Iraqi militias. The policy does not extend to Iranian civilians or diplomats. Though U.S. forces are not known to have used lethal force against any Iranian to date, Bush administration officials have been urging top military commanders to exercise the authority.

The wide-ranging plan has several influential skeptics in the intelligence community, at the State Department and at the Defense Department who said that they worry it could push the growing conflict between Tehran and Washington into the center of a chaotic Iraq war.

Senior administration officials said the policy is based on the theory that Tehran will back down from its nuclear ambitions if the United States hits it hard in Iraq and elsewhere, creating a sense of vulnerability among Iranian leaders. But if Iran responds with escalation, it has the means to put U.S. citizens and national interests at greater risk in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere.

Officials said Hayden counseled the president and his advisers to consider a list of potential consequences, including the possibility that the Iranians might seek to retaliate by kidnapping or killing U.S. personnel in Iraq.

Two officials said that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, though a supporter of the strategy, is concerned about the potential for errors, as well as the ramifications of a military confrontation between U.S. and Iranian troops on the Iraqi battlefield.

In meetings with Bush's other senior advisers, officials said, Rice insisted that the defense secretary appoint a senior official to personally oversee the program to prevent it from expanding into a full-scale conflict. Rice got the oversight guarantees she sought, though it remains unclear whether senior Pentagon officials must approve targets on a case-by-case basis or whether the oversight is more general.

The departments of Defense and State referred all requests for comment on the Iran strategy to the National Security Council, which declined to address specific elements of the plan and would not comment on some intelligence matters.

But in response to questions about the "kill or capture" authorization, Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the NSC, said: "The president has made clear for some time that we will take the steps necessary to protect Americans on the ground in Iraq and disrupt activity that could lead to their harm. Our forces have standing authority, consistent with the mandate of the U.N. Security Council."

Officials said U.S. and British special forces in Iraq, which will work together in some operations, are developing the program's rules of engagement to define the exact circumstances for using force. In his last few weeks as the top commander in Iraq, Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. sought to help coordinate the program on the ground. One official said Casey had planned to designate Iran's Revolutionary Guard as a "hostile entity," a distinction within the military that would permit offensive action.

Casey's designated successor, Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, told Congress in writing this week that a top priority will be "countering the threats posed by Iranian and Syrian meddling in Iraq, and the continued mission of dismantling terrorist networks and killing or capturing those who refuse to support a unified, stable Iraq."

Advocates of the new policy -- some of whom are in the NSC, the vice president's office, the Pentagon and the State Department -- said that only direct and aggressive efforts can shatter Iran's growing influence. A less confident Iran, with fewer cards, may be more willing to cut the kind of deal the Bush administration is hoping for on its nuclear program. "The Iranians respond to the international community only when they are under pressure, not when they are feeling strong," one official said.

With aspects of the plan also targeting Iran's influence in Lebanon, Afghanistan and the Palestinian territories, the policy goes beyond the threats Bush issued earlier this month to "interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria" into Iraq. It also marks a departure from years past when diplomacy appeared to be the sole method of pressuring Iran to reverse course on its nuclear program.

R. Nicholas Burns, the undersecretary of state for political affairs, said in an interview in late October that the United States knows that Iran "is providing support to Hezbollah and Hamas and supporting insurgent groups in Iraq that have posed a problem for our military forces." He added: "In addition to the nuclear issue, Iran's support for terrorism is high up on our agenda."

Burns, the top Foreign Service officer in the State Department, has been leading diplomatic efforts to increase international pressure on the Iranians. Over several months, the administration made available five political appointees for interviews, to discuss limited aspects of the policy, on the condition that they not be identified.

Officials who spoke in more detail and without permission -- including senior officials, career analysts and policymakers -- said their standing with the White House would be at risk if they were quoted by name.

The decision to use lethal force against Iranians inside Iraq began taking shape last summer, when Israel was at war with Hezbollah in Lebanon. Officials said a group of senior Bush administration officials who regularly attend the highest-level counterterrorism meetings agreed that the conflict provided an opening to portray Iran as a nuclear-ambitious link between al-Qaeda, Hezbollah and the death squads in Iraq.

Among those involved in the discussions, beginning in August, were deputy national security adviser Elliott Abrams, NSC counterterrorism adviser Juan Zarate, the head of the CIA's counterterrorism center, representatives from the Pentagon and the vice president's office, and outgoing State Department counterterrorism chief Henry A. Crumpton.

At the time, Bush publicly emphasized diplomacy as his preferred path for dealing with Iran. Standing before the U.N. General Assembly in New York on Sept. 19, Bush spoke directly to the Iranian people: "We look to the day when you can live in freedom, and America and Iran can be good friends and close partners in the cause of peace."

Two weeks later, Crumpton flew from Washington to U.S. Central Command headquarters in Tampa for a meeting with Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. commander for the Middle East. A principal reason for the visit, according to two officials with direct knowledge of the discussion, was to press Abizaid to prepare for an aggressive campaign against Iranian intelligence and military operatives inside Iraq.

Information gleaned through the "catch and release" policy expanded what was once a limited intelligence community database on Iranians in Iraq. It also helped to avert a crisis between the United States and the Iraqi government over whether U.S. troops should be holding Iranians, several officials said, and dampened the possibility of Iranians directly targeting U.S. personnel in retaliation.

But senior officials saw it as too timid.

"We were making no traction" with "catch and release," a senior counterterrorism official said in a recent interview, explaining that it had failed to halt Iranian activities in Iraq or worry the Tehran leadership. "Our goal is to change the dynamic with the Iranians, to change the way the Iranians perceive us and perceive themselves. They need to understand that they cannot be a party to endangering U.S. soldiers' lives and American interests, as they have before. That is going to end."

A senior intelligence officer was more wary of the ambitions of the strategy.

"This has little to do with Iraq. It's all about pushing Iran's buttons. It is purely political," the official said. The official expressed similar views about other new efforts aimed at Iran, suggesting that the United States is escalating toward an unnecessary conflict to shift attention away from Iraq and to blame Iran for the United States' increasing inability to stanch the violence there.

But some officials within the Bush administration say that targeting Iran's Revolutionary Guard Command, and specifically a Guard unit known as the Quds Force, should be as much a priority as fighting al-Qaeda in Iraq. The Quds Force is considered by Western intelligence to be directed by Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, to support Iraqi militias, Hamas and Hezbollah.

In interviews, two senior administration officials separately compared the Tehran government to the Nazis and the Guard to the "SS." They also referred to Guard members as "terrorists." Such a formal designation could turn Iran's military into a target of what Bush calls a "war on terror," with its members potentially held as enemy combatants or in secret CIA detention.

Asked whether such a designation is imminent, Johndroe of the NSC said in a written response that the administration has "long been concerned about the activities of the IRGC and its components throughout the Middle East and beyond." He added: "The Iranian Revolutionary Guards Quds Force is a part of the Iranian state apparatus that supports and carries out these activities."

Tehran's Influence Grows As Iraqis See Advantages (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 25 -- When Fadhil Abbas determined that his mother's astigmatism required surgery, they did not consider treatment in his home town of Najaf, in southern Iraq. Instead they joined a four-taxi convoy of ailing Iraqis headed to Iran.

For more than two weeks last fall, Abbas, his sister and his mother were treated to free hotels, trips to the zoo and religious shrines, and his mother's $1,300 eye surgery at a hospital in Tehran, all courtesy of the offices of Moqtada al-Sadr, Iraq's ascendant Shiite Muslim cleric. Abbas returned to Najaf glowing over the technical prowess of Iran.

"When you look at this hospital, it is like something imaginary -- you wouldn't believe such a hospital like this exists," said Abbas, a 22-year-old college student. "Iran wants to help the patients in Iraq. Other countries don't want to let Iraqis in."

The increasingly common arrangement for sick or wounded Iraqis to receive treatment in Iran is just one strand in a burgeoning relationship between these two Persian Gulf countries. Thousands of Iranian pilgrims visit the Shiite holy cities in southern Iraq each year. Iran exports electricity and refined oil products to Iraq, and Iraqi vendors sell Iranian-made cars, air coolers, plastics and the black flags, decorated with colorful script, that Shiites are flying this week to celebrate the religious holiday of Ashura. But when President Bush and top U.S. officials speak of Iran's role in Iraq, their focus is more limited. U.S. officials accuse Iranian security forces, particularly the al-Quds Brigade of the Revolutionary Guards, of funneling sophisticated explosives to Iraqi guerrillas.

"We will not allow hegemony of a hostile regime to have power over this area," U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad said this week.

But changing the "behavior" of the Iranian government, as Khalilzad proposes, collides with Iran's expanding influence in Iraq, which is built on deep cultural ties as well as personal and business relationships developed during the years that many leading Iraqi Shiite politicians spent in exile in Iran.

Iran has dispatched 56 diplomats to staff its embassy in Baghdad and consulates in Basra and Karbala. It maintains informal liaison offices in the Kurdish cities of Sulaymaniyah and Irbil, the latter of which was raided Jan. 11 by U.S. troops, who arrested five Iranians. Each day, Iran provides 1,000 tons of cooking gas, about 20 percent of the Iraqi demand, and 2 million liters of kerosene. Iran exports electricity through Iraq's Diyala province and plans to quadruple the amount with new projects, Iraqi officials say.

Iran has also extended a $1 billion line of credit to Iraq to help fund reconstruction and rebuilding. When Iraqi President Jalal Talabani and his delegation of ministers visited Iran in November, he asked for more help and said Iraq "would like to expand our relations in every field with the Islamic Republic of Iran."

"The economic power between the two countries, it's enormous," said Hassan Kazemi Qomi, Iran's ambassador to Iraq. "We can help them in technical issues and engineering. We have a lot of experience in building roads and airports."

Qomi works inside a stone embassy in a compound with lush gardens and spear-wielding statuary just outside the fortified Green Zone, the seat of U.S. power in Iraq. When he speaks of the Americans, he calls them "the others."

"As for our policy, it's clear and it's going forward. We are happy with the Iraqi government," Qomi said at a recent news conference. "The kidnapping of our diplomats will have no effect at all on our help and cooperation with the Iraqi side. . . . We are only at the first stages of this support."

Qomi said the presence of American troops in Iraq "has increased the instability, increased the killing of innocent people and inflamed the sectarian violence."

"If we want to establish security in Iraq, the Iraqi government should take security into its own hands," he said. "Unfortunately, the others don't want that to happen."

Caught between the United States and Iran is Hoshyar Zebari, Iraq's foreign minister. "I'm treading a very thin line," he said last week over tea in his office. Zebari says he believes Iran wants a stable government in Iraq, along with the departure of U.S. troops, but is worried that a full-scale civil war could spill over Iraq's borders.

Iran supports the two largest Shiite political parties, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI) and the Dawa party of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, U.S. officials have said. But Iran also negotiates with Kurdish and Sunni politicians and sometimes bypasses the central government to forge agreements with Iraqi provinces, Zebari said.

"Historically that has been their attitude, to bet on every horse. And they have changed their support from one group to another," Zebari said.

Some analysts say the violence and instability in Iraq attract more Iranian involvement, not less, as Iran positions itself to be on the winning side of a sectarian war.

"The whole Gulf system is turned upside down, and everybody is trying to figure out how they situate themselves in it," said Ray Takeyh, an Iran expert at the Council on Foreign Relations, referring to traditional relationships in the Persian Gulf region. Iranian support is "part of the program of strengthening the Shia community to resist and expand its influence, and become a successful combatant in a civil war."

For the Iraqi government, it has been a frustrating strategy. "Instead of diversifying your support or aid to different groups, militias, political leaders, if you're sincere in your commitment to see this government succeed, why don't you give all this assistance and money and weapons and training directly to the government?" Zebari said.

Iran has driven a wedge between Iraq and the United States. Last month, when U.S. troops seized two Iranian officials inside the Baghdad compound of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the leader of SCIRI, the Iraqi government intervened and the United States freed them. After U.S. troops seized five more Iranian officials from the liaison office in Irbil, the Iraqi government again appealed for their release -- so far unsuccessfully -- saying the men worked in an approved office providing consular services.

In both cases, U.S. officials accused some of the Iranians of being operatives with the al-Quds Brigade, which the Americans say arms and trains terrorist groups outside Iran, including the Lebanese organization Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad, which is active in the Palestinian territories. Both the Iraqis and Iranians have asked the United States for proof of clandestine activities.

U.S. officials decided to escalate their tactics against Iran after public denunciations of Iran's alleged military activities, along with attempts to "harden" Iraq's security forces to repel Iranian influence, failed to produce satisfactory results, Khalilzad said. "We've come to the view that we need to do more than that, we need to go after their networks," he said.

During the rule of Saddam Hussein, who oppressed Iraq's Shiites and fought an eight-year war against Iran, Iraqi Shiite dissidents in exile, especially SCIRI and its armed wing, the Badr Brigade, found welcome help from Iranian security forces.

"We know what the relationship between SCIRI, Badr and the Iranian institutions were in those days. Now it's a different situation," Khalilzad said. The Iraqi government is no longer "an opposition movement in need of support from the security agencies of a neighboring state, so there is a need for adaptation in terms of what's appropriate in terms of a relationship."

Iraqi officials are sharply divided in their perceptions of Iran's intentions in Iraq. Hussein al-Falluji, a Sunni member of parliament, said Iranian influence exceeds that of the United States, but it is "hidden, and is heading toward targeting vital joints of the Iraqi state."

Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser, said, "Iran is networking aggressively inside Iraq in every aspect of life, including the security aspect."

Mariam Rayis, a foreign affairs adviser to Maliki, dismissed as paranoia U.S. assertions about Iran's "dark involvement" in Iraq. "These neighbors can help us for a while until we can have new construction here," she said. "We have noticed that there is moral support from Iran."

Iran Calls For Summit With Iraq, Syria (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst And Qassim Abdul-zahra

AP, January 26, 2007

Iran has invited the Iraqi and Syrian presidents to Tehran for a weekend summit with Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to hash out ways to cooperate in curbing the runaway violence that has taken Iraq to the verge of civil war and threatens to spread through the region, four key lawmakers told The Associated Press on Monday.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani has accepted the invitation and will fly to the Iranian capital Saturday, a close parliamentary associate said.

The Iranian diplomatic gambit appeared designed to upstage expected moves from Washington to include Syria and Iran in a wider regional effort to clamp off violence in Iraq, where more civilians have been killed in the first 20 days of November than in any other month since the AP began tallying the figures in April 2005.

The Iranian move was also a display of its increasingly muscular role in the Middle East, where it already has established deep influence over Syria and Lebanon.

"All three countries intend to hold a three-way summit among Iraq, Iran and Syria to discuss the security situation and the repercussions for stability of the region," said Ali al-Adeeb, a lawmaker of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's Dawa Party and a close aide to the prime minister.

Both Iran and Syria are seen as key players in Iraq. Syria is widely believed to have done little to stop foreign fighters and al-Qaida in Iraq recruits from crossing its border to join Sunni insurgents in Iraq. It also has provided refuge for many top members of Saddam Hussein's former leadership and political corps, which is thought to have organized arms and funding for the insurgents. The Sunni insurgency, since it sprang to life in late summer 2003, has been responsible for most of the U.S. deaths in Iraq.

Iran is deeply involved in training, funding and arming the two major Shiite militias in Iraq, where Tehran has deep historic ties to the current Shiite political leadership. Many Iraqi Shiites spent years in Iranian exile during Saddam's decades in power in Baghdad. One militia, the Badr Brigade, was trained in Iran by the Revolutionary Guard.

An Ahmadinejad spokesman said that Talibani's visit was scheduled several weeks ago for late November to work on improving bilateral relations. But Majid Yazdi told the AP that he had no information on a coming visit by the Syrian leader.

But Talabani confidants said the invitation was issued on Thursday by Iranian Ambassador Hassan Kazimi Qumi, who said Syrian President Bashar Assad also would be in Tehran for the talks with Ahmadinejad.

Rockefeller: Cheney Applied 'Constant' Pressure To Stall Investigation On Flawed Iraq Intelligence (MCT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

McClatchy Newspapers, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON - Vice President Dick Cheney exerted "constant" pressure on the Republican former chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee to stall an investigation into the Bush administration's use of flawed intelligence on Iraq, the panel's Democratic chairman charged Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0122436

In an interview with McClatchy Newspapers, Sen. Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia also accused President Bush of running an illegal program by ordering eavesdropping on Americans' international e-mails and telephone communications without court-issued warrants.

In the 45-minute interview, Rockefeller said that it was "not hearsay" that Cheney, a leading proponent of invading Iraq, pushed Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., to drag out the probe of the administration's use of prewar intelligence.

"It was just constant," Rockefeller said of Cheney's alleged interference. He added that he knew that the vice president attended regular policy meetings in which he conveyed White House directions to Republican staffers.

Republicans "just had to go along with the administration," he said.

In an e-mail response to Rockefeller's comments, Cheney's spokeswoman, Lea McBride, said: "The vice president believes Senator Roberts was a good chairman of the Intelligence Committee."

Roberts' chief of staff, Jackie Cottrell, blamed the Democrats for the investigation remaining incomplete more than two years after it began.

"Senator Rockefeller's allegations are patently untrue," she said in an e-mail statement. "The delays came from the Democrats' insistence that they expand the scope of the inquiry to make it a more political document going into the 2006 elections. Chairman Roberts did everything he could to accommodate their requests for further information without allowing them to distort the facts."

"I'm not aware of any effort by the vice president, his staff or anyone in the administration to influence the speed at which the committee did its work," said Bill Duhnke, who was Roberts' staff director.

Rockefeller's comments were among the most forceful he's made about why the committee failed to complete the inquiry under Roberts. Roberts chaired the intelligence committee from January 2003 until the Democrats took over Congress this month.

The panel released a report in July 2004 that lambasted the CIA and other U.S. intelligence agencies for erroneously concluding that Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein was concealing biological, chemical and nuclear warfare programs. It then began examining how senior Bush administration officials used faulty intelligence to justify the March 2003 invasion.

Robert promised to quickly complete what became known as the Phase II investigation. After more than two years, however, the panel published only two of five Phase II reports amid serious rifts between Republican and Democratic members and their staffs.

Rockefeller recalled that in November 2005, the then-minority Democrats employed a rarely used parliamentary procedure to force the Senate into a closed session to pressure Roberts to complete Phase II.

"That was the reason we closed the session. To force him" to complete the investigation, he said.

The most potentially controversial of the three Phase II reports being worked on will compare what Bush and his top lieutenants said publicly about Iraq's weapons programs and ties to terrorists with what was contained in top-secret intelligence reports.

In the two reports released in September, the panel said that the administration's claims of ties between Saddam and al-Qaida were false and found that administration officials distributed exaggerated and bogus claims provided by an Iraqi exile group with close ties to some senior administration officials.

Rockefeller said it was important to complete the Phase II inquiry.

"The looking backward creates tension, but it's necessary tension because the administration needs to be held accountable and the country . . . needs to know," he said.

Rockefeller said that he and the senior Republican member of the committee, Sen. Christopher Bond, R-Mo., have put the frictions behind them and agree that the committee should press the administration for documents it's withholding on its domestic eavesdropping program and detainee programs.

Under the eavesdropping program, the National Security Agency monitored Americans' international telephone calls and e-mails without court warrants if one party was a suspected member or supporter of al-Qaida or another terrorist group.

Rockefeller charged that Bush had violated the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which requires the government to obtain permission to eavesdrop on Americans from a secret national security court.

"For five years he's (Bush) has been operating an illegal program," he said, adding that the committee wants the administration to provide the classified documents that set out its legal argument that Bush has the power to wiretap Americans without warrants.

Rockefeller is among a handful of lawmakers who were kept briefed on the program after it started following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. But he told Cheney in a handwritten note in July 2003 that he was deeply concerned about its legality.

In the interview, Rockefeller said the committee needs more details about how the program worked before it considers amending the eavesdropping act to give the administration the flexibility it says it requires to be able to track terrorists.

"How do we draw something up if we have no idea about what the president sent out in the way of orders to the NSA? What about the interpretation of the Department of Justice?" he asked. "Americans . . . should want us to discern what the facts are, what the truth is."

G.I. Gets 18-Year Prison Term For Killing 2 Captive Iraqis (NYT)

By Paul Von Zielbauer

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

FORT CAMPBELL, Ky., Jan. 25 — An Army infantryman received an 18-year prison sentence on Thursday after pleading guilty to killing two unarmed Iraqis during an assault northwest of Baghdad last May.

The infantryman, Pfc. Corey R. Clagett, 22, of the Third Brigade, 101st Airborne Division, also pleaded guilty to trying to kill a third unarmed man detained in the raid, and to conspiracy and obstruction of justice.

Under the terms of a plea deal made with military prosecutors and approved by the division's commanding general, Private Clagett will be eligible for parole after roughly five years, his lawyers said.

Private Clagett is the third of four soldiers charged with premeditated murder in the case to plead guilty in exchange for a reduced sentence. His plea further strengthens prosecutors' case against the remaining soldier, Staff Sgt. Raymond L. Girouard, and increases the chances that Sergeant Girouard may also seek a plea arrangement to avoid conviction at trial, which would require a life sentence.

Sergeant Girouard, 24, the squad leader, is charged with creating a plan to free the three Iraqi men from their plastic handcuffs, have Private Clagett and another soldier shoot them as they fled and then cover up the crime by telling investigators the men had attacked the soldiers and tried to escape.

Military officials raised questions about the deaths after the bodies were removed and found to still have blindfolds and parts of plastic handcuffs on them.

In his plea, Private Clagett told the military judge, Col. Theodore Dixon, that he had conspired with Sergeant Girouard and Specialist William B. Hunsaker to kill the three men after blindfolding and handcuffing them with plastic "zip-tie" handcuffs.

"I cut the zip-ties loose, pulled the blindfold up on one of them, down on the other," he said, referring to two of the three Iraqi men. "Hunsaker told them to run. I told them to 'yallah,' meaning to run faster." He said he and Specialist Hunsaker had sprayed the men with rifle fire, killing two and gravely wounding the third.

Specialist Hunsaker pleaded guilty to murder charges on Jan. 11 and received an 18-year prison sentence. That same week, Specialist Juston R. Graber, the fourth soldier charged in the case, pleaded guilty to aggravated assault for shooting the wounded man after an Army medic had declared him to be beyond help.

Sergeant Girouard's trial is scheduled to begin March 5. If he does not end up pleading guilty, his lawyers said they would ask the judge to force the soldiers' brigade commander, Col. Michael D. Steele, to testify at his trial.

Several soldiers in Private Clagett's platoon have said in sworn statements that Colonel Steele told his men that they would be attacking a stronghold of Al Qaeda and ordered them to kill all men of military age they encountered during the raid.

Colonel Steele, in sworn testimony to Army investigators that has not been made public, said he had not given orders using those exact words, but had warned his soldiers to expect a fierce battle. He was reprimanded by an Army general last summer for issuing confusing rules of engagement that investigators said had contributed to the deaths of the three Iraqi men and a fourth man killed during the raid.

Private Clagett's civilian lawyer, Paul W. Bergrin, said his client was sorry for killing unarmed men but was steadfast in his belief that the men, had they lived, would have gone on to kill American soldiers.

"My client was 100 percent convinced at all times that the individuals that were killed were terrorists," Mr. Bergrin said outside the courtroom.

U.S. Soldier Sentenced To 18 Years After Pleading Guilty To Murder In Iraqi Detainees' Deaths (FINDLAW/AP)

By Beth Rucker, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 26, 2007

(AP) - FORT CAMPBELL, Kentucky-A 101st Airborne Division soldier was sentenced to 18 years in prison after pleading guilty Thursday to murdering an Iraqi detainee and taking part in the killings of two others, saying he went along with a plan to make it look like they were escaping.

Pfc. Corey R. Clagett, 22, was one of four soldiers from the division's 3rd Brigade "Rakkasans" who were accused in the detainees' deaths during a May 9 raid on the Muthana chemical complex in Samarra, about 60 miles (96 kilometers) north of Baghdad.

In an agreement with prosecutors, Clagett pleaded guilty to charges of murder, attempted murder, conspiracy to commit murder and conspiracy to obstruct justice. Prosecutors dropped a second obstruction charge and charges of disrespecting an officer and threatening.

Clagett will also be demoted to private and dishonorably discharged. If he does not cooperate with prosecutors, he could be sentenced to life in prison with a chance at parole.

The soldiers first told investigators they shot the detainees because they were attempting to flee - a story they now say they made up - and that commanders had given them orders to kill all military-age males on the mission.

Two of those soldiers, Spc. William B. Hunsaker and Spc. Juston R. Graber, have changed their stories and pleaded guilty. The squad leader, Staff Sgt. Raymond Girouard, is awaiting his court-martial.

"(Sgt. Girouard) said we were going to cut the zip ties loose and kill the detainees," Clagett told the military judge, Col. Theodore Dixon, on Thursday. "I knew it was an unlawful order. I just went along with it."

The judge asked Clagett what his intention was when he shot at the detainees.

"To kill them, your honor," Clagett said.

Prosecutors said Clagett fatally shot one detainee and seriously wounded another. Official say Graber then killed the wounded detainee, and Hunsaker killed the third.

Clagett's lawyer, Paul Bergrin, has insisted Clagett was following orders, but sought the plea agreement after Hunsaker, 24, told a military judge that Clagett helped him shoot the detainees.

"My client was 100 percent convinced at all times that the individuals that were killed were terrorists," Bergrin told reporters after the sentencing. "His heart is bleeding that he can no longer serve his country."

Military prosecutors would not discuss the case.

Hunsaker pleaded guilty to murder, attempted murder and obstruction of justice this month and was also sentenced to 18 years in prison.

Graber, 21, pleaded guilty to a lesser charge of aggravated assault with a dangerous weapon as part of his agreement to cooperate with prosecutors. He was sentenced to nine months in military jail.

Hunsaker testified that Girouard cut him on the face and arm to make it appear there was a struggle after he and Clagett killed the detainees. Clagett repeated that story to the judge Thursday.

"Just like anyone, we didn't want to get caught," Clagett said.

The case is one of two involving soldiers from the 101st Airborne Division accused of killing Iraqis during a deployment to the Middle Eastern country that ended in September.

Four other soldiers from the division's 2nd Brigade Combat Team are accused of raping and killing an Iraqi teenager and killing three others in her family last March. A former Army private also faces murder and rape charges in federal court for the same incident.

Salvadoran's Death In Iraq Leaves His Mother Fuming (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

SAN SALVADOR, Jan. 21 — From her hillside home in western El Salvador, Herminia Ramos sobbed and sobbed the other day as she recalled her fallen son.

In some ways, Ms. Ramos is like the thousands of other Salvadoran mothers who lost children in the 12-year civil war here that ended in 1992. But Ms. Ramos' grief is fresher than the rest, the result of a more recent conflict.

El Salvador is the only country in Latin America with troops in Iraq, a point of pride for President Antonio Saca, who is a gung-ho supporter of the Bush administration, but extremely unpopular among the war-weary population.

"Our army should be at home," said Ms. Ramos, 48, fuming against a war she said she did not know the first thing about until smartly dressed officers showed up at her home in 2004 to inform her that her son, Natividad, had become the first Salvadoran to die in combat in Iraq.

The United States has been debating for years the reasons for the war in Iraq and whether the invasion and continued presence of troops there are justified. Was there reason to believe that weapons of mass destruction were there? Was Saddam Hussein's despotism enough reason to topple him? Did links between Iraq and Al Qaeda exist?

El Salvador, which has been involved in the war since August 2003 and currently has 380 troops in Iraq, has been having its own discussion. Ms. Ramos, for one, can find no justification. Those other mothers can say that their children fell while fighting for their country, either for the Marxist guerrilla movement or the American-backed government. But Natividad Ramos, 20, died in Najaf in a clash with armed followers of the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr.

"I got through our war without losing any family," she said of El Salvador's civil war, which took an estimated 75,000 lives. "And now my son was sent to fight in someone else's war."

Officially, Mr. Saca's government says the deployment of what is called the Cuscatlán Battalion is a way to thank the world for its assistance in helping stop the civil war here a decade and a half ago. Salvadoran officials say their country is an active part of the United Nations and believe in the world body's effort to rebuild Iraq.

They stress the humanitarian dimension to their soldiers' work there, like building roads, health clinics and schools, while acknowledging the dangers that have resulted in the deaths of five soldiers and the wounding of about two dozen more. They proudly note that El Salvador's army, once linked to right-wing death squads, has been purged of its bad elements and is now one of the most respected institutions in the country.

But those arguments have not been enough to sway local critics. A newspaper opinion poll put opposition to El Salvador's involvement in Iraq at 81 percent. In 2004, masked protesters briefly took over the country's main cathedral and demanded an immediate withdrawal of troops. For the most part, though, Salvadorans have been preoccupied with local concerns, such as their economic woes and the insecurity that causes strains in their own country.

Every time a new contingent is sent, though, the legislature splits along party lines, with the right-wing government and its allies backing the plan and the leftist opposition voting no.

"It's the gringos' war," said one critic, Olga Serrano, who is executive secretary of a group of wounded veterans from the war in the 1980s. "What are we doing over there?"

Behind the scenes, government officials sell the plan differently. They point to all the benefits they believe they are receiving from Washington as a result of their assistance, even as the Bush administration insists that it is not giving El Salvador special favors for its troop presence.

"We're doing this to help the Iraqis but we're also doing this for our own people," said Carlos Rolando Herrarte Rivas, a legislator from the center-right Christian Democratic Party who went to Iraq in December as part of a government delegation to visit the troops. "The president can't say that but that's why we're doing it."

Mr. Herrarte, a retired colonel, said the Bush administration had been treating Salvadoran migrants well despite strong anti-immigrant sentiment in the United States. He pointed to the Bush administration's decision in January 2005 to grant a one-year extension of temporary protected status for about 250,000 Salvadorans living in the United States. The status gives them a reprieve from deportation because of natural disasters or political turmoil at home.

Mr. Herrarte also cited the $461 million in antipoverty funds that El Salvador was awarded last fall by the Millennium Challenge Corporation, an American foreign aid agency, as being another outgrowth of the war effort.

"When I go to my town, they yell," he said of his vociferous antiwar constituents. "They want to know why we are there. They say, 'Get them out.' Then I start explaining how this is helping our people in the United States."

To say that El Salvador and the United States are joined at the hip is an understatement. Nearly a third of native-born Salvadorans are living in the United States, including relatives of President Saca, Defense Minister Otto Alejandro Romero Orellana and many other decision makers. Those Salvadorans abroad send home about $2.5 billion every year, which represents about 17 percent of the country's gross domestic product.

Former President Francisco Guillermo Flores Pérez, who was considered especially close to the White House, sent the first troops to Iraq in 2003. The issue came up in the presidential campaign the following year when Mr. Saca, a pro-American businessman, defeated Schafik Handal, a former Communist guerrilla.

Mr. Handal had pledged to withdraw Salvador's 380 soldiers from Iraq immediately. Mr. Saca said a victory by Mr. Handal ran the risk of cutting the flow of money from Salvadoran migrants in the United States.

Mr. Saca has continued sending troops even though the governing Nationalist Republican Alliance party, known as Arena, lacks a majority in the legislature. Mr. Saca's party has had to strike deals with two smaller parties to come up with the 43-vote simple majority.

The Farabundo Martí National Liberation Front, an outgrowth of the guerrilla movement that fought the government in the 1980s, has consistently voted against the war.

Critics of decision to send Salvadoran troops point out that Nicaragua, Honduras and Dominican Republic continued to have strong relationships with Washington, even though they pulled their troops out of Iraq in the spring of 2004.

They point out that Hondurans and Nicaraguans also have the same preferred immigration status that Salvadorans do. Honduras and Nicaragua also received Millennium grants, albeit smaller ones than El Salvador's, critics note.

Salvadoran officials are not speaking of an increase in troops to quell the Iraqi insurgency. But when they are asked how long the country plans to involve itself in the war, they do adopt President Bush's language: as long as it takes.

Hello, Mr. Chips: Vendors Feeding Demand In Iraq (USAT)

By Zaid Sabah

USA Today, January 26, 2007

BAGHDAD — It's a sight on Baghdad sidewalks as common as cigarette or kebab vendors: Rows of clear plastic bags, some the size of small duffle bags, bulging with golden potato chips.

Dates are the country's biggest food export and pistachios are a better-known local commodity. But Iraqi-made potato chips — deep fried, thin and greasy — are considered more than a snack: They're a delicacy.

"I love them," said Lubna Bahjat, 25, a civil engineer, who said she eats the chips while watching DVDs at home. "I can't watch a movie without them."

MORE LIFE IN IRAQ: Index of stories

Baghdad once flourished with several potato chip factories, said Ali Ismail, a sidewalk chip vendor in Baghdad's Karrada district. But since 2003, some of the factory owners have been kidnapped, killed or have fled the violence, while other factories simply closed for financial reasons, Ismail and other chip vendors say. Today, one factory dominates the industry — near Jamila Square in Sadr City, the Baghdad slum and bastion of the Mahdi Army, a powerful Shiite militia.

Due in part to the shrinking supply, the cost of chips has increased. A 2-pound bag now sells for about $3.80, compared with about $2 a bag before the U.S. invasion.

The story of potato chips in Baghdad dates back to the late 1950s, when a Kurdish merchant known as Abu Rafal opened the first potato chip factory in the capital, said Jassim Issa, another Karrada chip vendor.

At first wildly foreign to Iraqis, the strange, crispy treat quickly surged in popularity, he says. Initially, potato chips were consumed mainly by men drinking beer or liquor at bars or restaurants. They later became mainstream and grew popular among women and children.

Ismail said he used to sell about 110 pounds of chips a day from his sidewalk stand. But since the bombing of a holy Shiite shrine in Samarra in February 2006, which launched a wave of sectarian violence, his business has diminished because fewer people are on the streets, he said.

Today, he sells about 45 pounds of potato chips per day, Ismail said. His most popular flavor: chicken.

"Potato chips are still very popular in Iraq," he said.

"Everybody loves them."

Issa has owned his sidewalk chip stand since 1994. He once dreamed of opening his own chip factory. But the venture involved an endless bureaucratic tangle with Baghdad's municipal government and the health and oil ministries and required several million Iraqi dinars, putting the plan out of reach, he said. He gave up on the idea and focused on his sidewalk sales.

He says his business has suffered as the violence has increased in Baghdad, keeping people indoors. Through February 2006, he was selling about 165 pounds of chips a day, Issa said. Today, he's lucky to sell 66 pounds.

Despite the dip in sales, Issa said he'll stick to his profession — more out of love for the chip than lust for profits.

"This job is the blood that flows in my veins," Issa said, adjusting the bags of chips on his stand. "Can a fish live outside the water? Neither can I."

Army Finds Probable Cause In Afghans' Torture, Death (LAT)

By Kevin Sack And Craig Pyes

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2007

Army criminal investigators have concluded there is probable cause to believe that two soldiers committed assault in the handling of detainees at a Special Forces firebase in Afghanistan in March 2003.

The case stems from reports of torture and the death of a detainee that had been concealed from military authorities until disclosed by The Times in 2004.

The military investigators, who work for the Army's Criminal Investigation Command, also found probable cause of dereliction of duty by one of the two soldiers. The incident was never reported up the chain of command, according to top Special Forces officials, and any attempt to cover up wrongdoing can constitute dereliction under Army criminal codes.

Christopher P. Grey, chief of public affairs for CID, said Thursday that he could not release names or details of the findings because the soldiers have not been formally charged. Rather, the findings have been forwarded to the U.S. Army Special Forces Command, based at Ft. Bragg, N.C., for decisions on whether the soldiers should be charged and prosecuted.

Maj. James O. Gregory, a spokesman for the Special Forces command, said a statement would be issued soon, but he declined to comment further.

Grey did not specify the gravity of the assault findings. Simple assault and dereliction of duty can be considered minor offenses by superior officers, according to specialists in military justice.

Grey also would not say whether the criminal findings relate directly to the death of an 18-year-old Afghan army recruit, Jamal Naseer, who died at the Special Forces compound in Gardez after being interrogated there by U.S. troops. A number of other Afghans who were taken prisoner along with Naseer have said they were severely beaten and otherwise abused while being held at the base by soldiers with the 20th Special Forces Group, an Alabama-based National Guard unit.

Concurrently, the Army investigators determined there was not probable cause to charge anyone in the separate case of an Afghan detainee who died in the custody of the same 20th Special Forces Group team, known as ODA 2021. That detainee, an unarmed woodcutter named Wakil Mohammed, was shot in the face by a soldier during a search of the village of Wazi after a fierce firefight, also in March 2003, according to Afghan witnesses interviewed by The Times.

Grey, the CID spokesman, said in an e-mailed statement that "the case involving Wazi was unfounded." That term is used, he said, "when there is not probable cause to believe that the offense occurred … considering the quality and quantity of all available evidence."

In March 2005, however, CID announced it had found probable cause in the Wazi case to recommend charges of murder against one member of the 20th Special Forces Group and of dereliction of duty against another soldier for not reporting Mohammed's death. Those referrals, known as "listings," have since been rescinded, but Grey declined to say what had changed.

Details of Mohammed's death were revealed in a two-part series about ODA 2021 that was published in The Times in September.

Grey said both investigations were closed by CID on Jan. 11. "If any new credible information becomes available, CID stands ready to reopen the investigation," he said.

The deaths of Naseer and Mohammed were never reported to higher authorities, according to both the battalion and group commanders who oversaw the 20th Group's operations in Afghanistan. That distinguished them from scores of other questionable deaths of detainees in U.S. custody in both Afghanistan and Iraq.

The Times account last fall cited numerous Afghan witnesses who saw Naseer immediately before and after his death and said he appeared to have been badly beaten. It quoted one Special Forces member as saying the team held a meeting after the detainee died to coordinate stories should an investigation arise.

"Everybody on the team had knowledge of it," the soldier said, speaking on condition of anonymity. "You just don't talk about that stuff in the Special Forces community. What happens downrange stays downrange."

Other detainees arrested with Naseer also showed signs of severe beating that were noted in local doctors' reports after their release from the base. One of those detainees was a man with one leg.

The commander of the Special Forces team at the time of both deaths was Chief Warrant Officer Kenneth C. Waller, a full-time National Guardsman who continues to work at 20th Group headquarters in Birmingham. Grey would not say whether Waller, who is now 36, is among those implicated in the CID investigation.

Officials with 20th Group said today that Waller, despite the ongoing case involving his unit, is currently deployed to East Africa, as is Col. Leonard Kiser, the 20th Group's current commanding officer. Neither was available for comment.

While the Special Forces team in Gardez consisted mostly of Alabama National Guardsmen, it also included several members from other groups.

U.S. To Seek $10.6B For Afghan Aid (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 26, 2007

President Bush will ask Congress for $10.6 billion to help Afghanistan strengthen its security forces and rebuild from years of war, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday.

The money would be on top of $14.2 billion in aid the United States has already given to Afghanistan since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001 that toppled the repressive Taliban.

The request, which Bush will make formally next month, comes after a year in which Taliban forces launched surprisingly fierce attacks across the country. U.S. and NATO forces are bracing for a renewed offensive by Taliban fighters in the spring

"The challenges of the last several months have demonstrated that we want to and we should redouble our efforts," Rice told reporters flying with her to Brussels for NATO meetings on Afghanistan.

Rice said that of the total, $8.6 billion would be for training and equipping Afghan police and security forces, and $2 billion would be for reconstruction. The money would be spent over the next two years.

The aid proposal also comes as the U.S. appears to be stepping up its military commitment in the country.

The Defense Department has said that 3,200 soldiers from the New York-based 10th Mountain Division already in Afghanistan would have their tour extended by four months. In a visit to Afghanistan last week, new Defense Secretary Robert Gates indicated he is likely to ask Bush for more troops for the country.

There are about 24,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan, the highest number since the war began in October 2001. About half are under the control of NATO, which is gradually gaining more control over operations there.

A senior State Department official who spoke on condition of anonymity gave another indication that U.S. forces in Afghanistan may grow, saying, "We will not be decreasing our military commitment in Afghanistan, quite the contrary."

On Thursday, Gen. David Richards, the top NATO commander in Afghanistan, said NATO-led troops battling resurgent Taliban militants will shortly be reinforced with another combat brigade. The NATO-led force is about 20 percent short of the troops levels pledged by its contributing nations.

Among other issues, Rice will raise with her NATO colleagues are the divisions within the alliance on sharing the burden in Afghanistan. More NATO countries have shown a greater willingness than others to send troops to areas of conflict.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said there is a pressing need to address the problem of high levels of opium poppy production in Afghanistan.

"Everybody understands that it's a problem that needs to be addressed," he said. "We don't want an Afghanistan (economy) that is based solely on production of narcotics and international aid."

Officials in the Afghan capital of Kabul said this week that despite pressure from the United States the country's heroin-producing poppies will not be sprayed with herbicide this year despite a record crop in 2006. Afghan officials said there would be an increased effort to destroy poppy crops with traditional techniques _ typically sending teams of laborers into fields to batter down or plow in the plants before they can be harvested.

Fueled by the Taliban, a powerful drug mafia and the need for a profitable crop that can overcome drought, opium production from poppies in Afghanistan last year rose 49 percent to 6,700 tons. That's enough to make about 670 tons of heroin, or more than 90 percent of the world's supply and more than the world's addicts consume in a year.

The U.S. budget request follows a review of U.S. policy in Afghanistan that the White House began last year.

"It had been over five years since we went into Afghanistan and the situation on the ground _ economic and security _ has changed," said Gordon Johndroe, a spokesman for the National Security Council. "There's now a viable government that we're working with. Substantial progress has been made in many areas, but it's also clear that the policy needed to be reviewed, so that we continue to improve the lives of Afghan citizens."

Rice To Press Europe On Afghan Funding (FT)

By Daniel Dombey, Aunohita Mojumdar And Fidelius Schmid

Financial Times, January 26, 2007

Condoleezza Rice, the US secretary for state, will ask her European counterparts on Friday to do more to help the reconstruction and security of Afghanistan, amid signs of a growing divide on the issue between the US and continental Europe.

At a meeting of Nato and European Union foreign ministers in Brussels, Ms Rice is expected to unveil details of a US initiative to provide about $8bn (€6bn, £4bn) for the war-torn country and call on Europe to make a similar step.

President George W. Bush is scheduled to ask Congress for the funds next month, an indication of the growing concern in Washington about the future of Afghanistan and the bitter fight against Taliban insurgents. The request would be a huge increase as the total assistance provided by Washington.

In an effort to boost troops in the country, the US Department of Defense has also said about 3,500 US soldiers will stay four months longer than scheduled.

Separately, the European Commission will on Friday announce about €600m ($780m, £395m) for Afghanistan for the next four years, aimed at improving governance, providing alternative livelihoods to the drugs trade, and health.

The figure represents a fall on the levels of aid the Commission has given Afghanistan in the past, although typically European governments, not Brussels, provide the lion's share of EU aid.

"We are working within limited resources," said a Commission official. "This is by far our largest aid programme in Asia."

The difference between the US and many European states has also been exposed by most Nato countries' reluctance to deploy troops to the south and east of Afghanistan, where the main fighting against the Taliban is taking place.

A hard core of Atlanticist countries, led by the US, the UK, Canada and the Netherlands, is spearheading the fight in the region, with countries such as Germany and France clearly set against joining them.

On Thursday Gen Rahim Wardak, Afghanistan's defence minister, said he expected "much more force in hand" because of the US decision to increase numbers in Afghanistan, the deployment of 1,000 Polish troops and the expected augmentation of British forces. He said that it would give Nato commanders a "strategic reserve".

The Afghan National Army's own strength would increase by up to 12,000 troops from its current level of 40,000 by the time of any "spring offensive" by the Taliban.

But France is pulling out most of the 200 special forces it has in the country, although it has agreed to provide extra aircraft for the Nato mission. Germany is also seeking to provide Nato with more aircraft.

"The countries that are in the south and east are the countries that wake up every morning feeling that their own national security is tied to the future of Afghanistan," said a senior Nato diplomat.

Bush To Seek More Aid For Afghanistan (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And David S. Cloud

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

BRUSSELS, Jan. 25 — President Bush plans to ask Congress for $10.6 billion in aid for Afghanistan, primarily to beef up the country's security forces, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday.

The aid request would come before what is expected to be another spring offensive by resurgent forces linked to the Taliban, the former rulers of Afghanistan. In Washington, the Pentagon announced Thursday that it was delaying the departure of a 3,200-soldier combat brigade from Afghanistan for as long as three months, increasing the American force level there to around 24,000. An additional 20,000 soldiers from other NATO countries are also deployed there.

The aid request would include $8.6 billion for training and equipping Afghan security forces and would go toward increasing the size of Afghanistan's national army by 70,000 and its local police forces by 82,000, said a senior American official familiar with the issue.

An additional $2 billion would go to reconstruction projects like building roads, laying down electric power lines, development in rural areas, and counternarcotics efforts, administration officials said. The officials said that they planned to use some of the money to help Afghanistan and Pakistan battle the Taliban and other insurgents along the Afghan-Pakistan border.

President Bush is expected to make a formal request for the funds next month, after a year in which Taliban forces have carried out fierce attacks across the country, particularly in the south.

"The challenges of the last several months have demonstrated that we want to and we should redouble our efforts," Ms. Rice told reporters aboard her flight to Brussels for a NATO meeting on Afghanistan, coming from a donors' conference for Lebanon that was held in Paris.

President Bush announced two weeks ago that he was sending more than 20,000 additional troops to Iraq, where the United States already has about 132,000 troops.

The troops to remain longer in Afghanistan, from the Third Brigade of the 10th Mountain Division, provide commanders with more forces before an expected spring offensive by the Taliban. The unit was supposed to return to the United States next month. But commanders asked Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates for additional forces when he visited Kabul last week and he said at the time that he was inclined to support the request.

In a statement, the Army said the additional forces were necessary to "deny the Taliban a base of operations."

Because another battalion is scheduled to leave Afghanistan shortly, the actual increase in American troop numbers as a result of holding over the 3,500-member brigade will be about 2,500 troops, said Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman.

The increase comes at the same time that the Bush administration is renewing pressure on European allies to increase their troops in Afghanistan and is aimed at quelling European concerns that the United States may soon draw down in Afghanistan to meet its growing troop commitments in Iraq. British, Canadian and Dutch troops have at times since last summer been in intense combat in southern Afghanistan, the Taliban's heartland.

In addition, an American general, Dan K. McNeil, is taking command of the NATO mission in Afghanistan next month, taking over from a British officer.

The NATO-led force remains about 15 percent short of the troop and equipment levels pledged by its contributing nations, a point that is bound to be of contention during Friday's scheduled NATO meeting in Brussels to discuss Afghanistan.

Mr. Gates has been more open to adding troops to Afghanistan than his predecessor, Donald H. Rumsfeld, who argued for holding down force levels. Mr. Gates has indicated that he favors aggressive action to root out the Taliban and has said repeatedly that Afghanistan cannot be permitted to fall back into chaos.

American officials say that Taliban fighters are mounting increasingly brazen cross-border attacks from Pakistan and are preparing to resume attacks in the spring, as they have done every year since the American invasion, which toppled the Taliban in 2001.

Since 2001, the United States has provided over $14.2 billion in aid to Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0122444

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

KABUL, Jan. 25 -- NATO-led troops battling resurgent Taliban fighters will soon be reinforced with another combat brigade, the top NATO commander in Afghanistan said Thursday.

British Gen. David Richards said the brigade will consist of members of different nations participating in NATO's International Security Assistance Force. A brigade is typically 1,500 to 3,500 troops. Richards did not specify how many reinforcements he expected.

"I anticipate at least another brigade of combat troops from ISAF nations coming here shortly and more after that," Richards told reporters.

At NATO headquarters in Brussels, officials would not specify which countries planned to send reinforcements, saying such announcements are up to individual nations.

Several countries, however, plan to boost their contributions in response to requests for more troops to join the fight against the Taliban in the spring.

Poland is expected to send about 1,200 soldiers in February, and British news media have reported that Britain is considering deploying 600 more troops. It was not clear if Richards was referring to those upcoming troop contributions.

The U.S. Defense Department said Wednesday that about 3,500 soldiers from the New York-based 10th Mountain Division already in the country would have their tour extended by four months.

The NATO-led force, which is bracing for renewed fighting with the Taliban, is about 20 percent short of the troop levels pledged by its contributing nations.

Richards made the comments during the opening of a joint operations center in Kabul that will be manned by officers from Afghanistan, Pakistan and NATO. The three are trying to increase coordination in their counterinsurgency efforts.

Relations between Pakistan and Afghanistan have deteriorated recently as top officials have traded accusations over which side was responsible for the increase in Taliban attacks. About 4,000 people died in insurgency-related violence in Afghanistan last year, according to numbers from Afghan, U.S. and NATO officials.

Also Thursday, Italy's government approved financing for the country's military mission in Afghanistan despite calls for a pullout by leftist parties in Prime Minister Romano Prodi's coalition. Prodi has agreed to keep Italy's 1,800-strong contingent in Afghanistan, although he has resisted NATO's request to increase its size.

Bush Seeks Funds To Counter Taliban (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, January 26, 2007

The Bush administration will ask Congress for $10.6 billion next month for Afghanistan's reconstruction and to beef up the country's security forces to counter recent Taliban gains, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday.

The unusually large figure -- the United States has given Afghanistan $14.2 billion in aid since 2001 -- is an indication that the administration views the difficulties facing President Hamid Karzai's government as extremely serious, U.S. officials said.

In addition, the Pentagon announced yesterday that it would extend the tours of 3,200 soldiers in Afghanistan. The troops from the 3rd Brigade, 10th Mountain Division, were expecting to complete a one-year deployment next month, but their tour of duty had been extended by up to 120 days.

The extension means there will be about 2,500 more soldiers in Afghanistan than planned for the next few months.

"The challenges of the last several months have demonstrated that we want to and we should redouble our efforts," Miss Rice said as she flew last night to Brussels, where she will urge fellow NATO members today to follow Washington's lead and increase their financial assistance.

She said $8.6 billion would be used for training and equipping Afghan police and security forces. The money would also help to increase the Afghan army by 70,000 soldiers and police forces by 82,000, a senior U.S. official said.

The remaining $2 billion would go to building roads, an electricity grid and other infrastructure, as well as counternarcotics operations, said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

The administration will submit the request as a supplemental to this year's budget, but the funds would be disbursed over the next two years, officials said.

They said the White House had realized that an "adjustment in strategy" was urgently needed if Afghanistan was going to be the success the United States wants it to be, and a broad interagency review was conducted in the past several months.

"There was a feeling that we were incrementally making progress, but that, given the kind of insurgency threat we faced last year, maybe that wasn't enough, that what we needed to do was make significant progress across the board," Richard Boucher, assistant secretary of state for South and Central Asian affairs, said yesterday in Brussels.

Mr. Boucher said the "significant funding," a decision to keep more troops in Afghanistan, as well as other steps by the United States and NATO were meant to disrupt Taliban's plans for the winter.

About 4,000 people were killed in insurgency fighting last year, and U.S. officials have said there were nearly 140 suicide attacks, up from 27 in 2005.

Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates visited Afghanistan last week, but officials said the administration delayed the new funds pledge until Miss Rice's meeting at NATO in order to "make a political point."

"We're looking for others to step up their effort with us, step it up across the board," Mr. Boucher said.

About 33,000 troops from 37 countries under the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force are currently deployed in Afghanistan.

The Bush administration has been criticized that it stopped paying enough attention to the country after toppling the Taliban in 2001, and particularly since the war in Iraq began nearly four years ago.

A senior U.S. official said yesterday the administration wanted to show to its European allies that "it's not all about Iraq, all the time."

NATO defense ministers are expected to discuss the alliance's operation in Afghanistan at a meeting in Spain next month.

White House Wants More Aid For Afghanistan (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration will seek $10.6 billion more in aid for Afghanistan, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday, in another sign that the White House is deepening its commitment in the Central Asian nation in response to growing concern over a Taliban resurgence.

The proposal for additional money came the same week the Pentagon announced plans to extend the deployment of 3,200 troops in the country and amid a broad rethinking of the American strategy for dealing with Afghanistan.

The new aid, which would be spent over two years, would mark a substantial addition to the $14 billion the United States has spent in Afghanistan since the invasion that toppled the Taliban's fundamentalist Islamic government in late 2001. About $8.6 billion of the new funding would be used to train and arm Afghan troops and police, and the remainder would be for reconstruction, including new roads, electricity and other infrastructure, Rice told reporters during a trip to Brussels.

"The challenges of the last several months have demonstrated that we want to, and should, redouble our efforts," she said.

U.S. officials have become increasingly alarmed by the resurgence of the Taliban, whose attacks on the fragile government and international forces made 2006 the bloodiest year since the U.S.-led invasion, with 4,000 deaths from violence. Military strategists are preparing for an expected spring campaign by the Taliban forces.

A senior U.S. official, speaking to reporters last week, said that prospects for progress in the Afghan effort were far better than in Iraq. Even so, he said, "efforts in Afghanistan need desperately to be intensified."

The official, who would discuss U.S. strategy only on condition of anonymity, said the United States and its NATO allies needed a "comprehensive approach" that included not only stepped-up security, but also efforts to strengthen the weak economy, fight the opium trade and extend the reach of a government that is hardly in evidence in many parts of the country.

As part of the effort to stabilize the country, the U.S. is temporarily increasing the size of its force there by postponing the return of the 3rd Brigade of the 10th Mountain Division. The brigade, based at Ft. Drum, N.Y., will be extended by up to 120 days beyond its one-year deployment, the Pentagon said this week. Taking into account service members being rotated out of Afghanistan, that will mean a net increase of about 2,500 U.S. troops in the country.

About 24,000 U.S. troops are in Afghanistan, representing the largest American force since the start of the war. About half of them are under the command of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

The new aid proposal requires approval from the Democrat-controlled Congress as part of the administration's 2007 supplemental budget proposal, a special war spending measure separate from the regular budget. The war budget proposal is expected to top $100 billion, adding to more than $400 billion spent on the conflicts and reconstruction efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan since 2001.

Pentagon officials said the money would enable them to train 70,000 Afghan soldiers and 82,000 police officers.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said during a trip to Afghanistan last week that he was sympathetic to NATO requests for more U.S. and European troops and expressed concern that progress in the country would "slip away" under a sustained Taliban offensive.

Rice will address the planned addition of forces with European leaders at a NATO ministerial meeting today in Brussels.

Although the Afghanistan mission is NATO's first outside Europe, U.S. officials are unhappy that their allies have not provided more troops and that the NATO forces have in some cases limited their missions in an effort to reduce casualties. The

Bush administration has been pressing Spain, Italy and Germany to lift operational restrictions on troops in southern Afghanistan, where the fighting is the most dangerous.

The senior U.S. official said the French too "need to do more." But the Europeans, for their part, have expressed concern that the Pentagon may shift U.S. troops from Afghanistan to Iraq to try to quell the surging violence there, leaving NATO to fill the gap.

New York Prosecutor With Wall Street In His Sights (FT)

By Brooke Masters In New York

Financial Times, January 26, 2007

Michael Garcia, the US prosecutor who has raised hackles abroad with his wide-ranging internet gambling investigation, takes pride in being an ordinary guy.

Spurning the car and driver that comes with his position as US attorney for the southern district of New York, he commutes by train and is never recognised on the street.

He notes wryly that his alma mater is so low on the academic totem poll that he was the first Albany Law School graduate to be hired by the office in more than 200 years.

But Mr Garcia's personal modesty stands in stark contrast with his ambitious view of his office's jurisdiction. The 217 lawyers under his command have tackled corruption at the United Nations, securities fraud cases from around the US, and most recently sub-poenaed more than a dozen non-US banks as part of a controversial crackdown on internet gambling.

"This is an office that has been willing to take on the difficult and new cases, and you see the results," Mr Garcia, 45, told the Financial Times. "If there is a case there, we will make it."

A born-and-bred New Yorker, Mr Garcia spent nine years as a line prosecutor in the southern district in the 1990s, working mainly on terrorism cases at a time when the office was a world leader at bringing such offenders to justice.

"He was a regular guy. He put his head down. He worked with agents. He made the cases," said Lev Dassin, a colleague from those days who now serves as one of Mr Garcia's top deputies.

As a young terrorism prosecutor, Mr Garcia travelled to Asia to help build the office's case against Ramzi Yousef for plotting to blow up US airliners. A few years later, he went to Kenya and Tanzania to collect evidence from the victims of the 1998 US embassy bombings there.

"Mike is just an extraordinarily talented prosecutor and investigator," said Mary Jo White, the US attorney at the time.

The southern district is known, only half jokingly, as "the sovereign district", in recognition of its broad jurisdiction and its founding in 1789, which predates the Justice Department itself.

Located blocks from Wall Street, the office attracts many of the US's pre-eminent securities fraud prosecutors and brought recent cases against the leaders of WorldCom and Adelphia, and domesticity mogul Martha Stewart.

"New York is a centre and New York is a target," Mr Garcia said. "For a lot of those reasons, our venue is very expansive and we are proud of that."

The gambling probe has particularly raised hackles because Mr Garcia's staff have not only filed money-laundering charges against the Canadian founders of Neteller, a company that processes gambling proceeds, but also sought to trace the overseas financial holdings of gambling companies and their principal officers.

Though Mr Garcia would not comment on the particulars, he says he sees the gambling crackdown as simple fairness.

"We think it violates US law and we are going to do it whether it is the guy in the Bronx operating an illegal gambling [den] or a multi-million dollar offshore on-line gambling operation."

Mr Garcia, who is married to a Federal Bureau of Investigation agent he met at an office party, is also well versed in the ways of Washington.

He spent more than five years there, first in the Commerce Department and then heading Immigration and Customs Enforcement, a newly created bureaucracy of more than 20,000 people within the Department of Homeland Security.

Mr Garcia calls his 2005 return to New York a "great honour" and has promised to beef up prosecution of public corruption. His emphasis on meetings and reporting lines initially irked some long-time staffers and contrasted with his predecessor, David Kelley, who had often roamed the halls.

Mr Garcia's arrival coincided with a rough patch for the white-collar unit. Last summer the office lost an appeal and then agreed to a deferred prosecution of banker Frank Quattrone, a move widely seen as a defeat.

A federal judge publicly railed at the office's handling of its case against accountancy firm KPMG, and the office also dropped criminal charges against seven former New York Stock Exchange specialists.

Mr Garcia's supporters are quick to point out that all of these cases started before his arrival in 2005 and he dismissed the problems as "cyclical".

"This office is always going to be at the forefront of white-collar work," he promised. "This year you will see some very good cases coming out."

Reichert To Submit Candidates To Succeed U.S. Attorney McKay (SEATIMES)

By David Bowermaster, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, January 26, 2007

Rep. Dave Reichert, R-Auburn, is working with local lawyers and law-enforcement officials to identify candidates to succeed John McKay as U.S. Attorney for the Western District of Washington.

McKay is stepping down today after five years as the region's top law-enforcement official. He announced Thursday he will join the faculty of Seattle University Law School.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is expected to name an interim replacement for McKay today, to avoid disruptions to prosecutions. But it could take weeks to choose a permanent successor.

U.S. attorneys are White House appointees subject to Senate confirmation.

It is traditional for the senior member of the state's congressional delegation, who is from the same party as the president, to work with the White House to select U.S. attorney candidates.

Rep. Doc Hastings is the longest-serving Washington Republican. But because Hastings is from Eastern Washington, he asked Reichert to pick candidates to succeed McKay.

Mike Shields, Reichert's chief of staff, said the congressman will submit a list of finalists to the White House. However, the final decision rests with the administration.

Reichert is not obligated to consult with members of the opposite party.

Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash, has not been contacted by Reichert's office about the U.S. attorney vacancy, said Alex Glass, a spokeswoman for Murray.

"Congressman Reichert is involved in looking at candidates and will seek to work in a bipartisan way in putting that name forward," Shields said.

Reichert tapped Norm Maleng, King County prosecutor, to head a panel that is reviewing candidates, said Dan Donohoe, a spokesman for Maleng.

McKay announced his plans to resign Dec. 14.

His departure became the subject of speculation after a spate of reports earlier this month suggested that the White House had pushed several U.S. attorneys out of their jobs. The White House denied it had orchestrated a purge, but declined to comment on whether McKay had been asked to leave.

McKay said last month he stepped down to return to the private sector. Emily Langlie, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office, said McKay stood by that statement and would not comment further.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

McNulty Memo On Attorney-Client Privilege Blasted For Lack Of Change (NLJ)

By Pamela A. MacLean, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, January 26, 2007

Critics say result will be silent pressure by Justice; Congress expected to seek bans on waiver demands

Revision of the Justice Department's much maligned guidelines for seeking corporate waivers of attorney-client privilege in white-collar investigations has been likened to a "don't ask, don't tell" policy that will drive prosecution waiver demands underground.

And few believe that what has been dubbed the McNulty memorandum, issued on Dec. 12 by Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul McNulty, will resolve the simmering anger among corporate counsel over what has been called a "culture of waiver."

Now that Congress has returned this month, it is expected to renew a call for a legislative ban on federal prosecutors and regulatory agencies demanding waivers. And a federal rules reform advisory committee has proposed a change in Rule 502 of the Federal Rules of Evidence to codify "limited waiver" of attorney-client privilege, despite wide federal and state court rejection of the concept.

Selective waivers, essentially confidentiality agreements, would allow prosecutors access to internal company investigations, but would seal them from plaintiffs attorneys engaged in civil suits.

McNulty said the department supports the recognition of limited waiver. The danger of waiver exposing corporations to third-party lawsuits and shareholder suits "is a significant concern," McNulty said in a recent interview. "That is why we are supportive of the effort to create a limited waiver and to amend federal rules to allow it to occur. We would like to see some way forward to make it possible for limited waiver," he said.

A DEPARTURE

His comment is a departure from a June decision by the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejecting a partial waiver sought by Qwest Communications International Inc. The decision noted that rather than support Qwest's request for adoption of selective waiver of privilege, the government "carefully took no position," and declined to participate in oral argument. In re Qwest Communications Securities Litigation, 450 F.3d 1179 (2006).

As for Congress stepping in to ban all but voluntary waivers, McNulty said, "I am hopeful the Senate and the House will give the new guidance a chance to work and see how it plays out in our corporate fraud work. I am confident that if they do give it a chance there will be no need for legislation and there will be no need for further guidance."

But efforts at cooperation may not be so amicable in the new year. Critics, who complain that McNulty's 21-page memo fails to provide sufficient protection against government coercion, have started lining up to push for tougher legislation to curb prosecution waiver demands and to oppose legitimizing "partial waivers."

At a Jan. 12 meeting in Phoenix, a subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States heard public comments on proposed Rule 502 changes.

A 2003 memo by former Deputy Attorney General Larry D. Thompson, which told prosecutors considering whether to charge a corporation criminally to take its cooperation into account, turned the waiver controversy into a subject of national debate. Waiver of attorney-client or work-product privileges was considered a sign of cooperation. Companies failing to cooperate could be indicted along with suspect executives.

The Justice Department was tampering with a privilege that has existed in common law for more than 400 years of balancing the courts' search for truth with a need to protect defendants' right to counsel, according to Steven K. Hazen, an advisor to the American Bar Association task force on Rule 502 and the State Bar of California Business Law Section. "Confidentiality is like toothpaste, once it is out of the tube it is out for good," he said.

A survey earlier this year by the Association of Corporate Counsel, representing 19,000 public companies, found that nearly 75 percent of inside and outside counsel said government agencies expect a company under investigation to waive legal privileges. In addition, it found that in the last five years, 51 percent of outside counsel and 30 percent of in-house counsel reported the government expected waivers in order to be eligible for leniency.

"It is chilling the relationship with employees and impacts whether people report misconduct," said Susan Hackett, a spokeswoman for the association.

The McNulty memo didn't resolve the conflict. "We're thrilled the Department of Justice has taken this step forward after two years of begging. But this proposal is no solution. It not only doesn't go far enough, it still misses the point. They still think DOJ gets to decide whether corporate counsel they are prosecuting have a right to counsel or not," Hackett said.

"One bone dangled before counsel is a confidentiality agreement [partial waiver]," she said. "We don't support the rule change. There is still a fundamental constitutional problem of right to counsel. Only a court can decide that right."

The McNulty memo converts the Thompson memo's upfront requests for waiver to a "don't ask, don't tell policy," complained Judson W. Starr, head of environmental defense for Venable in Washington. "The government raises the prospect of getting information but doesn't ask for it. You still have every bit as much pressure to waive," said Starr.

"In environmental cases it is on the table in every case," he said. "If you refuse to waive, it becomes part of the conspiracy."

McNulty disputed the notion that his changes would turn government waiver requests into an unspoken wink and nod. "Practically speaking, if someone engaged in some subtle process of seeking waiver without following the procedure, it would come out quickly," he said.

"If a corporation came back and said 'there was a method or tone we picked up, that gave the impression it would be bad if we didn't volunteer to waive,' I would want to know a lot more about the facts of that," McNulty said.

Jim Parkman, who successfully defended HealthSouth Corp. CEO Richard M. Scrushy, said, "I am not for giving any waivers of any kind." In the HealthSouth prosecution, said Parkman of The Cochran Firm's Birmingham, Ala., office, "we knew they signed an agreement and provided the government everything. We tried to obtain the agreement. The court ordered we get it, but we never did."

ABA task force advisor Hazen added that there's a danger of "commoditizing" waivers by making them bargaining chips to be traded for something of value.

But most troubling, the McNulty memo "leaves the impression something significant has been done when it hasn't," Hazen said. "Comparing the McNulty memo line by line with the Thompson memo, there is almost no change. It is very subtle." Hazen also said the Justice Department "institutionalize[s] artificially the entire attorney work-product protection area as trivial."

Nacchio's Legal Tab Picked Up (DENP)

By Andy Vuong, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, January 26, 2007

Bylaws require Qwest to pay for ex-CEO's defense

Joe Nacchio is getting the best defense Qwest can buy.

The Denver-based phone company is paying for Nacchio's multi million-dollar defense against civil and criminal charges, which include 42 counts of illegal insider trading.

Nacchio, Qwest's former chief executive and chairman, has pleaded not guilty, and his criminal trial is scheduled to start March 19.

His final legal tab could run from $25 million to $75 million for both civil and criminal cases, according to experts. Former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling, who was convicted of fraud and conspiracy last year, reportedly rang up $65 million in legal fees.

Qwest's bylaws require it to "advance legal fees to current and former officers who may be involved" in any criminal or civil legal proceeding because of their work with the company, said spokesman Bob Toevs.

"If there is a finding against one of those former officers, the company does have the ability or the right to recover the fees that were advanced to the individual," Toevs said.

But Qwest would have to recover the fees through court action, and the company wouldn't get anything if Nacchio's finances are emptied by fines and other debts.

Nacchio faces up to 10 years in prison and a $1 million fine for each of the 42 insider-trading charges. A separate Securities and Exchange Commission civil fraud lawsuit seeks his stock sale profits from 1999 to 2002 and bonuses. Nacchio, who reaped $176.5 million in stock sales during the period covered by the SEC lawsuit, has denied any wrongdoing.

The requirement for Qwest to cover Nacchio's legal bill is also spelled out in his severance agreement. Nacchio was forced out of Qwest in mid-2002.

"It's really sad that a public corporation like Qwest is going to end up having to pay for his legal expenses," said retiree Nelson

Phelps, executive director of the Association of US West Retirees. "It's a further hit against a company (through) legal costs for a person that many retirees look at as almost sinking the company."

"Expensive litigations"

Qwest, which acquired Baby Bell US West in 2000, hasn't disclosed how much it has spent or expects to spend on Nacchio's defense. Some of the fees may be covered by so-called Directors and Officers liability insurance, which many public corporations including Qwest carry to help defend and settle lawsuits against key officials.

But the insurance typically doesn't cover criminal charges, said John Toothman, founder of The Devil's Advocate, a legal-fees consulting firm in Great Falls, Va.

The Justice Department's case alleges Nacchio sold $101 million in Qwest stock in early 2001 while he knew the company's finances were faltering.

Separately, the SEC has sued Nacchio and several other former Qwest executives, alleging that they fraudulently boosted revenues by $3 billion from 1999 to 2002. Qwest later restated much of that revenue.

Nacchio has also been named in several shareholder lawsuits.

He is represented by two law firms: Roseland, N.J.-based Stern & Kilcullen and Denver's Richilano & Gilligan.

Herbert Stern is Nacchio's lead attorney, and John Richilano is the top local attorney. Six other attorneys from those two firms have entered appearances in the criminal case.

Costs add up

Toothman said the lead attorneys in the case could likely charge more than $500 an hour and their associates around $200 an hour. The legal bill would also include fees for pollsters, expert witnesses, travel expenses and other costs.

One expert already has appeared in court filings on Nacchio's behalf. Noted jury specialist Edward Bronson of California State University reviewed hundreds of newspaper articles and prepared a 62-page report supporting Nacchio's effort to move the trial to New Jersey, which was rejected. Bronson has said that he is paid $125 an hour for his work.

"These are expensive litigations," said John Marquess, president of Legal Cost Control, a legal-fees consulting firm in New Jersey. "These things could go as high as $60 million to $75 million to defend."

Since Qwest is paying fees in advance, Marquess said Nacchio has no reason to control costs. Skilling shelled out $23 million from his own pocket for his attorney fees, his insurance covered $17 million and $25 million went unpaid, according to published reports. Enron had filed bankruptcy by the time Skilling faced criminal charges.

"When it's your own money, you may care a bit," Marquess said. "When it's not your own money, what's he care?"

Legal experts said large corporations such as Qwest need to offer officers and directors financial protection from lawsuits in order to hire them.

"It'd be hard to attract the kind of individuals that you need to run a public corporation without that type of indemnification," said John O'Dorisio, a Denver corporate attorney.

Recommended steps

Harvey Pitt, former chairman of the SEC, said companies should have their boards conduct an investigation into charges before advancing legal fees. He also said they should have adequate protections in place to ensure that they'll be able to recover the fees.

"Unless there are satisfactory responses to these questions, I don't believe boards are justified in advancing expenses, even though they may legally be able to do so or even obligated to do so," said Pitt, who now heads business consulting firm Kalorama Partners.

Experts said companies rarely recover legal fees from former executives even if they are convicted, and shareholders ultimately foot the bill.

"There's a lot of hurdles to get that money back," Marquess said.

The company would have to stand in line behind court fines, debt holders such as mortgage companies and shareholders that file civil suits.

Experts said Qwest would have the ability to recover attorney fees from former Qwest chief financial officer Robin Szeliga, who pleaded guilty to one count of illegal insider trading.

But during her sentencing last year, Szeliga said she has faced "financial devastation." She was fined $250,000 as part of her sentence.

Szeliga is the only other former top Qwest officer to have been charged criminally. Former president Afshin Mohebbi and former CFO Robert Woodruff, who preceded Szeliga, are also named in the SEC suit.

Toevs said he couldn't comment about individual cases.

GM Delays Earnings Announcement; Will Restate Some Financial Statements (DEN)

By Sharon Terlep And Christine Tierney, The Detroit News

Detroit News, January 26, 2007

General Motors Corp. is delaying its fourth-quarter and 2006 earnings announcement, originally scheduled for next Tuesday, but said it expected to show an improvement in its auto business in the fourth quarter.

GM also said it would restate prior financial results -- many of which have previously been restated -- due primarily to tax accounting adjustments.

"As a result of these anticipated adjustments related to the deferred tax liabilities, hedging activities and other miscellaneous items, GM will be restating its financial statements for 2002 through the third quarter of 2006," the U.S. automaker said in a statement. "GM does not expect any material impact on cash flow."

While GM's indication of improved results for the fourth quarter is likely to reassure investors that the automaker is on a recovery track, its continuing accounting problems are bound to provoke concern.

While some of the past restatements appear to be technical in nature, the automaker's accounts are being investigated by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and Justice Department.

Last year, GM reported a $10.6 billion loss for 2005 -- after restating the result it issued previously.

That shortfall was dwarfed Thursday by Ford Motor Co.'s announcement that it lost $12.7 billion in 2006 -- the biggest annual loss in its history.

DOJ_NMG_0122451

Of Detroit's automakers, struggling against intense competition from Asian rivals in their home market, GM is furthest along in its recovery program, and investors are watching its progress closely. GM said it expected to report "improved performance in its automotive business, including record fourth quarter revenue in 2006."

Analysts have been expecting strong results from GM for 2006, a year in which the automaker pared back its workforce, cut production costs and scaled back less profitable businesses, such as sales to rental car companies. "I think they will not disappoint," analyst Brad Rubin of BNP Paribas said prior to GM's announcement that it would delay and restate results.

"The company expects to be profitable on a reported consolidated basis in the 2006 fourth quarter, and net income is expected to improve significantly over the fourth quarter of 2005," GM said in its statement.

It said it had improved its liquidity position, ending the year with around $26.4 billion in cash and equivalents, an increase of about $5.9 billion over year-earlier levels.

In its statement, GM also said GMAC, its former finance arm, was not able to supply information on time that GM needed for its fourth-quarter report. GM sold 51 percent of GMAC on Nov. 30 as part of an effort to raise cash.

The automaker confirmed Thursday that it was considering the sale of its Allison Transmission division in Indianapolis.

GM did not say when it would report its fourth-quarter and annual results but will provide information on the progress of its financial reporting in early February. It said it expected to file its annual report on Form 10-K with the SEC by March 1, the due date.

OUTSIDE INFLUENCE How Borrowed Shares Swing Company Votes (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

Private investment firms have found a simple way to profit from the workings of public companies: Borrow their shares, and then swing the outcomes of their votes.

In some cases, the strategy has allowed speculators to gamble that a company's stock will drop, and then vote for decisions that will ensure that it does -- without their ever having to own any stock themselves. Some outside interests have used the strategy to hide their voting power within a company until the last moment. Often, individual shareholders don't realize their own stocks, and their voting rights, have been borrowed from their brokerage accounts, until it's too late.

Fueling the practice -- dubbed "empty voting" in a study by two University of Texas professors -- is a booming business in lending shares. That business has nearly doubled in the past five years, according to one report, and now earns $8 billion a year for big brokerages and banks plus an unknown amount for institutional investors. Voting rights are lent along with the shares, and increasingly, that is leading to unintended consequences.

Vote counters often fail to keep track accurately and let the borrowers and owners of the same shares both cast votes. Four big banks paid the New York Stock Exchange $2.35 million last year to settle charges in this area. Meanwhile, other shareholders often are unaware that a big voting bloc has no real ownership stake in the company -- and that it may vote directly opposite the wishes of the stock's actual owners.

This phenomenon has gotten the attention of regulators, who fear it is escalating just as shareholder voting is gaining importance as a way to improve corporate governance and keep management excesses in check. If elections can be too easily gamed, critics fear, a basic foundation of public companies -- that shareholders vote in the company's best interest -- will be undermined.

The practice "is almost certainly going to force further regulatory response to ensure that investors' interests are protected," Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox said in an interview. "This is already a serious issue and it is showing all signs of growing."

The SEC has no firm plans yet. Britain's securities regulator, the Financial Services Authority, has begun a study into whether to force greater disclosure of large investors' stakes in companies, regardless of whether they own stocks or are just borrowing them. One of the largest pension-fund managers there, Hermes, has called for regulators to outlaw voting altogether by borrowers of shares. In Hong Kong, the Securities and Futures Commission said it is studying "issues relating to borrowed shares and voting."

The concern arises just as more companies are moving toward requiring a majority of all shares to elect directors, instead of simply a plurality of those casting votes. A recent U.S. federal appeals court decision opened the door to giving shareholders a greater say in the election and nomination of directors, and the SEC recently approved a rule to make it easier for investors to put up their own slates of directors. But the vulnerability of the voting system could set back such efforts.

"It seems in trying to perfect corporate governance, we were polishing an apple that had a lot of worms inside, and we didn't know it," says Carol Hayes, corporate secretary of Coca-Cola Co., and a member of the Society of Corporate Secretaries and Governance Professionals.

The opportunity for "empty voting" arises when brokerage firms or institutional fund managers lend the shares they manage to hedge funds or other firms, for a fee that can rise with how difficult the shares are to get. The value of securities borrowed on any given day has reached $1.6 trillion after several years of double-digit growth, according to Astec Marketing Research Group Inc., a New York capital-markets research firm.

When it comes times for a shareholder vote, it's the borrowers that hold the voting rights. Under Delaware law, where most large companies are incorporated, voting rights belong to whoever holds the stock on a date the company chooses in advance of its stockholder meeting. It's as if in the U.S. electoral system, someone could borrow your voting rights and use them to vote in your place without your knowing it. Individual share owners often are unaware that contracts with brokerages normally allow the brokerages to make money by lending out stock if it's held in margin accounts, just as banks profit from lending their cash deposits.

The owners must ask for their stock to be recalled if they want to vote -- which means they would have to know the stock was lent and that the vote was coming. If their stocks are lent, the borrowers of the shares, not the owners, are supposed to receive invitations to vote. Stocks in cash accounts aren't affected.

READ THE STUDY

See the study by law professors Hu and Black1, which cites 22 instances in which either borrowed stock or hedging strategies, or both, were used.

No one knows how widespread "empty voting" is. Law professors Henry Hu and Bernard Black at the University of Texas at Austin have studied 22 instances world-wide from 2001 through 2006 in which either borrowed stock or hedging strategies, or both, were used. (See Messrs. Hu and Black's study2.) Consider one example:

Henderson Land Development Co., Hong Kong's third-largest property developer, owned 73% of a subsidiary called Henderson Investment. It offered a rich premium in November 2005 to buy the rest. It had failed in a similar effort three years earlier, but this time it came back with a better offer. Under Hong Kong law, the deal would go through unless 10% of all the shares opposed it. Since the parent owned such a large stake and large institutions backed the deal, passage was considered a foregone conclusion.

Yet the acquisition was voted down early last year by a slim margin. Several market participants were quoted in news reports saying there was a surge in borrowed shares by at least one hedge fund ahead of the vote, compared with little if any lending in Henderson shares over the previous seven months.

By borrowing the shares and simultaneously shorting the underlying stock, the hedge funds gained the voting rights to squash the deal and stood to profit when the stock dropped 18% the next day. After the Henderson vote, the Hong Kong regulator said it was examining voting practices.

"It appears that one or more hedge funds borrowed Henderson Investment shares before the record date, voted against the buyout, and then sold those shares short, thus profiting from its private knowledge that the buyout would be defeated," the Texas professors wrote in the May 2006 Southern California Law Review. A Henderson spokeswoman declined to comment.

Altogether the professors analyzed 12 instances in which it appeared that hedge funds or other large shareholders voted to try to swing public-company contests in their favor without much ownership stake. In 10 others, they said investors just hid their stake in the company until a vote.

The shareholder vote is rooted firmly in corporate law, which is based on the notion that shareholders vote in the best interests of the company in which they own stock. The effects of short-selling and other sophisticated instruments that can separate a vote from economic interest were never considered. "You have this whole superstructure built on this notion that there is this coupling of economic interest and voting power," says Mr. Hu. "With these financial innovations, you're screwing around with the foundation."

Hedge funds say their actions are legitimate, lawful and many times in the best interest of their investors. Often they borrow stock or use a hedging strategy to minimize the risk of their stake without any intention to affect the votes of the companies. They also say that if institutions can make money by lending shares, there shouldn't be a judgment against those who borrow.

"You should be able to vote your shares irrationally if you want," says Mark Weingarten, a partner in New York with law firm Schulte Roth & Zable who advises hedge funds. He adds, "The rules and state law simply haven't caught up with the marketplace for sophisticated trading techniques. They never contemplated the slicing and dicing of ownership and voting power that's done in the marketplace."

It's routine for hedge funds and other investors to borrow shares to vote them. Many individual investors hold their shares in margin accounts with their brokers. Brokers lend those shares out, often when they are requested by short-sellers, who borrow shares in the expectation the price will fall, sell them and hope to profit by buying them back at a lower price.

The California Public Employees' Retirement System reported in October that it made $129.4 million in net income from lending securities for the year ending March 31, 2006. Critics say investors like Calpers shouldn't lend their shares if borrowers will use them in ways to undermine corporate governance. Proponents of securities lending say Calpers and other institutional investors have a fiduciary duty to make the most money for their constituents.

Not everyone agrees where the fiduciary duty lies. Lord, Abbett & Co., a mutual-fund company, has scaled back its stock lending program recently, saying it sometimes didn't get securities back in time to vote and decided that the money it was earning from lending out stocks wasn't worth it. "It was impeding our corporate governance efforts in a troubling number of circumstances," says Robert Morris, chief investment officer at Lord Abbett.

Calpers says it prohibits lending its 30 largest equity investments to make sure they will be available for voting, and on a second list monitors 300 of its largest so that if Calpers wants to vote the shares, it can try to get them back. A Calpers spokesman called those measures "a sufficient safeguard for our interests, for the time being."

Brokerage firms keep records of which shares are lent out when, and which holders of stocks are supposed to have the votes. But shares can be lent and re-lent and the records don't always keep up. Sometimes proxies are sent to both owners and borrowers, leading to "overvoting."

The New York Stock Exchange, which says tracking of votes has become inadequate, found overvotes in almost all the shareholder votes it tested at Deutsche Bank in 2002 and 2003: 23 of 27 instances. "There shouldn't be overvoting," John Thain, chief executive of NYSE Group Inc., said in a speech last year. "The question is, 'How do we prevent that from happening?' "

Last February, Deutsche Bank agreed to pay $1 million, without admitting or denying wrongdoing, to settle NYSE allegations that the brokerage firm didn't have proper systems in place. In June, UBS Securities, Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and Credit Suisse Securities agreed to pay a total of $1.35 million, without admitting or denying wrongdoing, to settle similar NYSE charges.

James Morphy, the head of mergers and acquisitions at New York-based law firm Sullivan & Cromwell, says because the votes haven't yet affected many outcomes in general corporate elections, companies haven't spent the time or money to dig deeply into who actually owns and votes their stocks. "To the extent there are a lot more voting contests, these issues are going to come to the fore," he said. As shareholders are getting more power in the wake of management scandals, votes are narrowing, which forces companies to pay more attention to who their shareholders are -- as have the growth and increased combativeness of hedge funds.

One way "empty voting" occurs is by borrowing stock ahead of the date that companies use to determine which stockholders can vote at a particular meeting. Record dates are usually set 30 days before a vote, designed to give companies adequate time to print and mail information to its shareholders of record.

In 2002, activist British hedge fund Laxey Partners, which owned a 1% stake in British Land, a major British property owner, sought to break up the company and oust its chairman John Ritblat. With a key proxy vote approaching, Laxey boosted its voting stake in British Land to 9% by borrowing more than 40 million shares days before the record date. By being shareholders of record on the record date, Laxey was entitled to vote at the next meeting.

In the end, Laxey's proposals were defeated. But Mr. Ritblat criticized Laxey for borrowing the shares, saying it wasn't good corporate governance. The three institutions that lent out shares -- Hermes, Barclays Global Investors and Scottish Widows, a life insurance and investment arm of Lloyds TSB -- apologized to British Land. Hermes says it didn't lend shares to Laxey but apologized to British Land for not recalling its shares and voting its full strength in support of management.

Since then, several large pension funds have taken notice and established internal systems to allow them to recall shares ahead of a vote and better monitor which shares are lent.

Because corporate voting is mostly governed by state law, the SEC's main tool in voting issues is requiring more disclosure. "Empty voting" usually doesn't trigger current disclosure rules because they don't cover borrowed stock or derivative holdings unless an investor owns more than 5%. Many hedge funds own just shy of 5%, Mr. Hu says -- and then use empty-voting strategies to enlarge or hide their stake.

Paul Atkins, a Republican SEC commissioner, expressed concern in a speech this week that empty-voting and other techniques should be considered as the SEC looks to tackle other shareholder proposals. That could delay the SEC from moving forward in resolving whether shareholders are permitted to nominate their own directors on corporate ballots.

One potential solution is to give institutional investors better notice of important proxy votes so they can know to recall shares -- and the attached voting rights -- that they've lent. Some investors already write recall options into their lending contracts, but brokerage firms have advised it could make borrowing those shares less attractive.

DOJ_NMG_0122454

Professors Hu and Black recommend regulators require disclosure of an investor's complete stake, however it is held. Disclosure now "is so patchwork, you almost never see it," says Mr. Hu. "We need to get a better grip on just how extensive these practices are."

Regulators, however, don't want to disrupt the stock-lending market, and also have to be careful that any fix doesn't have the reverse effect that they intend. For instance, weighing votes by how long the stock has been held could curtail empty voting but disenfranchise individual investors, too.

Federal Agents Raise Ante On Overseas Corruption (PORTBIZ)

By Cathy Cheney

Portland (OR) Business Journal, January 19, 2007

Miller Nash attorney Chris Helmer: Using an overseas agent won't protect U.S. firms from bribery charges.

A push by the U.S. Department of Justice to combat corruption overseas means Oregon companies need to pay particular attention to how they win contracts with government officials in foreign business markets.

About a year ago, the Justice Department beefed up its enforcement of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act by devoting more resources to it, including several staff members whose sole purpose is to crack down on corruption in international markets. Passed in 1977 and amended in 1988, the FCPA prohibits U.S. companies from paying bribes to foreign officials in order to gain new business or retain existing contracts.

Schnitzer Steel Industries Inc. felt the act's new teeth last October when its Korean subsidiary, SSI International Far East Ltd., was forced to pay a $7.5 million fine for violating the FCPA and engaging in conspiracy and wire fraud. SSI Korea admitted to paying more than $1.8 million in bribes over a five-year period to nearly all of Schnitzer Steel's government-owned customers in China as well as private customers in China and South Korea, according to the Justice Department.

The bribes, paid to secure scrap metal purchases from Schnitzer, resulted in gross revenue of more than $602 million and nearly $55 million in profits on scrap metal sold to private-sector Chinese and South Korean customers during those five years. Schnitzer's earnings on scrap metal sold to government-owned entities in China during that period totaled more than $96 million in gross revenue and yielded more than $6 million in profits.

Besides the $7.5 million federal fine, Schnitzer agreed to pay $7.7 million in civil penalties to the Securities and Exchange Commission for violating the FCPA, according to the Justice Department.

The Schnitzer case illustrates the responsibility U.S. companies carry under the FCPA, said Chris Helmer, head of the business litigation practice group at Portland law firm Miller Nash LLP. American companies doing business abroad are liable not only for the actions of their subsidiaries, but anyone working on their behalf, she said.

"A lot of businesses think they are immune if they're working through an agent or distributor in a foreign country," Helmer said, but the FCPA requires U.S. companies to conduct due diligence to ensure their representatives obey the act's provisions. "You don't insulate yourself by using an agent or distributor."

In the Schnitzer case, the company agreed to adopt internal compliance measures that must be monitored by an independent consultant to ensure the company adheres to them.

Such measures already are in place -- voluntarily -- at Intel Corp.'s Oregon operations, where employees receive extensive, mandatory training about the FCPA, said James Jarrett, legal and government affairs director, who is based at Intel headquarters in Santa Clara, Calif. No third party monitors Intel's training efforts.

"Intel has scores of people working with government representatives worldwide, so it is very important that we interact with these officials in a way that will be positive for both sides," Jarrett said. "One base requirement is that we adhere to the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act and equivalent local legislation. Because we are governed by the requirements of the FCPA and similar local laws, we make sure that all of our people, particularly within government affairs, public affairs, and the sales and marketing groups, are well aware of the details of the FCPA and other government laws and regulations."

Intel employees are expected to screen local agents and consultants on an ongoing basis for FCPA compliance, and immediately report to their manager and Intel's legal counsel if they become aware of an FCPA violation. Employees who fail to comply with state, federal and international regulations can be fired and may be held personally liable as well, said Bill MacKenzie, Intel's communications manager.

Low Funding 'threatens' US Futures Regulator (FT)

By Jeremy Grant In Houston

Financial Times, January 26, 2007

The US futures industry regulator, the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, is at "critical levels" in its funding and staffing that threaten its ability to carry out its mission, a commissioner at the agency will warn Thursday.

The comments by Walter Lukken, a Republican who is one of five CFTC commissioners, come as the regulator faces calls from Democratic lawmakers that Congress extend its mandate to the vast over-the-counter energy markets.

There is increasing concern that the CFTC is struggling to carry out its existing mandate to oversee the exchange-traded futures markets, let alone be capable of expanding its oversight to the rapidly growing OTC markets. OTC markets are where trades are negotiated privately between counterparties, unlike on a formal exchange such as the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Such markets have grown rapidly in the last five years and are more lightly regulated than traditional energy futures markets on exchanges like the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Consumer groups, utility companies and lawmakers say the growth of OTC markets means they must be subjected to the same level of oversight as exchange-traded energy futures if federal regulators are to be able to detect and prevent manipulation that could affect the prices that consumers pay for gas and petrol.

On Wednesday, the American Public Gas Association, whose members are 950 public gas systems across the US, was joined by the Iowa public gas system in calling on Congress to enact legislation that would empower the CFTC to collect information concerning trading positions held by the largest traders in the OTC natural gas derivatives markets – as is done with formal exchanges.

"It simply makes no sense to have oversight of one portion of the market and no oversight over another, particularly given that the OTC markets are one of the fastest growing segments of the natural gas marketplace," the groups said in a letter to Tom Harkin, chairman of the senate agriculture committee, which is responsible for overseeing the CFTC.

However, Mr Lukken is expected to tell a conference on energy trading speculation in Houston that the CFTC's continued ability to apply its relatively flexible, "principles-based" regulation of markets under the existing scope of its mandate could be jeopardised if the agency is not given added resources.

"Despite record exchange trading volumes, employee levels at the CFTC are the lowest in the agency's 30-year history," he will say Thursday in a speech obtained by the Financial Times. "Unless the proper funds are dedicated to our mission, this regulatory tool cannot be properly utilised and could end up sitting idle, gathering dust while these markets and investors are jeopardised due to the lack of regulatory oversight."

The conference, hosted by the University of Houston's "Global Energy Management Institute", will focus on speculation in the energy markets, including the OTC markets.

Craig Pirrong, the institute's energy management director, said: "Government reports and private analysts have blamed speculation for recent [energy price] volatility, and they are advocating tighter regulations [of OTC markets]. Economists, on the other hand, believe that speculation facilitates the transfer of risk from those who are very averse to it to those who are less averse."

Judge Rules Against Former H-P Executive (WSJ)

By Christopher Lawton

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

A former Hewlett-Packard Co. executive who accused the giant printer and computer maker of paying an informant to gain information about rival Dell Inc., among other things, was ordered to withdraw his counterclaim against the company on Thursday.

Judge Michael Schneider of the Eastern District Court of Texas, Tyler Division, ruled that former H-P vice president Karl Kamb, Jr. must withdraw his counterclaim against H-P filed on Jan. 19th. In the counterclaim, under which Mr. Kamb alleges breach of contract and emotional distress and was seeking an unspecified amount in damages, the former executive said the Palo Alto, Calif., company had instructed him to covertly gather information about Dell's planned entry into the printer market in 2002.

H-P gave a monthly stipend to one informant, Katsumi Iizuka, the former president of Dell Japan, in the form of payments to a company called Dinner Inc., the claim asserts. H-P later investigated Mr. Kamb for misappropriated funds intended for Dinner, according to the claim.

Mr. Kamb also says H-P attempted to illegally gain access to his phone records through pretexting, a tactic the company used to obtain phone records for its own board members and others in a boardroom scandal last year. Subsequently, Mr. Kamb was terminated and denied his severance package.

Mr. Kamb's counterclaim is a response to an amended lawsuit filed by H-P against him and others last August. In H-P's suit, the company alleged Mr. Kamb and a team secretly organized and began a competing business venture against H-P using company resources, contacts and trade secrets.

DOJ_NMG_0122456

In a statement earlier, H-P spokesman Ryan Donovan said, "This counterclaim is wholly without merit." Mr. Kamb's attorneys didn't immediately return calls for comment.

Dell spokesman Bob Pearson said in a statement, "There is no place for industrial espionage, and if we discover that we have been the victim of that we will consider all appropriate actions in response."

CNBC Defends Anchor Bartiromo (WSJ)

By Brooks Barnes And Monica Langley

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

CNBC yesterday moved to defend its star anchor Maria Bartiromo, amid increasing questions about her relationship with a former top Citigroup executive.

Earlier this week, the financial-services conglomerate ousted Todd Thomson, chief of its wealth-management unit, after Mr. Thomson's spending and friendship with Ms. Bartiromo angered Citigroup Chairman and Chief Executive Charles Prince. His concerns related to judgment issues, including improper use of the corporate jet -- one case involving a trip from Asia with Ms. Bartiromo -- and a decision to spend $5 million on a Sundance Channel program in which she would appear, according to a person familiar with the situation.

"Maria Bartiromo ... works tirelessly around the world in the service of business journalism," CNBC said in a prepared statement. "In 2006 alone, she made 46 public appearances on behalf of CNBC. Her travel has been company-related and approved, and involved legitimate business assignments. Her record and reporting speak for themselves." CNBC, a business-news channel, is owned by General Electric Co.'s NBC Universal.

CNBC says any trips by Ms. Bartiromo on the Citigroup jet were preapproved and fell under the "source development" section of its code of ethics. The channel considers the matter closed and says it isn't investigating Ms. Bartiromo's relationship with Citigroup.

For over a decade, Ms. Bartiromo has been a primary anchor and public face of CNBC. In the late 1990s, when the Internet was helping Wall Street become more accessible to millions, Ms. Bartiromo helped to usher in a new era of TV business journalism, bringing glitz and celebrity to what had been a staid genre.

Business-news organizations including CNBC have strict regulations regarding accepting gifts or payment from outside companies, or in any way compromising their ability to provide news coverage of those companies. Consequently, the disclosure of Ms. Bartiromo's ties to Mr. Thomson has drawn media scrutiny. The Wall Street Journal carried a front-page story2 Wednesday detailing the role of Mr. Thomson's relationship with Ms. Bartiromo in his ouster by Citigroup.

Dow Jones & Co., publisher of The Wall Street Journal, provides news content to CNBC. Ms. Bartiromo hosts the syndicated program "Wall Street Journal Report with Maria Bartiromo" but is a CNBC employee. A Dow Jones spokesman declined to comment.

Ms. Bartiromo has reported substantial pieces on Citigroup 11 times since 2004, according to a review of CNBC transcripts, including four interviews with Mr. Thomson.

Citigroup records show that Ms. Bartiromo flew on its corporate jets a few times, but Mr. Thomson tried but failed to get her on the jet on at least one occasion. More than a year ago, Mr. Thomson was entertaining some private-banking clients on a ski vacation at his home in the members-only Yellowstone Club resort near Bozeman, Mont. While there, he requested a Citigroup plane to fly Ms. Bartiromo to his house, according to a person familiar with the situation. The Citigroup official who was asked to approve the requisition rejected it. Ms. Bartiromo ultimately didn't make the trip, the person said. Ms. Bartiromo and Mr. Thomson declined to comment, according to the spokesman for both, Charles McLean.

Mr. Thomson has told colleagues that bringing Ms. Bartiromo to events was a great "business-building tool" with important clients.

News organizations often give approval for their reporters to take corporate jets if the flights represent a journalistic opportunity like access to a certain executive; the rule is to reimburse the company for what a commercial, often first-class, ticket to or from that destination would cost.

Inside CNBC and NBC Universal, according to executives and reporters for the channel, there is a feeling that the channel and Ms. Bartiromo have been caught in unfair crossfire from Citigroup. These people say Citigroup was concerned that Mr. Thomson might be leaking Ms. Bartiromo information -- particularly after the anchor broke the news that former chairman Sanford Weill planned to leave the company -- and therefore didn't distance her from the Thomson imbroglio. A Citigroup spokeswoman declined to comment.

NBC Universal executives say they gave approval last spring for Ms. Bartiromo to tape a portion of a Sundance Channel series examining the intersection of the environment and business. But the format of the series soon changed and by last July Ms. Bartiromo was no longer a formal host, although plans still called for her to appear. NBC Universal owns a minor stake in Sundance Channel.

This isn't the first time Ms. Bartiromo has garnered attention over journalistic issues. Last spring, Ms. Bartiromo ran into Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke at a cocktail party before the annual White House correspondents' dinner and asked him if his public statements were being misinterpreted by investors. He said yes. Ms. Bartiromo reported the scoop on her Monday program, roiling financial markets. She drew criticism because the annual dinner is widely known to be an off-the-record event. Ms. Bartiromo said Mr. Bernanke was speaking for attribution at the time.

In 2003, Ms. Bartiromo prompted CNBC to institute a new stock-ownership policy for its staff after she disclosed during an on-air interview with then-Citigroup Chairman Sanford Weill that she owned 1,000 shares of the company's stock. Most major news outlets prohibit newsroom staff from owning stocks of companies they cover. Ownership by family members is also strictly regulated. Under CNBC's new rules, staffers are prohibited from owning individual stocks and bonds, including stock in parent General Electric, unless such stock is part of a company plan such as a 401(k) or owned through a mutual fund or blind trust.

Anchor's Ties To Citigroup Attract Scrutiny (NYT)

By Geraldine Fabrikant

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

Late last year, an executive from Citigroup phoned an official connected with CNBC, the cable business news channel. According to people with knowledge of the call, the Citigroup executive made it clear that Maria Bartiromo, the popular CNBC anchor, would not be permitted to fly on Citigroup's corporate jet again.

Shortly before that, Todd S. Thomson, the head of Citigroup's global wealth management group, arranged for Ms. Bartiromo to speak to some Citigroup clients in Hong Kong and Shanghai. Ms. Bartiromo had flown home with Mr. Thomson on the corporate jet, bumping several company bankers from the plane.

Mr. Thomson was let go by Citigroup this week amid concerns over his judgment, his expenses and the way he handled some of his interactions with the CNBC anchor, including his decision to have Citigroup put $5 million into a multiyear sponsorship of a program on the Sundance Channel cable television network that would have Ms. Bartiromo as a co-host.

Ms. Bartiromo, by contrast, has the strong support of her employer. CNBC, which had said that her flight was pre-approved and that Citigroup was compensated, issued a statement yesterday that said she had not violated any of the channel's ethical standards. It called her "one of the most prolific and well-respected financial journalists in the industry."

Despite CNBC's blessing, it is unusual for a financial journalist to make a public appearance on behalf of a major advertiser. That incident and other associations with Mr. Thomson have raised questions about Ms. Bartiromo's judgment in getting too close to the people and organizations that she covers.

CNBC executives dismissed any suggestion of an ethics breach in any of Ms. Bartiromo's activities involving Citigroup. Neither Mr. Thomson nor Ms. Bartiromo would comment for this article.

The episode comes at an awkward time for CNBC. Having endured a long ratings and advertising slump after the last bull market, the network has been on a run, becoming a growing profit center for NBC Universal. At the moment, the channel has no competitors in the field of 24-hour business news coverage on television, but the News Corporation, controlled by Rupert Murdoch, has been promising for almost three years to start a business channel.

As CNBC's most visible asset, Ms. Bartiromo, who is married to Jonathan Steinberg, son of the financier Saul Steinberg, has become something of a celebrity. She has written two financial books and has a regular column in BusinessWeek magazine. And she is often seen at corporate or political events: she is spending this week leading the network's coverage from the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland.

Some of the events put her in close proximity to Citigroup executives. According to one of last year's guests at Davos, Ms. Bartiromo made the trip back to the United States on the Citigroup private jet on that occasion as well. She appeared at a Citigroup-sponsored awards event in London in 2005, as co-host of the event with another CNBC anchor, Simon Hobbs. Mr. Thomson represented Citigroup at the event.

One executive representing CNBC said that Ms. Bartiromo had made "no more than two" trips on the Citigroup jet. CNBC executives would not agree to be quoted by name because they said they did want to be seen as adding anything to what they considered an illegitimate inquiry.

CNBC also denied that Ms. Bartiromo had involvement with Citigroup more so than other businesses. In its statement, CNBC said, "In 2006 alone, she made 46 public appearances on behalf of CNBC."

The CNBC representative said that as the on-air figure most closely associated with the channel, Ms. Bartiromo routinely made promotional appearances at corporate events. Many of the corporations advertise on CNBC. Citigroup is among the biggest advertisers, a CNBC spokesman said.

Of the 46 appearances Ms. Bartiromo made in 2006, the CNBC representative said, only three were on behalf of Citigroup. The list of other companies with events at which she appeared last year included Google, Schwab and Dow Jones.

In no case was Ms. Bartiromo paid for speaking at the events, the CNBC representative said. The channel defended Ms. Bartiromo's travel arrangements. The statement said, "Her travel has been company-related and approved, and involved legitimate business assignments." The CNBC representative added that the awards event in London was a routine appearance for Ms. Bartiromo.

CNBC also dismissed any connection between Citigroup's sponsorship in the Sundance Channel program and Ms. Bartiromo's participation.

The CNBC representative noted that CNBC's parent company, NBC Universal, owns more than 50 percent of the Sundance Channel; so Ms. Bartiromo, an NBC employee, was a logical choice as host of a Sundance program. Her selection for the program came long before Citigroup's decision to invest, the representative said. She has since ended her participation in the program.

There are other connections between Ms. Bartiromo and Mr. Thomson. In 2004, she was named to an advisory board for the Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania. A Wharton news release then reported that Mr. Thomson — who, along with his wife, had made a gift of $500,000 to the Wharton Center to Support Leadership and Change Management — had led the formation of the advisory board, which included Ms. Bartiromo.

In June 2005, she and Mr. Thomson were co-hosts of a leadership conference at Wharton. A Wharton spokeswoman did not return phone calls yesterday seeking comment.

Ms. Bartiromo has drawn criticism before. In 2003, she disclosed during an interview with Citigroup's chief executive, Sanford I. Weill, that she owned 1,000 shares of stock in his company. Many journalistic enterprises consider it an ethics breach for reporters to own shares in businesses they cover, and CNBC tightened its guidelines soon after the interview. In 2006, she reported off-the-record comments by the Federal Reserve chairman, Ben S. Bernanke.

But CNBC remained supportive. "Her record and reporting speak for themselves," its statement said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Justice Dept. Announces More Manpower, Equipment For New Orleans (AP)

By Mary Foster, The Associated Press

AP, January 26, 2007

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — New Orleans is getting additional federal manpower and equipment to help its beleaguered police force fight violent crime that increased as the city repopulates following Hurricane Katrina in August 2005.

"The goal is to help take the pressure off local officials and to turn up the heat on these violent felons," U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said at a news conference.

Among initiatives announced Thursday morning by Letten and by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in Washington is a plan to have a "small number" of agents from the FBI, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the Drug Enforcement Administrations work with the New Orleans Police Department around the clock.

"These federal agents will identify cases that are subject to federal jurisdiction, provide the necessary investigative assistance to make federal arrests, and follow up with federal prosecutions," the Justice Department said in a news release.

U.S. Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., said she was pleased with the Justice Department's moves which tracked suggestions to Gonzales she initially pushed earlier this month.

"This additional manpower and technical assistance is essential to backing up the efforts of our local law enforcement agencies in the fight against violent crime in New Orleans and the region," Landrieu said.

"Additional federal resources and technical assistance is only one solution," she added. "More reform and coordination on the ground in New Orleans must continue. Only with across-the-board commitment and dedication to new solutions will we back down these criminals and win the fight."

Also, the department is extending funding for six assistant U.S. attorneys already assigned to the area to stay through the end of the current federal fiscal year; and ATF has obtained new ballistics equipment to replace the National Integrated Ballistics

Identification Network equipment that had been deployed at a New Orleans Police Department site, but was destroyed by Katrina.

"By the end of February, ATF will move the NIBIN equipment to the new ATF offices to facilitate use and access until the police department is able to identify a suitable permanent site," the Justice Department announcement said.

The equipment will allow New Orleans to link with over 200 sites throughout the country to compare ballistics information

ATF also will assign more agents to supplement the six ATF agents permanently assigned to its New Orleans Violent Crime Impact Team (VCIT). The FBI will add nine agents to its Violent Gang Safe Streets Task Force in New Orleans. Meanwhile, the Justice Department said, and the DEA temporarily has been provided authority to investigate and enforce all federal criminal law, in addition to federal drug laws. "This authority will allow DEA agents to assist the New Orleans Police Department in maintaining law and order in the City of New Orleans," the Justice Department release said.

U.S. Sen. David Vitter, R-La., also praised Gonzales' decision to address the city's law enforcement needs.

"My focus has been to place more federal agents in New Orleans and to get them to immediately coordinate with local law enforcement on the ground," said Vitter. "To end the reign of fear, we must protect our citizens and enable them to assist law enforcement."

Katrina virtually emptied the city of its residents when it hit in August 2005. The city has been slow to repopulate since then, and crime has returned along with the people. With a population estimated at 200,000, less than half the pre-Katrina population of 454,000, the city had 161 killings last year. That's a per capita murder rate of 81 murders per 100,000 people.

The rate was 56 per 100,000 in 2004, when the city had 264 murders.

The police force is down from its pre-Katrina level of 1,700 officers to about 1,400. But that number includes about 100 officers on leave for injuries or illness.

And Police Superintendent Warren Riley said during Thursday's news conference that the force is losing officers at a rate of about 17 per month. Better pay in other jurisdictions is luring many away, he said.

"The bottom line is other states are paying more money, giving them a signing bonus and housing opportunities," Riley said.

Law Enforcement Turns Up Heat In N.O. (BRADV)

By Joe Gyan Jr., Advocate New Orleans Bureau

Baton Rouge Advocate, January 26, 2007

NEW ORLEANS — U.S. Attorney Jim Letten announced Thursday that the Justice Department and a host of other federal law enforcement agencies are turning up the heat on drug activity and violent crime in New Orleans to get the “thugs and predators’’ off the city’s streets and into federal prison.

“We’re not screwing around. We’re going to bring all federal resources to bear,’’ James Bernazzani, special agent in charge of the FBI’s New Orleans office, said during a news conference at the U.S. Attorney’s Office.

Those federal resources include more manpower from the FBI, Drug Enforcement Administration and Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms as well as equipment to help the understaffed New Orleans Police Department battle a post-Katrina rise in violent crime.

Bernazzani and William Renton, special agent in charge of the DEA’s New Orleans office, both said their agencies will be targeting the “worst of the worst.’’

Terry Ebbert, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin’s homeland security chief, said residents should notice a difference by June 1 at the latest.

“We’re bigger, better and faster than the scum that’s out there in the street,’’ he said.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Letten announced in Washington and New Orleans, respectively, that the Justice Department is extending funding for six assistant U.S. attorneys already assigned to the area to stay through the end of the current federal fiscal year.

“The people of New Orleans deserve the opportunity to rebuild their communities without the fear of being victimized by violent criminals,’’ Gonzales said.

ATF is assigning more agents to supplement the six ATF agents permanently assigned to its New Orleans Violent Crime Impact Team, and the FBI is adding nine agents to its Violent Gang Safe Streets Task Force in the city, Letten said.

“The goal is to help take the pressure off the local criminal justice system and turn up the heat on these violent felons,’’ he said.

Meanwhile, the Justice Department has given DEA temporary authority to investigate and enforce all federal criminal law, not just federal drug laws.

DOJ_NMG_0122460

“This authority will allow DEA agents to assist the New Orleans Police Department in maintaining law and order in the City of New Orleans,’’ a Justice Department news release said.

U.S. Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., and U.S. Rep. David Vitter, R-La., applauded the extra federal law enforcement manpower dispatched to New Orleans.

“This additional manpower and technical assistance is essential to backing up the efforts of our local law enforcement agencies in the fight against violent crime in New Orleans and the region,’’ said Landrieu, who called for more federal agents in a 10-point anti-crime plan she unveiled earlier this month.

“I believe we can make strides and clamp down on the crime problems plaguing New Orleans,’’ Vitter added. “The increase in the number of agents to the Violent Gang Safe Streets Task Force is just one example of how this continued commitment from the Department of Justice will help.’’

Some of the technical assistance that Landrieu referred to includes new ballistics equipment that the ATF has obtained to replace the National Integrated Ballistics Identification Network equipment that had been deployed at a New Orleans Police Department site but was destroyed by Katrina.

David Harper, special agent in charge of the ATF’s New Orleans office, said the equipment will allow New Orleans to link with more than 200 sites across the country to compare ballistics information.

Feds Add Firepower To Battle Crime (NOTP)

By Gwen Filosa, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, January 26, 2007

More agents, equipment to help New Orleans police

Federal law enforcement agencies on Thursday vowed to team up with New Orleans police to solve homicides, quell drug trafficking, and walk the beat in an effort to win the confidence of families who call the city's most dangerous neighborhoods home.

The boots-on-the-ground plan, paid for and designed at the federal level, will double the number of federal agents assigned to New Orleans at a time when the city's alarming murder rate is exacerbated by a dwindling police force.

Agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation will patrol the streets with New Orleans police officers. The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives will add six special agents to its team of six permanently assigned to New Orleans, and provide NOPD with ballistics identification equipment to replace what the force lost to Hurricane Katrina.

"The goal is to detain, imprison, prosecute, convict and incarcerate these violent criminals, to take the pressure off the local criminal justice system," U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said at a news conference that drew New Orleans Police Superintendent Warren Riley and leaders from every federal law enforcement agency.

"This is a reflection of support for NOPD," Letten said. "We're giving them more muscle. Our goal is to get as many individuals into the federal system as possible and bring federal laws to bear."

In 90 days, the collective federal effort will review its progress.

Thursday's announcement, which came from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and was delivered by Letten, includes nine additional FBI agents who will join the 13 already assigned to the Violent Gang Safe Streets Task Force.

The Drug Enforcement Administration has been given added authority to investigate and enforce all criminal law, in addition to federal drug laws, with plans to hit the streets of Central City in undercover sweeps.

The U.S. Marshal's office will add three deputies and one investigator to its team.

Police are leaving force

The infusion of federal resources comes at a time when New Orleans still has the National Guard and State Police troopers embedded with local police, and after a recent shakeup among the brass of NOPD districts.

"We are losing about 17 officers a month right now," Riley said. "Our recruits can't live in a $1,200-a-month apartment when they're taking home $700 every other week."

Riley, who spoke briefly at Thursday's news conference, held in the downtown offices of the U.S. attorney, said the NOPD recruiting drive must be successful.

"We're at a point where every avenue is being covered," Riley said. "This city is at a critical point. We obviously have issues with crime and repeat offenders."

In New Orleans, federal agencies said their support of NOPD is nothing new. Since the 2005 hurricane season, the U.S. Department of Justice has delivered some $30 million in grants to New Orleans alone. In total, the department has made available more than $61 million for law enforcement relief.

DOJ_NMG_0122461

"We are going to increase and plus-up that relationship," said Jim Bernazzani, the FBI's special agent in charge of the New Orleans field division. "We're not screwing around. The people of New Orleans deserve a better quality of life."

Leaders are shuffled

A violent crime wave recently prompted thousands of people to march on City Hall. New Orleans has recorded 14 homicides this year. In 2006, there were 162 murders in a city that had its population nearly halved in the aftermath of Katrina.

The nation's top prosecutor also weighed in, saying his forces are here to assist at a time of crisis.

"The people of New Orleans deserve the opportunity to rebuild their communities without the fear of being victimized by violent criminals," Gonzales said Thursday in a statement. "Ultimately, New Orleans' violent crime problem must be solved by local leadership and the hard work of local law enforcement professionals."

The local leadership recently shifted, NOPD said last week. Assistant Superintendent Steven Nicholas will take over the NOPD Bureau of Investigations, leaving his post as commander of the Operations Bureau. Deputy Chief Anthony Cannatella will assume command of the Operations Bureau, leaving behind the Bureau of Investigations.

NOPD's 2nd District will be led by Capt. Kirk Bouyelas. Edwin Hosli has left that district to take the helm at the 8th District, which includes the French Quarter.

FBI agents have already joined the 2nd District, which includes dicey street corners in Gert Town and Hollygrove, said Bernazzani. Two of the added FBI agents will work with the NOPD's cold case homicide squad. The federal effort will zero in on repeat offenders and those on the front lines of the city's drug trade.

"Much like how we fight al Qaida," Bernazzani said. "We're identifying the worst of the worst. We're helping NOPD get in front of this. Where we can find the federal hook, we will."

Regain the public's trust

FBI agents will hit the streets with NOPD patrols, knocking on doors in order to build relationships with residents, he added, determined to end the days when citizens distrust police to the point where they neither want to cooperate with investigations nor testify at trials.

"It's going to break this yoke of the community not cooperating with law enforcement," Bernazzani said. "They will see cops caring. They're going to say, 'That's a crack house over there.' "

Citizen involvement is crucial to solving crimes, the federal contingent said Thursday.

David Harper of ATF said his agency brought back its 24-hour gun hotline, (504) 581-GUNS, or 581-4867, to allow citizens to report illegal use and possession of firearms. Since October, he said, the hotline has taken 1,500 calls, with 117 of them leading to investigations.

"One woman called to say drug dealers had taken over her house and she had to move," said Harper, who declined to release details of the pending investigation. A federal search warrant followed, with agents seizing guns, narcotics and cash from the New Orleans house, which the dealers had wired with a surveillance system to alert them to any cops riding by.

"The victim is back in her house and the drug dealers are out of the neighborhood," Harper said.

Thursday's announcement was rife with confident, sweeping statements from city leaders.

"We are bigger, stronger and faster than the scum out in the streets today causing this city heartache," said Col. Terry Ebbert, director of Homeland Security for New Orleans. "You can hold us accountable. We will make a difference."

Not a polished crew

Letten said New Orleans' drug trade is far from being an organized crime syndicate. Instead, he said, the city's impoverished pockets are held hostage by independent drug dealers who are all too trigger-happy and deprived of a decent upbringing.

"They come from a failed educational system and poverty, and turn to drugs at an early age and settle things with guns," Letten said. "We need to get these violent offenders in the federal system."

Louisiana: Federal Officials Pledge Help On Crime (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

Responding to an increase in violent crime in New Orleans, the Department of Justice announced it would assign agents to the Police Department “around the clock” to help identify cases that could be prosecuted by federal officials. In other federal efforts to help beleaguered local law enforcement officials, the department also said it would send more agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, expand the authority of Drug Enforcement Administration agents and extend financing for six additional federal prosecutors temporarily posted to the city.

Ex-Cheney Aide Contradicts Libby (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — A former spokeswoman for Vice President Dick Cheney gave testimony in the trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. on Thursday that directly contradicted Mr. Libby's version of events during a crucial period that is at the center of the perjury case against him.

Cathie Martin, Mr. Cheney's former spokeswoman, testified that she had a clear memory of telling both Mr. Cheney and Mr. Libby that a prominent war critic's wife worked for the C.I.A., days before he contends he first learned it from a reporter.

Ms. Martin was the fourth witness for the prosecution in the trial of Mr. Libby, who is charged with lying during an investigation of who leaked the name of the C.I.A. operative, Valerie Wilson. Unlike the previous three witnesses, who worked at the C.I.A. and State Department, Ms. Martin's testimony may prove especially damaging to Mr. Libby because of her perspective as a former insider in the vice president's office and as a former colleague of Mr. Libby. She repeatedly referred to him as Scooter, his nickname.

She testified that both Mr. Cheney and Mr. Libby were intensely interested in Ms. Wilson and her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV, who had been sent to Africa to investigate reports that Saddam Hussein was trying to buy uranium from Niger for his nuclear weapons program.

Ms. Martin, who no longer works for Mr. Cheney but remains at the White House as a communications assistant to the president, described how Mr. Libby had telephoned a senior Central Intelligence Agency official in her presence sometime in early July and asked about the Wilson trip. She said she was then put on the phone with Bill Harlow, the C.I.A. spokesman, who told her that Mr. Wilson went to Africa on behalf of the agency and that his wife worked there.

She testified that, later that day, in a meeting with Mr. Libby and Mr. Cheney, she related the fact that Mr. Wilson's wife worked at the agency.

Mr. Libby is facing five felony counts that he lied when he told a grand jury and F.B.I. agents that he learned of Ms. Wilson's identity from reporters. Ms. Wilson's identity was first disclosed in a news column by Robert Novak on July 14, 2003, just days after her husband had written a commentary in The New York Times asserting that the Bush administration had distorted intelligence to build the case for invading Iraq.

Ms. Martin's testimony raised difficulties for Mr. Libby's defense in two respects. She bolstered the prosecution's assertion that Mr. Libby was made aware of Ms. Wilson's identity from a number of administration officials. He denied passing her name to two reporters, but those reporters have told a grand jury otherwise.

She also described an incident in which his behavior appeared less than noble. She recounted a senior staff meeting at the White House in which Stephen J. Hadley, the deputy national security adviser, expressed anger after receiving a query from Andrea Mitchell of NBC. Ms. Mitchell had heard that the White House was blaming the C.I.A. for causing the president to inaccurately say in his State of the Union address that the British government had confirmed Iraq's efforts to buy uranium in Africa.

Ms. Martin made it clear earlier on Thursday that it was Mr. Libby who had gone out of his way to take on the task of speaking to Ms. Mitchell about that issue.

But at the July meeting in the White House, she said, Mr. Hadley made a point of turning around and looking directly at her as if to signify he knew she was Ms. Mitchell's source.

Ms. Martin was asked by Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the prosecutor, whether she was, in fact, the source.

"No," she said.

Mr. Fitzgerald asked what Mr. Libby was doing when Mr. Hadley was all but accusing her.

"He was looking down at the floor," she said.

At the end of the meeting, she said, Mr. Hadley took her and other press aides aside and upbraided them further.

Theodore V. Wells Jr., Mr. Libby's chief lawyer, in his cross-examination of Ms. Martin, tried to challenge her memory, as he has done with other witnesses. He noted that she originally told investigators that she spoke to Mr. Harlow sometime after July 7. But she has since acknowledged it must have been earlier because she recognized Mr. Wilson when he appeared on the NBC news program "Meet the Press" on July 7 to make his charges about the administration.

Over all, however, Ms. Martin was a self-assured witness whose testimony appeared to have frayed Mr. Libby's version of events. She is also a loyal Republican who was recruited to work for the vice president by Mary Matalin, a close friend of both Mr. Libby and Mr. Cheney.

DOJ_NMG_0122463

She is married to Kevin Martin, the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, and now works as the deputy director of communications for policy and planning for President Bush.

Her cross-examination will continue when the trial resumes Monday. She will be followed on the witness stand by Ari Fleischer, the former White House press secretary.

Cheney's Key Role In Leak Case Detailed (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON — In the first such account from Vice President Dick Cheney's inner circle, a former aide testified Thursday that Cheney personally directed the effort to discredit an administration critic by having calls made to reporters in 2003.

Cheney dictated detailed "talking points" for his chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, and others on how they could impugn the critic's credibility, said Catherine J. Martin, who was the vice president's top press aide at the time.

Libby is on trial on charges of obstructing an investigation into how the name of a CIA operative, Valerie Plame, became public. The government says her identity emerged in conversations Libby had with several reporters. It is illegal to knowingly divulge the name of a CIA employee.

Plame's name came up in the conversations because she is the wife of former envoy Joseph C. Wilson IV, the critic whom the administration was trying to attack after he publicly raised questions about the intelligence used to justify the invasion of Iraq.

Martin, who is now deputy White House director of communications for policy and planning, testified as a prosecution witness on the third day of Libby's trial. She became the third witness to testify that they had told Libby of Plame's identity well before Libby spoke with the reporters.

That contradicts Libby's statement that he learned of Plame's identity from one of the reporters, Tim Russert of NBC News. Libby is charged with lying to federal agents looking into the leak of Plame's name.

The events unfolded after a New York Times columnist reported in May 2003 that an unnamed diplomat had been sent to Niger the previous year to investigate reports that Saddam Hussein had tried to buy uranium from Africa, and found that the reports were wrong. President Bush's State of the Union speech in January 2003 contained the uranium assertion.

Libby learned that the unnamed diplomat was Wilson, a former ambassador.

Cheney's active role in the campaign to undermine Wilson has been known, but Martin's testimony was the first inside account of the administration's attempts to manage the affair.

Martin said she learned that Plame worked for the CIA after Libby directed her to call the agency to get more information about Wilson's trip to Niger. Martin said she quickly reported the information about Plame to Libby and Cheney.

She described details of a White House media strategy, designed at the highest levels, that sought to rebut charges that Bush had misled the public in his January 2003 speech.

Martin said Cheney's talking points disputed Wilson's allegation that Cheney had authorized the trip to Niger. They also included information from a secret National Intelligence Estimate.

The vice president ordered press aides to start tracking press coverage closely, while Libby was directed to contact reporters. At one point, the vice president gave a note card to Libby with information to give to a Time magazine reporter covering the case, while Cheney and Libby were returning on Air Force Two from the christening of an aircraft carrier.

Martin also described how she discussed with Libby media "options" to rebut Wilson that included a strategic "leak" to a handful of reporters.

But Martin said that neither Cheney nor Libby had suggested that the identity of Plame be divulged as part of the game plan. She said that she had no knowledge of either actually doing so.

"I recall the vice president telling me to keep track of this story, and keep track of the commentators who were continuing to write on this story and talk about us," Martin testified. "We were paying attention to 'Hardball With Chris Matthews' because he had been talking about it a lot."

She described the reaction inside the administration as questions began to be raised, starting in May 2003. The New York Times column said the administration had engaged in a "campaign of wholesale deceit" and suggested that Cheney was directly involved.

Martin said Libby asked her to call the then-chief public affairs officer at the CIA, William Harlow, to find out about the trip by Wilson.

"So I was saying, 'Who sent him? Who is this guy?' " Martin testified. "I remember Bill Harlow saying his name was Joe Wilson, he was a charge in Baghdad, and his wife works over here."

Martin said she promptly went to see Cheney and Libby with the news.

DOJ_NMG_0122464

Wilson published an op-ed column in the New York Times on July 6, 2003, describing his trip. The same day, he aired his concerns on the NBC program "Meet the Press." Almost immediately, Martin said she was huddling again with Cheney about how to respond to a surge in press inquires.

"He dictated to me what he wanted to say," Martin said.

The detailed response covered eight points, including a reference to a sensitive intelligence-community assessment. Martin testified that she was "not sure if I could use that point" because she believed at the time that the report was classified.

Later, she said, she discussed with Cheney and Libby how she had learned from Harlow that two network reporters were writing stories about the case, and how Cheney ordered Libby to call them personally, including one call that Libby made from his private anteroom outside of Cheney's office.

"I was aggravated that Scooter was calling the reporters and that I wasn't," Martin said.

The trial is expected to resume Monday with testimony from former White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer.

Leak case timeline

I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is being tried on five counts related to the leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's name in 2003. Some important events in the case:

2003:

· Jan. 28: President Bush says in his State of the Union address: "The British government has learned that Saddam Hussein recently sought significant quantities of uranium from Africa."

· May 6: New York Times columnist Nicholas D. Kristof reports that a former ambassador, whom he does not name, had been sent to Niger in 2002 to investigate the uranium report. The column says the former envoy reported to the CIA and State Department well before Bush's speech that the uranium story was unequivocally wrong and was based on forged documents.

· May 29: Libby asks Marc Grossman, an undersecretary of State, for information about the ambassador's travel to Niger. Grossman later tells Libby that Joseph C. Wilson IV is the former ambassador.

· June 11 or 12: Grossman tells Libby that Wilson's wife works at the CIA and that State Department personnel are saying Wilson's wife was involved in planning the trip. A senior CIA officer gives him similar information.

· July 6: The New York Times publishes an opinion piece by Wilson titled "What I Didn't Find in Africa," and he appears on NBC's "Meet the Press." Wilson said he doubted Iraq had obtained uranium from Niger recently and thought Cheney's office was told of the results of his trip.

· July 7: Libby meets with then-White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer. Libby notes that Wilson's wife works at the CIA and that the information is not widely known.

· July 8: Libby meets with Miller again and tells her that he believes Wilson's wife works for the CIA.

· July 12: Libby speaks to Time magazine's Matthew Cooper and confirms to him that he has heard that Wilson's wife was involved in sending Wilson on the trip. Libby also speaks to Miller and discusses Wilson's wife and says that she works at the CIA.

· July 14: Syndicated columnist Robert Novak reports that Wilson's wife is a CIA operative on weapons of mass destruction and that two senior administration officials, whom Novak does not name, said she suggested sending her husband to Niger to investigate the uranium story.

· Sept. 26: A criminal investigation is authorized to determine who leaked Plame's identity to reporters. Disclosing the identity of CIA operatives is illegal.

· Oct. 14 and Nov. 26: Libby is interviewed by FBI agents.

2005:

· Oct. 28: Libby is indicted on five counts: obstruction of justice and two counts each of false statement and perjury.

2006:

DOJ_NMG_0122465

· Sept. 7: Former Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage admits he leaked Plame's identity to Novak and to Bob Woodward of the Washington Post. Armitage says he did not realize Plame's job was covert. Woodward taped his June 13, 2003, interview with Armitage.

Ex-spokeswoman Contradicts Libby Account (AP)

By Michael J. Sniffen

AP, January 26, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney's spokeswoman testified Thursday she told I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby that a prominent war critic's wife was a CIA employee earlier than Libby has said he first learned it from a reporter.

On the third day of Libby's trial, Cathie Martin became the first member of Cheney's inner circle to contradict statements by Libby that led to the charges he lied to the FBI and a grand jury investigating who leaked the wife's identity to reporters in 2003.

Theodore Wells, defense lawyer for Cheney's former chief of staff, quickly sought to limit any damage from the testimony of Cheney's former assistant for public affairs.

Wells got Martin to acknowledge that she herself could not recall for sure whether she relayed the information about CIA operative Valerie Plame, wife of Iraq war critic Joseph Wilson, to Cheney and Libby on June 11, 2003, or as late as July 6, 2003.

The date is important because Libby told investigators he first heard of Plame's job from NBC reporter Tim Russert on July 10. Libby claims that because he was preoccupied with pressing national security issues, he simply forgot he had earlier learned about her work at CIA from government officials.

Besides Martin, one State Department and two CIA officials testified earlier to conversations with Libby about Plame before July 10, 2003. The defense tried to show each had imperfect memories

On Thursday morning, a legal argument between Wells and prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald outside the jury's presence increased the likelihood that Libby will testify. Fitzgerald argued that Wells was trying to get the memory defense into evidence "with no guarantee of Mr. Libby testifying" and being subject to cross-examination about his memory.

But U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton warned, "I will not permit the defense to argue the memory defense at closing if Mr. Libby does not testify."

Martin provided an inside look at how intensely Cheney, Libby and other administration officials worked on responding to the firestorm of criticism that developed months after the war began in March 2003 when Wilson called into question President Bush's justifications.

Wilson claimed that questions from Cheney were the reason he was sent by the CIA to Niger in 2002 to investigate reports Iraq tried to buy uranium for nuclear weapons. But Wilson said he debunked the story long before Bush used it in his State of the Union address in January 2003 to help justify the war. Also, the ex-ambassador said he assumed Cheney was aware of his conclusions.

Fitzgerald got Martin to testify that Cheney personally wrote out statements and talking points for Libby and other aides to give to reporters to deny he was behind Wilson's trip or ever learned Wilson's conclusions.

Martin testified Cheney also wanted to tell reporters that U.S. intelligence agencies concluded in a formal National Intelligence Estimate in October 2002 that Iraq did seek uranium.

Plame actually conceived the idea for the trip in response to interest from Cheney and the State and Defense Departments, a CIA witness has testified.

Fitzgerald says Libby discussed Plame's job and role with reporters as part of the White House effort to discredit Wilson.

But under Wells' cross-examination, Martin testified she had no knowledge that Libby ever discussed Plame's job with any reporter. She also said Cheney ordered her to get all the facts out, but she did not think Plame's role was part of the story she had to tell.

"It didn't seem appropriate or helpful for us to get that out," Martin testified. "It gave me some explanation" of the affair, but "we didn't need it as a talking point."

Martin testified that sometime after Wilson's claims first emerged, attributed to an unnamed ex-ambassador, in a New York Times column on May 6, 2003, she called CIA spokesman Bill Harlow to sort out the genesis of the mission.

She said Harlow told her Wilson's wife worked for the CIA. She said she immediately went to the vice president's office and told Cheney and Libby about it. She did not recall their response.

Martin testified that the Harlow conversation occurred no later than July 6 because she was not surprised to see Wilson discussing the affair on NBC's "Meet the Press" on that date. But Wells got her to acknowledge "it makes sense to me" she might have talked about Plame with Harlow on June 11, when government telephone records show they talked.

Cheney Scripted Libby Response, Ex-aide Says (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0122466

By Richard Willing
USA Today, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON — Vice President Cheney personally directed his office's media response to a critic who accused the Bush administration of ignoring evidence that Iraq had not sought uranium in Africa, a former Cheney aide said in federal court Thursday.

In July 2003, Cheney scripted quotes for chief of staff Lewis "Scooter" Libby to read to a reporter asking about a former State Department official's claim that the administration had ignored a report debunking the Africa story, former Cheney press aide Cathie Martin said.

Days earlier, Martin said, the vice president had dictated eight "talking points" for staffers to use to counter stories suggesting Cheney had dispatched former State Department official Joseph Wilson to Africa in 2002 to explore a report that Iraq had bought uranium. In a newspaper column and television appearance on July 6, 2003, Wilson said Cheney had ignored Wilson's conclusion that the report was false.

"It was decided that Scooter would call (reporters) to try to get into the story and correct the false information," Martin said. "That was (Cheney's) decision."

Martin, a press and policy aide for the president, was the fourth witness to say Libby knew Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, was a CIA employee before a conversation between Libby and NBC reporter Tim Russert. Libby told investigators he first learned Plame's identity from Russert.

Libby is charged with perjury and obstruction of justice for allegedly lying to investigators about his knowledge of the leaking of Plame's covert CIA status to the media. Such a disclosure, if made knowingly, can be a crime.

Martin said that in 2003, she and then-CIA spokesman Bill Harlow worked on a media strategy to deflect other critics of the administration's justification for the war in Iraq. Martin said that Harlow told her Wilson's "wife works over here" and that she then told Libby and Cheney.

Martin was the first member of the Cheney inner circle to testify about Libby's knowledge of Plame's identity. Her testimony could help prosecutors prove their contention that Libby made up the Russert story to cover for Cheney. Libby's attorneys have said he merely had a lapse of memory when he told investigators how he first learned of Plame's CIA work.

As he did with earlier prosecution witnesses, defense attorney Theodore Wells tried to show that there were problems with Martin's recollection of the events in 2003. Martin first said that she probably learned of Plame's identity in a phone conversation with Harlow during the second week of July 2003.

Using a notation from a CIA official's desk pad, Wells showed that the call probably occurred June 11.

"You forgot an entire month during which you knew it," Wells said during cross-examination.

Ex-Aide Says Cheney Led Rebuttal Effort (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Amy Goldstein
The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

Vice President Cheney personally orchestrated his office's 2003 efforts to rebut allegations that the administration used flawed intelligence to justify the war in Iraq and discredit a critic who Cheney believed was making him look foolish, according to testimony and evidence yesterday in the criminal trial of his former chief of staff.

Cheney dictated talking points for a White House briefing in the midst of the controversy that summer, his former press aide, Cathie Martin, testified, stressing that the CIA never told Cheney that a CIA-sponsored mission had found no real evidence that Iraq was trying to buy nuclear materials in Africa.

Aboard Air Force Two, on a trip back from the launch of a warship in Norfolk, Cheney instructed his chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, about responding to a Time magazine reporter who questioned how the faulty intelligence on Iraq had become one of the Bush administration's central arguments for going to war.

In the dramatic replay of events that summer that unfolded yesterday in Libby's federal court trial, Cheney was portrayed as a general on a political battlefield -- enmeshed in tactics, but also deputizing his chief of staff to handle the dirty job of persuading journalists that the war critic was all wrong.

Previously described in court filings and by the news media, Cheney's role was brought to life yesterday by Martin's account. She is the first witness in the case who worked closely with Cheney and Libby as they tried to refute former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, who was sent to Niger by the CIA to determine whether Iraq had sought uranium for a weapons program.

Her testimony was buttressed by previously unreleased documents provided as evidence yesterday, including handwritten notes and margin scribblings Cheney's staffers hastily jotted at their boss's instruction.

Lea Anne McBride, Cheney's current spokeswoman, said yesterday that the vice president's office could not comment on the case or the evidence introduced in the trial.

Libby, 56, is charged with lying to investigators and a grand jury about how the identity of Wilson's wife, CIA officer Valerie Plame, was leaked to reporters days after Wilson went public with his allegations that the administration had twisted his findings to justify the war in Iraq. Libby has pleaded not guilty, contending that he misspoke and that he forgot about conversations he had with journalists amid the crush of his duties. He is not charged with the leak itself.

Martin recalled giving Cheney and Libby information from CIA spokesman William Harlow that Wilson was the person sent to Niger "and his wife works for the CIA." Martin is the fourth witness from the administration to bolster the prosecution's claim that Libby had to be lying when he said he learned about Wilson's wife weeks later from NBC's Tim Russert.

Also yesterday, Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald told the judge he was concerned that Libby's defense team was trying to improperly introduce elements of its "bad memory" defense without putting Libby on the stand, questioning each witness about details that no reasonable person could remember.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton warned the defense that Libby would have to take the stand if he wanted to try to convince the jury that his own memory was flawed.

Martin's testimony also illustrated how doggedly Cheney insisted that the administration had significant evidence that Iraq was trying to acquire weapons of mass destruction -- even after the White House had backed off that claim and admitted it was not solid enough for the president to have cited it in his 2003 State of the Union address.

Cheney told Martin to alert the news media that a highly classified and recent National Intelligence Estimate indicated no doubts about Iraq's efforts to buy uranium. Intelligence analysts have said that the uranium claim was never a key finding of the NIE and that there were doubts about it.

On college-rule paper, in blue ink, Martin scribbled what Cheney told her reporters needed to know about the Niger controversy as they conferred in his Capitol Hill office on July 7, 2003. "As late as last October, the considered judgment of the intel community was that SH [Saddam Hussein] had indeed undertaken a vigorous effort to acquire uranium from Africa, according to NIE [the National Intelligence Estimate]," she wrote.

Martin, who now works on communication issues for President Bush, said Libby also directed her to ask the CIA which journalists were calling with questions about Wilson's Africa trip, then personally telephoned at least one in an attempt to influence the broadcast.

Martin said that Cheney also determined the reply to questions she had received from Time reporter Matt Cooper about the role the vice president's office had played in the Niger trip. While flying back from Norfolk on the vice president's plane, she mentioned to Libby the e-mailed questions from Cooper.

Libby later came to her seat in the back of the plane, holding a handwritten card with notes he said were Cheney's instructions about what to say to Cooper. Libby told her, Martin testified, that Cheney, in a rare move, authorized him to provide a specific quote on the record, with Libby's name attached.

Martin portrayed both Libby and Cheney as concerned that reporters were not telephoning their office directly to get their side of the story about Wilson and his criticism of the administration. She said they directed her and her staff to begin monitoring television reports on the Niger trip and provide daily transcripts along with their usual canvas of printed stories about the vice president's office.

Attorneys for Libby repeatedly pressed Martin to acknowledge that, though she saw Cheney and Libby working overtime to rebut Wilson's criticisms, she had no evidence that either of them tried to leak Plame's name to reporters.

"At no time did Vice President Cheney indicate to you that he considered Valerie Wilson part of the story he wanted to get out," attorney Theodore V. Wells Jr. said to Martin.

"I did not have a conversation with the vice president about that," Martin responded.

Vice President's Spokeswoman Questions White House Aide's Account In CIA Leak Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 26, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Vice President Dick Cheney's spokeswoman testified Thursday that she told Cheney and his chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, that a prominent war critic's wife worked for the CIA days before Libby said he learned it from a reporter.

Cathie Martin's testimony during the third day of Libby's perjury trial described Cheney's personal eagerness to refute war criticism by former Ambassador Joseph Wilson in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0122468

Wilson had gone on a CIA fact-finding mission to Africa, and on the basis of his findings he questioned intelligence President George W. Bush later relied on to go to war. Wilson has contended Cheney's office had asked the agency to undertake the mission.

Witnesses have testified this week, however, that Wilson's wife, CIA operative Valerie Plame, actually conceived the idea for the trip. Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald is trying to show that Cheney's office wanted to make her involvement clear to reporters.

Fitzgerald says Libby learned that fact on several occasions and discussed it with reporters as part of the White House effort to discredit Wilson. When FBI agents began investigating the leak of Plame's identity, Libby lied and said he learned about Plame only from reporters, Fitzgerald said. Libby is on trial on perjury and obstruction charges.

Neither he nor anybody else was charged in connection with the leak.

Since the trial started Tuesday, it has become clear that the jury will have to sort through conflicting statements in a high-profile case that has opened a very public window on the behind-the-scenes Washington practice of leaking sensitive information to the news media.

Martin is the fourth person to describe conversations with Libby about Plame and demonstrated the best recollection of the group. She is also the closest witness to Cheney's inner circle. Defense attorneys, who were to question her later Thursday, have used cross-examination of other witnesses to highlight memory flaws.

Martin said that Wilson's criticism was a direct attack on the president's credibility. Wilson says he debunked claims that Iraq was trying to buy uranium from Niger long before that statement ended up in the 2003 State of the Union speech.

Cheney and Libby were eager to refute that, Martin said. She described calling a CIA spokesman to figure out the genesis of the mission.

"We didn't send him," Martin recalled saying. "If we didn't send him, you must've sent him. Who sent him?"

That's when Martin said the CIA spokesman told her that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA. She said she immediately told Cheney and Libby about it. She couldn't pinpoint the date off the conversation but said it definitely took place by July 6. Libby says he learned Plame's identity days later.

Cheney took a personal interest in the issue, Martin said, and in the following days dictated media "talking points" making it clear that his office was not responsible for the Wilson trip.

The talking points do not refer to Plame, and nobody has been charged with leaking her identity.

Libby says he did not lie about how he learned about Plame, but rather honestly forgot.

In Ex-Aide's Testimony, A Spin Through VP's PR (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

Memo to Tim Russert: Dick Cheney thinks he controls you.

This delicious morsel about the "Meet the Press" host and the vice president was part of the extensive dish Cathie Martin served up yesterday when the former Cheney communications director took the stand in the perjury trial of former Cheney chief of staff I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

Flashed on the courtroom computer screens were her notes from 2004 about how Cheney could respond to allegations that the Bush administration had played fast and loose with evidence of Iraq's nuclear ambitions. Option 1: "MTP-VP," she wrote, then listed the pros and cons of a vice presidential appearance on the Sunday show. Under "pro," she wrote: "control message."

"I suggested we put the vice president on 'Meet the Press,' which was a tactic we often used," Martin testified. "It's our best format."

It is unclear whether the first week of the trial will help or hurt Libby or the administration. But the trial has already pulled back the curtain on the White House's PR techniques and confirmed some of the darkest suspicions of the reporters upon whom they are used. Relatively junior White House aides run roughshod over members of the president's Cabinet. Bush aides charged with speaking to the public and the media are kept out of the loop on some of the most important issues. And bad news is dumped before the weekend for the sole purpose of burying it.

With a candor that is frowned upon at the White House, Martin explained the use of late-Friday statements. "Fewer people pay attention to it late on Friday," she said. "Fewer people pay attention when it's reported on Saturday."

Martin, perhaps unaware of the suspicion such machinations caused in the press corps, lamented that her statements at the time were not regarded as credible. She testified that, as the controversy swelled in 2004, reporters ignored her denials and continued to report that it was Cheney's office that sent former ambassador Joseph Wilson to Niger to investigate allegations of Iraq's nuclear acquisitions. "They're not taking my word for it," Martin recalled telling a colleague.

Martin, who now works on the president's communications staff, said she was frustrated that reporters wouldn't call for comment about the controversy. She said she had to ask the CIA spokesman, Bill Harlow, which reporters were working on the story. "Often, reporters would stop calling us," she testified.

This prompted quiet chuckles among the two dozen reporters sitting in court to cover the trial. Whispered one: "When was the last time you called the vice president's office and got anything other than a 'no comment'?"

At length, Martin explained how she, Libby and deputy national security adviser Steve Hadley worked late into the night writing a statement to be issued by George Tenet in 2004 in which the CIA boss would take blame for the bogus claim in Bush's State of the Union address that Iraq was seeking nuclear material in Africa.

After "delicate" talks, Tenet agreed to say the CIA "approved" the claim and "I am responsible" -- but even that disappointed Martin, who had wanted Tenet to say that "we did not express any doubt about Niger."

Martin shed light on the mystery of why White House press secretary Scott McClellan promised, falsely, that Libby was not involved in outing CIA operative Valerie Plame, Wilson's wife. After McClellan had vouched for Bush strategist Karl Rove's innocence, Libby asked Martin, "Why don't they say something about me?"

"You need to talk to Scott," Martin advised.

On jurors' monitors were images of Martin's talking points, some labeled "on the record" and others "deep background." She walked the jurors through how the White House coddles friendly writers and freezes out others. To deal with the Wilson controversy, she hastily arranged a Cheney lunch with conservative commentators. And when New York Times columnist Nicholas Kristof first wrote about the Niger affair, she explained, "we didn't see any urgency to get to Kristof" because "he frankly attacked the administration fairly regularly."

Questioned by prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald, Martin described how Hadley tried to shield White House spokesmen from the Niger controversy. "Everybody was sort of in the dark," she explained. "There had been a decision not to have the communicators involved."

But Martin, encouraged by Libby, secretly advised Libby and Cheney on how to respond. She put "Meet the Press" at the top of her list of "Options" but noted that it might appear "too defensive." Next, she proposed "leak to Sanger-Pincus-newsmags. Sit down and give to him." This meant that the "no-leak" White House would give the story to the New York Times' David Sanger, The Washington Post's Walter Pincus, or Time or Newsweek. Option 3: "Press conference -- Condi/Rumsfeld." Option 4: "Op-ed."

Martin was embarrassed about the "leak" option; the case, after all, is about a leak. "It's a term of art," she said. "If you give it to one reporter, they're likelier to write the story."

For all the elaborate press management, things didn't always go according to plan. Martin described how Time wound up with an exclusive one weekend because she didn't have a phone number for anybody at Newsweek.

"You didn't have a lot of hands-on experience dealing with the press?" defense attorney Theodore Wells asked.

"Correct," Martin replied. After further questions, she added: "Few of us in the White House had had hands-on experience with any crisis like this."

Time Comes To A Standstill In A Courtroom Journey (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — The most politically charged criminal trial in the capital in nearly two decades crackles to life each morning in a bland sixth-floor courtroom with a stopped clock.

The clock reads 9:25 when I. Lewis Libby Jr. strolls in with a tight smile and a high-priced bodyguard of lawyers and starts perusing documents, scribbling notes and tapping occasionally on a laptop. It is as if Mr. Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is just the counsel, not the accused.

It reads 9:25 as witnesses from government's inner sanctums dredge from memory the declassified details of how, exactly, the country was thrust into war.

DOJ_NMG_0122470

A Central Intelligence Agency briefer, Craig Schmall, describes how he rose in the middle of the night to prepare a fresh list of terrorism threats and global troubles for Mr. Libby's breakfast. A Cheney press aide, Cathie Martin, recounts how she leaked news "exclusives" and arranged luncheons for conservative columnists to counter bad news.

And the clock still reads 9:25 when the fatherly judge, Reggie B. Walton, sends the jury home for the day with the usual reminders about avoiding news coverage of the case, a rule that may prove a particular challenge.

The frozen clock is an apt note in a trial that is a trip back in time, to the days in mid-2003 when the Bush administration first struggled with alarming news on Iraq: insurgent attacks were increasing, the fearsome weapons used to justify the war were nowhere to be found and a drumbeat was growing that the White House had twisted the intelligence.

The trial promises to expose the collision of Washington's power centers: the presidency, the vice presidency, the spy agencies and the news media. The first three days have been the warm-up act; the anticipated high points of the trial — the testimony of Mr. Cheney, Mr. Libby and several news media stars — will come in the weeks ahead.

Each witness so far has shed light on another kind of government tradecraft. Mr. Schmall of the C.I.A. told of returning from briefing Mr. Libby or Mr. Cheney with their many "taskers" — questions they wanted answered right away — and their gripes. Once Mr. Libby complained that C.I.A. officers were leaking to reporters about alleged pressure on the agency from the vice president's office.

Marc Grossman, a former under secretary of state, told of the burden of high-level White House meetings, for which he crammed like a graduate student over fat books of data. "I studied them like mad," he said, "and tried my best to hold onto the information for the time of the meeting."

Ms. Martin of the Cheney press office explained the nuances of "deep background" comments to reporters and explained her 2003 notes on tactics to counter a tide of bad publicity on Iraq intelligence. Putting Mr. Cheney on "Meet the Press" was one option, she wrote, but that would raise the critics' profile. Another was to write, or feed to a friendly columnist, an op-ed article.

And then there was the leak option, she explained. Her notes show she considered David E. Sanger of The New York Times, Walter Pincus of The Washington Post or a "newsmag" like Time or Newsweek.

But if you want to get your views out, asked Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the lead prosecutor, why not give the story to all the press? Ms. Martin explained, as if to a dense pupil, the irresistible lure of the "exclusive."

"If you give it to one reporter, they're more likely to write the story," Ms. Martin said. What's more, she said, "you can be a 'senior administration official,' " hiding behind the anonymous cover that Washington officials so often crave.

Sitting in the courtroom among his lawyers is Mr. Libby, 56, a veteran corporate lawyer known as Scooter, smiling at a passed note or a witness's quip and rarely showing any distress, even when the testimony seems to put him in jeopardy. His thinning hair has passed almost entirely from blond to gray. This once-powerful man turns out to be slight and short, no taller than his wife, Harriet Grant — one more note-taking lawyer herself. She occasionally leans across a rail to whisper to her husband.

On Thursday, Ms. Grant, in a black suit with a pink patterned scarf, sat beside Barbara Comstock, a former Justice Department spokeswoman who is the media consultant for the defense. It is an undemanding position, given the judge's orders to both sides not to discuss the case.

At the table on the left, in front of the 12 jurors and 4 alternates, is the prosecution, led by the rumpled Mr. Fitzgerald, who has a prominent bald spot and a knack for projecting righteous indignation even in the most routine exchanges of legal Ping-Pong.

His team of a half-dozen lawyers is imposing, but on Thursday Mr. Fitzgerald grumbled about the forces arrayed against him.

"There are 3 law firms and 11 lawyers on the other side," he told the judge. "Paper comes flying at us."

Lengthy legal wrangles — like one Thursday over whether copies of certain documents provided to the defense were legible — can make it seem as if time has stopped for real. But there are also arresting flashes of candor, as when Robert L. Grenier, a C.I.A. veteran, testified about his growing conviction that the White House was shifting responsibility for the war to the agency, a development he found deeply unfair.

"Yes, there was an attempt on the part of the White House to throw blame on the C.I.A.," said Mr. Grenier, who at the time was the agency's top Iraq officer and later headed the Counterterrorist Center.

And there are comic moments. In the midst of a discussion over flawed intelligence, Mr. Grenier misplaced his reading glasses on the witness stand. "I appear to have lost my glasses," he said.

Proceedings were halted. Prosecution and defense united, for once, in a bent-over hunt around desks until the glasses were recovered and the trial could resume.

Anti-abortion Extremist Convicted Of Violating Federal Law (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, January 26, 2007

(AP) - BUFFALO, New York-An anti-abortion extremist was convicted Thursday of violating the U.S. Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act by shooting and killing an abortion provider.

James Kopp, who is already serving a 25-year-to-life sentence on a state murder conviction in Dr. Barnett Slepian's death, was found guilty of targeting and killing Slepian because he provided reproductive health services.

U.S. law bars people from blocking access to reproductive health services by force or threat of force.

After the 1998 shooting, Kopp fled to Mexico, Ireland and finally France, where he was captured in March 2001 as one of the FBI's Ten Most Wanted fugitives.

A federal jury deliberated about four hours over two days before returning the verdict Thursday.

The jury also convicted him on a weapons count.

Kopp could face life in prison without parole when he is sentenced.

Kopp, who represented himself in the trial, stood with a half-smile as the verdict was read.

Kopp had tried to convince jurors he did not mean to kill Slepian when he fired from woods into the doctor's home. Kopp said he intended only to wound Slepian to prevent him from performing abortions the next day.

"If it happened the way I wanted it to, he would have his arm in a sling," said Kopp, 52, who also is suspected in the non-fatal shootings of three Canadian doctors and one in Rochester, New York.

A federal prosecutor said Kopp's long and careful planning of the shooting and his choice of weapon - a Russian military assault rifle - proved his deadly intent.

Slepian's wife, Lynne Slepian, smiled and hugged prosecutors after the verdict Thursday. She then left to call her sons, declining to talk to reporters.

Federal prosecutors will seek a prison term of life without parole, U.S. Attorney Terrance Flynn said. Sentencing is set for June 19.

"Hopefully, this will give (Lynne Slepian) what she's always wanted, that she will never have to go to any state parole hearings," Flynn said.

Most jurors left the courthouse without commenting Thursday. "He was guilty, and the evidence proved it," a female juror said on her way out.

"We just went by the law," a male juror added.

Former NBC Treasurer Charged With Theft (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 26, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-The former treasurer of NBC Universal was arrested Thursday on charges that he stole more than $800,000 from the company.

A federal indictment accuses Victor Jung, 34, of stealing the money while he worked in the company's offices in midtown Manhattan.

Jung, who was responsible for the company's collection efforts and for oversight of the company's bank accounts, stole the money by setting up an unauthorized company, NBCU Media Productions LLC, and transferring money into its accounts, according to the indictment against him.

Jung, who was charged with two counts of wire fraud, accused of using some of the stolen money on private flights to Miami, Antigua and the Turks and Caicos Islands, U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said in a news release. During the flights, Jung and his travel companions enjoyed delicacies including shrimp cocktail, Veuve Cliquot champagne and Mondavi wine, the prosecutor said.

If convicted, Jung could face a maximum of 20 years in prison and a maximum fine of $250,000 or twice the gain resulting from the crime.

Jung was to make an initial court appearance Thursday, though it was not immediately clear who would represent him.

A message left with a woman who answered the phone at Jung's home was not immediately returned.

Former NBC Treasurer Faces Charges For Embezzling Funds (WSJ)

By Chad Bray

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0122472

NEW YORK -- The former treasurer of General Electric Co.'s NBC Universal Inc. has been charged with stealing more than $800,000 from the company and using the money to fund private jet flights and rent a summer home in the Hamptons on Long Island, prosecutors said Thursday.

In a press release, the U.S. Attorney's office in Manhattan said Victor Jung, NBC Universal's former treasurer, has been charged with two counts of wire fraud. Mr. Jung, 34 years old, faces up to 20 years in prison on each charge of wire fraud. He was arrested by federal authorities about 6 a.m. EST Thursday, prosecutors said.

"He plans to vigorously defend himself against the charges and he looks forward to the opportunity to have a complete hearing on the charges," said Christopher Brennan, Mr. Jung's lawyer.

Mr. Jung, who worked for NBC Universal for about 12 years, entered a not guilty plea to the charges through his lawyer at a hearing before U.S. Magistrate Judge Gabriel W. Gorenstein on Thursday. Bail was set at $250,000 to be secured by $5,000 in cash.

Mr. Brennan said Mr. Jung left the company in the past six months, but declined to comment on the circumstances of Mr. Jung's departure from NBC Universal. Mr. Jung didn't speak to reporters after the hearing.

Prosecutors have alleged that Mr. Jung, who worked at NBC Universal's 30 Rockefeller Plaza offices in Manhattan, engaged in a scheme to steal more than $800,000 from his employer and use it for his personal benefit from about November 2005 to May 2006.

The government claims Mr. Jung, of New York, formed a limited liability company in Delaware called NBCU Media Productions LLC and wired transferred funds from a GE account to two different bank accounts held by the limited liability company he controlled -- about $575,000 in January 2006 and $238,450 in April 2006.

NBC Universal or its parent, GE, didn't authorize the formation of the company and had no affiliation with it, according to court documents.

Prosecutors said about $387,189 of the allegedly stolen funds were used to pay for private jet flights to a variety of locales, including Miami, Antigua, and the Turks and Caico Islands. Prosecutors said that the flights were catered and that Jung and his fellow passengers consumed shrimp cocktails, Veuve Clicquot champagne, Grey Goose vodka and Mondavi wine.

The government said Mr. Jung also used about $56,000 of the allegedly stolen funds to rent a summer home in Southampton, N.Y., and $87,416 to pay off charges to his American Express card.

"NBC Universal is committed to and vigilant about the enforcement of its compliance policies," the company said in a statement. "When we discovered the potential integrity breach, we promptly brought it to the appropriate authorities and are cooperating fully with the investigation. We will continue to monitor the situation to its resolution."

Judge Urges U.S. To Drop Plan To Seek Death Penalty In Case (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

A federal judge, at the close of the death penalty trial of a convicted drug trafficker with ties to the rap music industry, called the government's effort to seek his execution "absurd" and a waste of money and urged prosecutors to ask their Justice Department superiors in Washington to abandon the endeavor.

The jury was not present when the judge, Frederic Block of United States District Court in Brooklyn, made his remarks late Wednesday afternoon during a break in closing arguments at the racketeering and murder-for-hire trial of Kenneth McGriff. Mr. McGriff, who is known as Supreme, is on trial in connection with two killings in Queens in 2001.

"Will you kindly advise Washington that in this judge's opinion, there is no chance in the world there would be a death penalty verdict in this case?" the judge told prosecutors, according to a court transcript, which was obtained yesterday. He said his view was based on the intensity with which the jury listened to the defense summation and all the evidence. "If I'm wrong, I will have egg on my face, but I will not be incorrect."

Under the federal death penalty law, if a jury finds a defendant guilty, a second minitrial is held to determine whether that defendant will face execution or life in prison without parole. The decision to seek the death penalty in cases around the country is made by the attorney general in Washington before the case begins.

The judge said that even if Mr. McGriff, 46, is convicted of the killings, continuing to the penalty phase would be pointless and would waste government resources that could better be spent on probation officers, marshals and other services.

Going forward with the penalty phase, he said, would be "a total misappropriation" of taxpayer funds, "and I advise the government accordingly." He said he was speaking out because he believed he had an obligation to advise the Justice Department in Washington of his assessment of the case.

"And there's just no chance that 12 jurors will vote for the death penalty in this case, and I think it is good for us to save money, if we can do that, judicial resources," he said in remarks that were unusually blunt for a judge to deliver from the bench.

The attorney general can withdraw the notice of intent to seek the death penalty at any time before the jury's vote in the penalty phase, said Kevin McNally, the director of the Federal Death Penalty Resource Counsel Project, which coordinates the defense of federal death penalty cases for federal defenders' offices nationwide.

"I'm not at all surprised that the judge has made this suggestion, and I wouldn't be surprised if it was acted upon," Mr. McNally said in a telephone interview. "I think, from all the information we've received, this is not a case that should have been a federal death penalty trial to begin with."

Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for Roslynn R. Mauskopf, the United States attorney in Brooklyn whose office is prosecuting the case, declined to comment, saying federal rules prohibited the office from doing so during a jury trial.

One of Mr. McGriff's lawyers, David Ruhnke, would not comment on the judge's statements, saying only: "His remarks speak for themselves. We certainly hope the message has been conveyed."

Mr. McGriff's trial is one of three death penalty cases that are currently ongoing or recently concluded in the Brooklyn courthouse. One is the trial of Ronell Wilson, 24, who faces possible execution after having been convicted for the 2003 slayings of two detectives on Staten Island. Mr. Wilson's trial has received daily news coverage, while Mr. McGriff's trial have garnered far less attention.

Prosecutors have charged that Mr. McGriff, a crack kingpin who in the 1980s founded the drug-dealing Supreme Team and served time in federal prison, resumed his drug dealing upon his release and paid $50,000 to have two rivals killed.

At the end of the trial day on Wednesday, the lead prosecutor in the case, Carolyn Pokorny, an assistant United States attorney, expressed concern to the judge that his remarks, if reported in the news media, could influence the jury.

"I know that," he said. "I told them not to read the paper, and the truth of the matter is, is that because of the Wilson trial on the fourth floor, nobody from the press has been here today, and we're flying under the radar screen, for sure."

The judge added: "I have to balance this out. If I feel, as an officer, as a judge, that this is an absurd prosecution based upon what I have heard, I think I have a responsibility to let the authorities know."

Judge Calls Seeking Death Penalty Against Drug Kingpin A Waste Of Time, Money (FINDLAW/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 26, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-A judge at the federal murder conspiracy trial of a crack kingpin with ties to the rap music industry warned prosecutors that pursuing a death sentence would be a waste of time and money.

"There's no chance in the world there would be a death penalty verdict in this case," U.S. District Judge Frederic Block said.

"If I'm wrong, I will have egg on my face," the Brooklyn judge said Wednesday while jurors were on a break amid closing arguments in the guilt phase at the trial of Kenneth "Supreme" McGriff. "But I will not be incorrect."

Block advised prosecutors to contact their superiors in Washington and ask them to reconsider their decision to seek a death sentence. Even if McGriff is convicted in a contract killing conspiracy, going forward with a penalty phase would be pointless, he said.

"There's just no chance that 12 jurors will vote for the death penalty in this case, and I think it is good for us to save money, if we can do that, and judicial resources," he said.

A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office declined to comment.

The jury deliberated briefly Thursday afternoon without reaching a verdict. It was to resume Friday morning.

In the 1980s, McGriff founded the Supreme Team, a profitable and ruthless drug crew that became legend on the same Queens streets that later produced rap stars such as Ja Rule and 50 Cent. Authorities allege that after serving time for a drug conviction, McGriff resumed his drug dealing operations and paid $50,000 (â,¬38,526) to have two rivals killed.

His lawyer said that McGriff sought to turn his life around by producing music and movies with the help of Irv "Gotti" Lorenzo, a neighborhood friend who headed the successful Murder Inc. record label. At a trial last year, prosecutors had alleged Lorenzo laundered more than $1 million (â,¬770,000) in McGriff's drug proceeds through the label; Lorenzo was acquitted.

McGriff produced a straight-to-video film, "Crime Partners 2000" that featured Ja Rule, Snoop Dogg and Ice-T. The movie, about two hit men, was released in 2001.

Bow Out, Judge Blockhead (NYDN)

New York Daily News, January 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0122474

No federal court jury in New York has imposed the death penalty in half a century, and Judge Frederic Block says - openly and in violation of basic standards of judicial impartiality - that he wants to keep the string going for a murdering thug of a druglord.

Block is presiding over the trial of Kenneth (Supreme) McGriff, a notorious Queens crack kingpin charged, in this instance, with ordering hits on two rivals. Jurors have retired to deliberate as to McGriff's guilt. If they convict McGriff, the Brooklyn U.S. attorney's office will then petition panel members to sentence McGriff to death.

There is no weightier decision for any jury, and no legal matter demands more scrupulous adherence to the rules. Yet there was Block, exhorting federal prosecutors to abandon capital punishment proceedings, should they be required. As far as Block is concerned, spending a couple of weeks to take life-or-death testimony as prescribed by the law of the land would be a great big waste of time and money.

Said this Amazing Kreskin of the federal bench: "In this judge's opinion, there's no chance in the world there would be a death penalty verdict...from my observations of the intensity with which the jury is listening to defense summation...and all the evidence that has been presented or not presented - if I'm wrong, I will have egg on my face, but I will not be incorrect."

Block said he believes that McGriff "has been humanized" by the evidence. And several times, he directed prosecutor Carolyn Pokorny to tell the Justice Department in Washington that the death penalty should be taken off the table. When she expressed concern that the jury, which was not present at that moment, might learn Block had reached a judgment and be influenced by it, the judge declared that "nobody from the press has been here today, and we're flying under the radar screen, for sure."

For sure. For sure. Yesterday, after transcripts became available, Block was forced to especially admonish the jury not to read the newspapers. Likely the jurors will follow instruction, but that doesn't make it all right. Actually, Block owes the public a great deal more. Having prejudged the outcome, he really ought to surrender any capital punishment proceedings to a colleague who is not so openly and obviously biased.

By Mike Robinson, The Associated Press

AP, January 26, 2007

CHICAGO - A federal deputy marshal was indicted Thursday in the leak of highly confidential information about a government witness to a reputed leader of Chicago's organized crime family.

John Thomas Ambrose, 38, was charged in the four-count indictment with theft of Justice Department property, disclosing confidential information and lying to federal agents who questioned him about the leak.

Ambrose already had been accused in a criminal complaint of leaking information about Nicholas Calabrese, the key witness in the government's Operation Family secrets investigation of 18 long-unsolved mob murders.

Because Ambrose already had been charged in the case, the indictment had been expected and little of its contents revealed new information.

But the indictment did accuse Ambrose of lying when he told FBI agents on Sept. 11, 2006 that he did not recall seeing the name of reputed mob boss John "No Nose" DiFronzo in the file that marshals kept on Calabrese.

DiFronzo is not charged in the Family Secrets case.

Michael Marcello told his brother that he had a source within federal law enforcement and that the source was the son of a police officer who was convicted in the Marquette 10 police corruption trial of the 1980s.

Ambrose fit the description. Federal officials said his fingerprints were later found on the Calabrese file.

FEC OKs Kolbe Funds For Legal Defense (AP)

AP, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Retired Rep. Jim Kolbe may use campaign funds to pay for legal expenses related to his role in last year's House page scandal, the Federal Election Commission decided Thursday.

Kolbe, an Arizona Republican who retired at the end of his term last year, racked up the legal bills when the House ethics committee and the U.S. Justice Department examined his role in the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley's salacious communications with former House pages.

FEC board members voted 4-0, with no discussion during their morning meeting, to agree with staff advisers that the legal expenses resulted from Kolbe's "ordinary and necessary" duties as a congressman and thus could be paid with campaign funds. The amount of the legal bills wasn't available.

The ethics panel investigated what Kolbe knew about Foley's interaction with the pages after Kolbe revealed that a former page had once contacted him with concerns about Foley, a Florida Republican who resigned when the scandal broke. Kolbe said he told the proper authorities about the incident.

Federal law enforcement officials also opened a preliminary inquiry into a 1996 Grand Canyon rafting trip that Kolbe took with two former pages.

According to his last campaign finance report, filed in October, Kolbe had $143,586 in his campaign account.

More Willful Indifference (NYT)

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

Mark Foley fled his seat in the House of Representatives last September when his sexual approaches to teenage pages finally reached the news media after years of a shameful cover-up in the halls of Congress. Now it turns out that the F.B.I. was just as phlegmatic about the scandal as Mr. Foley's Republican colleagues. An inspector general's report excoriates F.B.I. agents for brushing aside "troubling" evidence of the lawmaker's flirtatious message-writing, and then falsely blaming their inaction on the watchdog group that tried to alert the government in the first place.

The report underlines the calculated indifference at the heart of the scandal. In their final hours in power, the Republicans who controlled the ethics committee issued a report that whitewashed the fact that key members of the Republican leadership and their staff members were aware of Mr. Foley's long predatory history. The F.B.I. inspector general's report showed the same indifference among law enforcement officials charged with investigating Mr. Foley's actions. The report describes one F.B.I. supervisor who said he had read Mr. Foley's e-mail notes and thought, "What a freak," but who had then sent the evidence on a fruitless bureaucratic roundabout.

The lug-headed consensus was that there had been no real crime, when — as the inspector general pointed out — agents should have been urgently alerting the page program's supervisors.

When the scandal finally became public, the F.B.I. falsely claimed that a watchdog group — Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics — had been uncooperative and withheld vital information. In truth, it had been entirely forthcoming in passing on full details from a former page who had complained about Mr. Foley's lewd predilections.

The new Congress voted to overhaul protections by mandating that an oversight board of surrogates be enlarged to include a former page and a page's parent. It will have an even balance of House members to end the majority control that helped bury the Foley scandal. The F.B.I. had better take stock, too, and treat Congress with less wariness.

Fmr. State Janitors Get Short Prison Sentences In No-work Scheme (BVND)

By Jan Dennis

The Belleville News Democrat, January 26, 2007

PEORIA, Ill. - Three former Illinois secretary of state's office janitors were handed short prison sentences Thursday for pocketing nearly $200,000 for work they didn't perform, a scheme a federal prosecutor says has left a stain on state government.

David Medvesek, 58, of Springfield, was sentenced to five months in jail and six months of home confinement. Dana Dinora, 53, of Springfield, received six months in jail and four months home confinement. And Steven Boyce, 59, of Chatham, was sentenced to two months in prison and six months home confinement.

The men also were ordered to pay a combined total of more than $148,000 in restitution to the state.

"I don't see any of these defendants as evil men or bad people. I see they made choices that violated the law ... and they have to pay the consequences," said U.S. District Judge Joe B. McDade.

The judge said at Medvesek's sentencing that he could not grant probation because he needed to send a message that corruption in state government would not be tolerated.

"The strongest message I can send is (that) you would do some jail time," McDade said.

Federal prosecutors say the janitors developed a scheme to report late for their nighttime jobs or to leave without taking approved time off, collecting nearly $200,000 in state pay for work they didn't do.

The men developed various methods to cover their absences from 1999 to August 2005, including leaving notes for other workers that said they were working elsewhere, according to prosecutors.

All three faced 15 to 21 months in prison, but received reduced sentences because they cooperated in authorities' case against Cecil Turner, a former high-ranking Secretary of State official convicted in September of helping conceal the six-year scheme.

DOJ_NMG_0122476

Turner, 60, of Springfield - former director of the Secretary of State's physical services division - was sentenced Jan. 4 to 30 months in prison on four federal counts of wire fraud and two counts of lying to investigators. He also was ordered to pay more than $49,000 in restitution to the state for money the janitors pocketed.

Prosecutors allege Turner helped the janitors collect unearned pay in exchange for special treatment by city trash collectors in his Springfield neighborhood.

Assistant U.S. District Attorney Greg Gilmore says the scheme has left a dark cloud over all state employees, the vast majority of whom he said are hardworking and dedicated.

"In a sense, these offenses have put a stain on that, and that's unfortunate," Gilmore said.

Medvesek's attorney, Jay Elmore, agreed the court needed to send a message to stamp out a culture of corruption that he says is "epidemic" in Springfield. But he said McDade could drive home the point without jail time, saying other state workers already have seen Medvesek lose his nearly $40,000 a year job, pension and benefits.

Each of the janitors lost their state pensions and have been ordered to turn over their own retirement contributions - totaling roughly $23,000 each - to help pay restitution.

Assistant U.S. District Attorney Patrick Chesley called Boyce's cooperation "extraordinary," saying he recorded more than 200 conversations with the other janitors that helped crack the case and ultimately link Turner to the scheme.

Turner received no financial kickbacks, but aided in the scheme because Dinora also worked for Springfield's public works department, where he allegedly arranged quick pickups of junk ranging from water heaters to a dog house for Turner and his neighbors, prosecutors said.

Defense attorneys said Turner was unaware of the payroll scam and blamed Dinora, who they contend took advantage of Turner's lack of experience after he was appointed to the $98,000-a-year job by Secretary of State Jesse White in 1999.

Turner and the janitors were fired after an investigation uncovered the scheme in 2005.

The three former janitors each offered brief apologies before they were sentenced.

"There was no excuse," Boyce said. "I know right from wrong."

A spokesman for the secretary of state's office did not return a call for comment Thursday. But White has said the cases send a message that his administration will not tolerate corruption and that workers who cheat will pay the price.

In Philadelphia, Cops And Feds Say, Violent Gangs Are Kid Stuff (PHI)

By Dana Difilippo

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 26, 2007

In other cities, gangs like the Bloods, the Crips and the MS-13 menace their communities with the efficiency of a business organization, with rookie "training," initiation rituals and a leader-soldier structure.

But Philadelphia's typical gang member is a school-skipper just getting his first mustache whose "gang" is his adolescent neighbors and whose crimes spring from turf battles with teenage toughs who live just a few streets over, FBI and city police officials said yesterday at a news conference about their joint gang-busting strategies.

That profile stymies authorities as they try to curb the climbing violent-crime rate in Philadelphia.

"Better than half" of the city's 1,800 shootings and 406 homicides last year were committed by such young neighborhood thugs, said Chief Inspector Joseph Fox, head of the police department's detectives. Last week's shooting outside Sayre High School, in which a 17-year-old student was injured by gunfire in an ongoing feud between teens from 56th Street and others from 60th Street, is a good, recent example, Fox said.

"Philadelphia is just saturated right now with these neighborhood groups whose affiliations are very fluid," Fox said.

Their youth and lack of organization make them "very susceptible to being recruited by more violent and more structured gangs," he added. "We don't want to see this [neighborhood thuggery] mushroom into something more organized."

Besides teenage toughs, the city's crime-fighters say law-breakers in the Latino community have also given them growing headaches.

The FBI is forming a new task force to ferret out and squash violent Latin gangs in Philadelphia, said Ron Hosko, the assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Philadelphia office.

"We know that the bulk of the illegal drugs that end up in Philadelphia comes from Mexico, Central America and South America," Hosko said. "[Latinos] are integral to the drug-trafficking organization, the drugs that get into the hands of people who spread violence in the city."

Three other FBI-led task forces - in which agents partner with city police and other authorities - focus on organized crime, black gangs and violent crime/fugitives, Hosko said.

Federal Prosecutors In Washington State To Review Homer Shootout (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0122477

By Dan Joling
AP, January 26, 2007

ANCHORAGE, Alaska - The police shooting of a Kenai Peninsula fugitive last year may have violated Alaska law, and the incident will be reviewed by the U.S. Attorney's office in western Washington.

Jason Carlo Jacob Anderson, 31, of Duluth, Minn., died in the shootout with law enforcement officers in the parking lot of the Homer airport. His 2-year-old son, also named Jason, was critically wounded.

State prosecutors announced Thursday that their office had reviewed the investigation by Alaska State Troopers. Prosecutors shared their findings with the U.S. Attorney General's office in Anchorage and the matter has been assigned to the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Western District of Washington to avoid conflict.

Anderson had been living under an assumed name with his girlfriend and their two young children. He was wanted on a federal arrest warrant for methamphetamine trafficking.

On March 1, Anderson was in a rented car with his two children at the Homer airport. Two federal marshals and four Homer police officers tried to serve a federal arrest warrant on Anderson and a shootout ensued.

Anderson was hit nine times. The 2-year-old was shot in the face and critically wounded.

Dr. Franc Fallico, the state's chief medical examiner, concluded Anderson was mortally wounded by gunfire. He also concluded Anderson shot his son before turning his gun on himself. A 6-month-old girl in the vehicle was not wounded.

Department of Law spokesman Mark Morones said ethics rules prohibit releasing any details of the trooper investigation or the prosecutors' conclusions while the case remains under review.

The Department of Law concluded the Department of Justice was in the best position to take over further review of the shootout, Morones said.

Exec Says Secretary Didn't Have Know-how To Do Coke Theft Alone (MH)

By Johnny C. Clark
The Miami Herald, January 26, 2007

ATLANTA - A Coca-Cola executive whose former secretary is charged with conspiring to steal trade secrets from the beverage giant testified Thursday at the woman's trial that he didn't believe she had the know-how to commit the crime on her own.

Under cross-examination by Joya Williams' lawyer, Javier Sanchez Lamelas stated that after Williams was arrested he met with Coca-Cola human resources personnel and told them he believed Williams "didn't have the intellectual capacity" to steal the documents or get them in the hands of a Coca-Cola competitor by herself.

Williams faces up to 10 years in prison if convicted of the single federal conspiracy charge against her. She has pleaded not guilty. Two co-defendants have pleaded guilty to conspiracy, and one has testified that Williams thought of the idea for the scheme.

Williams, Edmund Duhaney and Ibrahim Dimson were indicted in July, accused of stealing new product samples and confidential documents from The Coca-Cola Co. and trying to sell them to Purchase, N.Y.-based PepsiCo Inc.

The alleged plans were foiled after Pepsi warned Atlanta-based Coca-Cola and an undercover FBI investigation was launched.

Williams was fired from her job as an administrative assistant to Sanchez Lamelas, Coca-Cola's global brand director, after the allegations came to light.

Sanchez Lamelas also testified Thursday that Williams was cited on occasion for failing to carry out basic job responsibilities. He told jurors that Williams did not take "feedback" in a positive manner and that the two of them had arguments at times.

U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester, meanwhile, agreed to seal some Coca-Cola documents due to their sensitive nature, preventing the jury from seeing them.

Other government witnesses Thursday included a Coke database administrator, and a company computer forensic manager that investigated Williams' print logs for a month starting June 15, 2006. She and the two other defendants were arrested three weeks later.

Testimony was to resume Friday.

Coke Exec Testifies At Williams Trial (WXIA)

WXIA-TV, January 26, 2007

A Coca-Cola executive testified on Thursday that he didn't think that one of his former employees, Joya Williams, had the intellect to steal Coke trade secrets, and try to sell them to Pepsi by herself.

DOJ_NMG_0122478

But now Williams is charged with conspiring to do just that, on trial and facing ten years in prison.

Joya Williams wants the jury to see her as a hard-working, well-meaning, but inept Coca-Cola employee.

Just in over-her-head when she was executive assistant to a Coke vice president in 2005 and 2006 -- not the mastermind of a conspiracy to mine Coca Cola computers at company headquarters, steal Coke trade secrets and then try to sell them to Pepsi for $1.5 million.

On the stand at Williams' conspiracy trial -- Williams' boss, a Coke vice president, Javier Sanchez.

Sanchez was a prosecution witness, but he testified under cross-examination by Williams' attorney, Janice Singer, that he didn't think Williams had the intellect to steal Coke's trade secrets and get them into someone else's hands by herself.

Williams was arrested in July with two ex-cons who later pleaded guilty.

But Williams' boss said that just after the arrests, he was "in shock that Joya could have done something like that."

Joya Williams blames the two ex-cons, and says they stole the Coke documents from her, without her knowledge.

But the prosecutor showed Sanchez one Coke document after another that Williams admits she took from Sanchez's office to her home.

Question -- Did Williams have any legitimate reason to take the documents home?

Answer -- No.

On Friday, the prosecution expects to show the jury surveillance video and photos of Williams putting into her bag what prosecutors say were Coke trade secrets, and leaving the building with them.

Williams contends the documents she took home from Coke Headquarters were routine work papers for her own files, not Coke secrets.

The prosecution may rest on Monday or Tuesday.

Coke Secrets To Stay Secret, Judge Says (AJC)

By Duane D. Stanford, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 26, 2007

The judge in the Coke secrets trial said Thursday he will seal roughly 750 pages of company documents that the beverage company says contain trade secrets.

The lawyer for defendant Joya Williams has said she may want to use the confidential company documents to prove her case. But prosecutors and Coke lawyers have convinced Judge J. Owen Forrester that allowing the public to see the documents would harm the company.

Man Who Lured Teen Over Internet Gets 5 Years In Jail (SEAPI)

By Brad Wong, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, January 26, 2007

A 46-year-old Coupeville man received a five-year prison sentence Thursday for using the Internet to lure a teenage girl from Illinois to the Seattle area for sex, the U.S. Attorney's Office reported.

During the sentencing in U.S. District Court in Seattle, John Leonard Young received a stern rebuke from Judge Thomas Zilly. "The victim may never be the same," Zilly said. "You've taken her innocence away."

The case unfolded when the 14-year-old girl from the Chicago area attempted to travel to Washington state in January 2005. Young and the girl were planning to meet, prosecutors said.

But she ended up at Dulles International Airport, outside of the nation's capital. Airport police there contacted the FBI.

Young and the girl started using the Internet in late 2004 to communicate with each other, and they met in a chat room. Prosecutors said the two also talked by telephone.

Young described "bold, detailed discussions about sex," according to a prosecutor's statement.

Young also used his credit card to buy an airplane ticket to Seattle for her.But days before that flight, she went to the airport and bought a ticket with her own money.

Officials said she was upset about landing in the wrong Washington.

Young urged the girl to remove her computer's hard drive so her parents and investigators would have a difficult time finding her, prosecutors said.

With court approval, investigators searched Young's home and uncovered computer messages with the girl and child pornography.

At least one of his computers contained about 100 pornographic images of children.

Man, 2 Women Charged In 'Horrific' Case Of Delco Child Porn (PHI)

By Tom Schmidt

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 26, 2007

One suspect, John Worman, 39, of Colwyn, Delaware County, allegedly installed a video camera in his bathroom wall and videotaped four children as they used the toilet, undressed and showered.

Worman, according to an indictment, sexually abused eight other children, including five whom he forced to engage in oral, vaginal and anal sex, from 1997 through 2006.

Three of the children that Worman forced oral and vaginal sex upon were infants, one of them just three months old, authorities said.

He videotaped the assaults and downloaded the images to his computer, they added.

Worman and two women - Dorothy Prawdzik, 43, of Drexel Hill and Concetta Jackson, 44, of Collingdale, both in Delaware County - were charged yesterday in a 53-count indictment with producing child pornography.

The charges were announced by U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan, Delaware County District Attorney G. Michael Green and FBI Special Agent-in-Charge J.P. Weis.

Jackson, authorities said, knew about the camera and helped Worman videotape the four children between 2003 and 2006.

Prawdzik helped Worman video the kids by posing them in front of hidden video cameras, undressing them and having them expose their genitals, it was alleged.

At one point in the investigation, investigators got a search warrant for Worman's home and recovered more than one million images from his computer, including thousands of videos that Worman produced himself committing sexual acts on children.

"This was a long-term, planned and horrific exploitation of young children," Meehan said. "According to the indictment, the defendants allegedly manipulated and abused children, even infants, to satisfy unimaginable perversions, and they did it repeatedly."

Authorities said that during the period covered by the investigation, Worman had relationships with Prawdzik and Jackson, at different times.

The case was brought as part of Project Safe Childhood, which was launched in February 2006 by U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales.

It was described as a nationwide initiative designed to protect children from online exploitation and abuse.

'Preteen' Impostor In Video With Kid (AZREP)

Arizona Republic, January 26, 2007

A sex offender posing as a 12-year-old kept a video featuring himself and a child in his Chino Valley home, authorities confirmed Thursday.

The Yavapai County Sheriff's Office would not comment on the contents of the video, but the Associated Press reported it showed 29-year-old Neil Havens Rodreick II engaging in sex with a juvenile.

"I am aware they are trying to identify a child on a video," sheriff's spokesman Scott Reed said.

Rodreick, a registered sex offender from Oklahoma, was arrested last week after trying to enroll at Mingus Springs Charter School in Chino Valley. Between August and November, Rodreick successfully posed as seventh-grader "Casey Price" and attended class at Imagine School at Rosefield in Surprise.

The Dysart Unified School District saw a slight increase in enrollment at its schools this week as word got out about Rodreick's enrollment at Imagine School, Dysart spokesman Tom Herrmann said. Six families pulled their children out of Imagine School but two families have since come back, spokeswoman Rhonda Cagle said.

Surprise police have reported no cases of inappropriate behavior during Rodreick's time there, though the investigation is ongoing. Rodreick has also lived in Payson and posed as a 12-year-old.

Rodreick is in a Prescott jail facing charges that include fraud, forgery and failing to register as a sex offender.

Three men, two of whom reportedly had a sexual relationship with Rodreick, are also facing charges in conjunction with the con.

O'Malley Voices Support Of Bill To End Death Penalty (WP)

By Ovetta Wiggins And John Wagner

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

Gov. Martin O'Malley (D) said yesterday that he plans to work for the repeal of Maryland's death penalty this legislative session. But he and some lawmakers predict that the measure has tough hurdles to clear before it gets to his desk.

"I've had a pretty consistent position on this," O'Malley told reporters at the State House. "Now that it's salient, I'm certainly not going to try to duck or hide. I would like to see us repeal the death penalty."

O'Malley's comments came in response to an announcement by two lawmakers that they would introduce legislation to abolish the death penalty and replace it with a sanction of life in prison without the possibility of parole. The bills were filed yesterday.

Lisa A. Gladden (D-Baltimore), the lead sponsor in the Senate, said that by her count, the measure was one vote shy of getting out of the judicial proceedings committee.

"I don't think it's totally out of the question that we could pass a repeal bill this year," said Gladden, a public defender, who has introduced similar measures in the past. "I think other legislators don't want blood on their hands."

Gladden was emboldened yesterday by the group of lawmakers, religious leaders and supporters who joined her and Del. Samuel I. Rosenberg (D-Baltimore) at a news conference about the legislation.

The issue has gained prominence in the wake of a court ruling last month that halted executions in Maryland until new regulations on lethal injection are put forward by the Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services. O'Malley said that the process will not start before the conclusion of the legislature's debate on the death penalty bill.

"That debate needs to happen," O'Malley told reporters.

Senate President Thomas Mike V. Miller Jr. (D-Calvert) said he supports the death penalty but thinks there needs to be a "healthy debate" on the subject. He said he would not influence a vote one way or the other.

"I realize the trend is against the death penalty," Miller said, "but I think there are some crimes so atrocious that it's warranted."

House Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel) said he doesn't "have a real strong feeling one way or the other. We'll let the legislative process take place. . . . We've never tried to influence our colleagues on two issues: the death penalty and abortion."

The bill is likely to meet resistance, with some Democrats joining minority Republicans in opposition.

DOJ_NMG_0122481

Del. Dereck E. Davis (D-Prince George's) said he could not support a repeal because he had a gun held to his head three years ago.

Anthony J. O'Donnell (R-Calvert), the House minority leader, said he would not support a repeal and said he is certain that many share his position, across party lines. "We need the death penalty for the most heinous cases," he said.

Gladden and Rosenberg said they expected support from O'Malley, who has consistently said he opposes the death penalty. But O'Malley also has said that his views would not prevent him from following the law and signing death warrants.

O'Malley rarely mentioned the death penalty in his primary campaign against then-Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) or in the general election race against Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R).

O'Malley has argued that the death penalty is not a deterrent and that money spent on prosecuting death penalty cases could be better spent fighting violent crime.

Rosenberg said that a sentence of life without the possibility of parole would be an "enormous deterrent" to committing murder.

"The time and effort litigating these cases, that goes into legislating this issue, could be spent on preventative measures that make each and every citizen more safe in their home," Rosenberg said.

The death penalty repeal was not part of the 13-bill legislative agenda that O'Malley issued this week.

"There are good people who have strong feelings on both sides of the issue," he said.

Maryland Considers Repeal Of Death Penalty (WT/AP)

By Brian Witte

The Washington Times, January 26, 2007

ANNAPOLIS -- Maryland lawmakers said yesterday they will introduce legislation to repeal the death penalty, a measure Gov. Martin O'Malley said he would sign if the General Assembly approves it.

State Sen. Lisa A. Gladden and Delegate Samuel I. Rosenberg, Baltimore Democrats, are sponsoring bills that would replace the state's death penalty with a prison sentence of life without parole.

Mr. O'Malley, a Democrat who personally opposes the death penalty, said he "sure would" sign such a bill in favor of life without parole.

"We waste a lot of money pursuing a policy that doesn't work to reduce crime or to save lives, but we could be putting that money into crime reduction," Mr. O'Malley said. "I'm much more in favor of life without parole."

Former Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican, supported capital punishment. He reinstituted the death penalty after taking office in 2003, refusing to uphold a moratorium by former Gov. Parris N. Glendening, a Democrat.

Michael Paranzino, executive director of Throw Away the Key, which supports capital punishment, said a debate on the death penalty is needed.

"It's better to debate this in the open," he said. "We will be educating the lawmakers about the victims of murder. While I think that it's a difficult task, I don't think it's impossible."

Mrs. Gladden and Mr. Rosenberg think support for a repeal has increased, but said more votes are needed to get the measure through both chambers.

Kirk Bloodsworth, a Maryland man who spent two years on death row and was later released from prison because of DNA evidence, said yesterday he was "living proof that the criminal justice system makes serious mistakes."

Mr. Bloodsworth was convicted twice of killing a 9-year-old girl in 1984. He was placed on death row following his first trial. Mr. Bloodsworth was convicted again in a second trial, but received a life sentence instead of capital punishment. He was exonerated by DNA evidence in 1993.

Mrs. Gladden said the Bloodsworth case demonstrated a need for ending capital punishment.

The proposed legislation follows a recent Maryland Court of Appeals decision to stop the use of lethal injection in executions until acceptable procedures are developed with oversight by the Attorney General's Office and the state legislature. The decision came just days after executions were stopped in California and Florida over concerns that lethal injections might constitute cruel and unusual punishment.

No death sentences can be carried out in Maryland until the injection issue is resolved.

Delegate Anne Healey, co-chairman of the joint legislative committee that would hold hearings on the injection protocol, said the governor will decide whether members should take up the review. Mrs. Healey, a Prince George's Democrat, said she hasn't heard from Mr. O'Malley on the issue.

Mrs. Healey, who opposes the death penalty, said she's not sure lawmakers want to wade into such a divisive debate this year.

DOJ_NMG_0122482

Senate Minority Leader David R. Brinkley, a Frederick and Carroll counties Republican, thinks the lethal-injection review should be taken up to affirm the use of capital punishment in the state. However, he doesn't think the committee would bother this session, because lawmakers want to focus on budget issues.

"I think it's going to put it on the back burner," he said.

Another issue is a University of Maryland study released in 2003 that found those who murder a white person are twice as likely to get a death sentence than those who murder a black person.

There are six inmates on Maryland's death row.

-- Vernon Evans Jr. was sentenced May 15, 1984, in Baltimore County. He and Anthony Grandison were convicted in the shooting deaths of David S. Piechowicz and Susan Kennedy at a Pikesville motel.

-- Mr. Grandison was sentenced June 6, 1984, in Baltimore County.

-- John Booth-El was sentenced Oct. 18, 1984, in Baltimore. He fatally stabbed an elderly couple, Irvin and Rose Bronstein, in their home.

-- Heath W. Burch was sentenced March 29, 1996, in Prince George's County. He killed a neighbor, Robert F. Davis, and his wife, Cleo, during a botched late-night robbery.

-- Jody L. Miles was sentenced March 19, 1998, in Queen Anne's County. While collecting a debt for a loan shark, Miles fatally shot Edward J. Atkinson in the back of the head in the woods in Mardela Springs.

-- Lawrence Borchardt was sentenced May 23, 2000, in Anne Arundel County, where the case was moved from Baltimore County. Five years later, Borchardt was granted a new sentencing hearing. Arguments to appeal this ruling are scheduled for next month. During a home-invasion robbery, he killed an elderly couple, Joseph and Bernice Ohler, leaving the crime scene with $11.

Official Shot Movers In Self-Defense, Police Say (WP)

By Eric Rich And Ruben Castaneda

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

The movers arrived at Keith Washington's home in Accokeek on Wednesday night for what was to be a simple swap: one Marlo Furniture bedroom set for another.

An argument began between Washington and the two men and escalated quickly, authorities said. It ended when Washington, who is a police officer and a top homeland security official in Prince George's County, drew a 9mm Beretta and opened fire on the unarmed movers, they said.

Police said that they believe the officer, a 16-year veteran, acted in self-defense and that the two wounded men probably will be charged with assault, based on statements from Washington and a family member whom they did not identify. A police spokeswoman, Cpl. Debbi Carlson, said the officer suffered serious injuries -- she declined to describe them -- and required treatment at a hospital.

The movers -- Robert White, 36, of the District and Brandon D. Clark, 22, of Oxon Hill -- remained in critical condition yesterday, and Carlson said police had not heard their accounts.

Clark's live-in girlfriend, Leelee Best, echoing the sentiment of his family members, questioned the police claim that the movers were the aggressors, saying police "need to charge [Washington] for shooting them."

"It's stupid, honestly," Best said of the argument. "All he had to do was just tell them to leave. There are other ways you can handle it than shooting somebody."

Washington, 45, a former driver for County Executive Jack B. Johnson (D), has long been a controversial figure. He was sued in 2000 by a man who claimed to have been arrested and strip-searched for protesting Washington's rough treatment of a motorist; a civil verdict against Washington for that incident was overturned on appeal. Washington also was later temporarily suspended for alleged aggressive behavior during meetings of a homeowners association board on which he served.

Because of that history, Johnson was accused of cronyism and poor judgment when he named Washington in 2004 to be deputy director of homeland security. Johnson brushed off the criticism, saying that he hired Washington in part because he is "mentally tough."

Washington, who was released from the hospital, did not respond to messages seeking comment, and no one answered the door at his home. An attorney who has represented him before did not respond to a phone call seeking comment.

Yesterday afternoon, Best said a Marlo delivery contractor for whom Clark worked knocked on the door of their home at close to midnight Wednesday. "I knew something was wrong," she said, speaking at Prince George's Hospital Center.

Best said the contractor told her that Clark called him from Washington's house Wednesday evening to say that Washington was angry over a bedroom set that was being exchanged.

Michael J. Winkelman, an attorney representing the families of White and Clark, said a Marlo representative and an associate he believes was the contractor visited with the family at the hospital yesterday. The associate told the family that the movers had sought guidance from a supervisor about how to handle the clash with Washington.

"They called from the house and said he was upset, very upset," Winkelman said. He said the movers were told to "give the officer what he wanted."

Marlo officials declined interview requests yesterday. The company issued a brief statement pledging to cooperate with the investigation and adding that its priority is "the welfare of those who have been injured."

In a news release, police said both deliverymen were struck in the upper body. A law enforcement source, speaking on condition of anonymity because the investigation is continuing, said that White was shot in the chest, groin and knee and that Clark was shot in the abdomen. The Washington Post erroneously reported in some editions yesterday that one man had been fatally shot, based on inaccurate information from a government source.

State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey said two investigations of the incident will proceed on separate tracks: One team of police detectives will investigate the use of force by Washington, and a second set of detectives will look into what crimes, if any, occurred during the encounter.

Winkelman said he was not surprised to learn that police expected to charge the unarmed men shot by an officer. "It's the custom of the Prince George's County police to do so," he said.

Clark's girlfriend and father said their anxiety was compounded yesterday by the hospital's refusal to update them on Clark's condition -- or even, for most of the day, to confirm that he was a patient there. Winkelman said hospital officials told the family that "an ongoing police investigation overrides hospital authority."

Attempts to reach members of White's family were unsuccessful. Winkelman said late yesterday that he also could not immediately reach members of the family.

Clark's family described him as a gentle giant, easygoing and slow to anger. He stands 6 feet 4 inches and weighs more than 260 pounds, according to a younger brother, Nathaniel B. Saunders.

"He gets along with everybody," Saunders said. He said Clark graduated from DuVal High School, where he played on the football team.

Washington was a detective when Johnson, then the state's attorney, tapped him to become part of his security detail. He enthusiastically endorsed Johnson's 2002 bid for county executive, contributing to and working for the campaign.

Washington rose fast after Johnson's election. In 2003, Johnson named Washington to his transition team. In August 2004, he appointed Washington deputy director of homeland security.

The appointment came eight months after Washington was placed on administrative leave pending the outcome of an investigation into whether he hit a member of the Simmons Acres Homeowners Association during a meeting. The complaint was later dropped without legal or administrative action.

In 2000, a federal civil jury awarded $260,000 to the plaintiff in the civil rights suit against Washington and county correctional officers. The man, David Paul Maslousky, said he was arrested and strip-searched after he protested Washington's treatment of a man who had been involved in a minor traffic accident. The case was appealed, and Washington prevailed.

Last year, Johnson contributed to Washington's unsuccessful bid for the seat of County Council member Marilynn Bland (D-Clinton).

James Keary, Johnson's spokesman, said the county executive would not comment on the case. "It's a police matter, and it's under investigation," Keary said.

Panel Urges Leaders To Deal With Prison System 'Tailspin' (LAT)

By Jenifer Warren

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2007

SACRAMENTO — Three decades of tough-on-crime lawmaking has sent California's prison system into a "tailspin" that threatens public safety and could bankrupt the state unless leaders summon the political courage to act, a government watchdog panel declared today.

In a blunt and blistering report, the nonpartisan Little Hoover Commission called the hurricane of problems plaguing the correctional system the largest and most pressing crisis facing the state.

If policymakers are unwilling to make bold changes, the commission said, they should appoint an independent entity – modeled after the federal Base Closure and Realignment Commission – with the power to do it for them.

DOJ_NMG_0122484

"For decades, governors and lawmakers fearful of appearing soft on crime have failed to muster the political will to address the looming crisis," the commission said. "And now their time has run out."

The state's 33 prisons are packed to twice their intended capacity, with more than 16,000 inmates bunking in hallways, classrooms and other areas not designed as housing. Prison leaders say they will be out of room for new inmates by summer.

A federal judge, meanwhile, has given the state until June to relieve the crowding or face a possible cap on the inmate population, now standing at about 172,000.

While Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has unveiled an ambitious, $10.9-billion prison building and reform plan, its fate in the Legislature is uncertain and most of the proposed solutions would take years to enact.

Meanwhile, the governor's short-term program to ease crowding – transferring inmates to other states – is sputtering, because few convicts are volunteering to go.

In October, the commission noted, the governor declared a state of emergency in the prisons: "But even that didn't bring action, only more reports to federal judges that underscore the fact that the state's corrections policy is politically bankrupt."

In an interview, Commissioner Dan Hancock said the report's unusually harsh tone was designed to highlight the desperate state of affairs, which extends beyond crowding to medical and mental health care and a criminal sentencing system that the commission called "a haphazard jumble."

Hancock said the crisis has been caused largely by a ceaseless game of one-upmanship by politicians seeking to burnish their reputations as crime-fighters.

"Each has tried to outdo the other on who could be toughest on crime, but nobody was thinking clearly about what the ramifications would be for the state," he said. The result is an incoherent penal code dominated by what experts call "drive-by sentencing laws," often enacted by politicians responding to a single high-profile crime.

The report comes just days after Schwarzenegger and the top Democrat in the Assembly publicly lamented the lack of political will to tackle the prison woes.

In an interview with The Times last week, Schwarzenegger said prisons had not been a priority because they were not a "sexy" topic that affects the lives of voters – and therefore had attracted little interest from lawmakers.

"You talk about prisons, people feel like, 'OK, go out and get the criminal and you send him somewhere, but wherever that is, I don't want to look there, I don't want to know,' " the governor said.

He added that, "When the people are not excited about it, how do you make the legislators excited about it?"

Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez of Los Angeles was more pointed in his comments, blaming legislators for a short-sighted, "lock up everybody" mentality that has wrought painful consequences.

"It's good politically, because you can champion it as you're tough on crime," Nunez said at a press conference Monday. "But in the end, the prisons are overcrowded, we don't do enough rehabilitation, the prisoners get out of jail and go back and commit more crimes, we have the highest recidivism rate of any state in the nation.

"It's a shameful part of the California body politic," Nunez said. "We've got to change that. I think people ought not be afraid."

Whether the rhetoric – or the commission's report -- will have any substantial effect on legislators is unclear. Analysts say the political fear of being tagged as a friend of felons runs deep. And voters rarely fail to embrace ballot initiatives seeking new penalties for offenders, such as the three strikes law of 1994.

"We're always ever so nice to furry animals and very, very mean to criminals," said Shaun Bowler, a professor of political science at UC Riverside. "It's almost reflexive, the voters' desire to be tough. If the prisons are a cross between a sewer and the Roman Colosseum, their answer seems to be, 'Good.' "

But criminologists say that the public has been misled about just what sort of policies make the streets safer. At UC Irvine, Joan Petersilia said it's up to the governor – a Republican – to point out that "what we're doing now with our system is costing us a lot and not giving us much public safety benefit in return."

California, experts noted, spends more than $8 billion a year on corrections, but roughly 70% of the inmates it releases wind up back behind bars.

"Everyone agrees we've got a crisis, but no one is willing to put forth an agenda and lead," Petersilia said. "That's the key ingredient that's been missing."

Hack, Pump And Dump (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

Aleksey Kamardin reaped $13,158 in just 104 minutes buying and selling penny stocks.

DOJ_NMG_0122485

The 21-year-old bought 43,000 shares in a small Wisconsin equipment company that makes, among other things, potato harvesters. He sold the shares less than two hours later at nearly double the investment.

But Kamardin's is no success story. Instead, federal authorities say, his methods place him at the front of a wave of techno-criminals who meld computer hacking with identity theft to create nightmares for legitimate investors.

Kamardin and his accomplices allegedly hacked into four online trading accounts of unsuspecting investors, selling off their holdings in higher-valued companies to purchase shares in Thomas Equipment, a firm whose stock that day soared from 26 cents to 80 cents a share, authorities said. The trading volume of Thomas increased tenfold.

Kamardin, allegedly part of an East European ring, repeated this scheme on 13 other occasions in July and August, defrauding investors of $82,960, according to a civil complaint filed yesterday by the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The complaint is one of the first the SEC has brought in response to an emerging trend of the digital era: a modern version of the old pump-and-dump stock scam.

"You wake up in the morning and all your blue chips are gone, and instead you own a microcap stock that is virtually worthless," said John Reed Stark, chief of the SEC's Office of Internet Enforcement. Stark added that he expected more complaints in the coming weeks, saying, "This is an area where we've become increasingly concerned."

The FBI is also investigating the case, which involved at least 27 accounts and 14 companies at brokers E-Trade Securities, Scottrade, TD Ameritrade, J.P. Morgan Chase and Charles Schwab. All the investors have been reimbursed by the brokers, which have been stepping up security and identity authentication measures, SEC officials said.

Kamardin, a U.S. citizen with a liquid net worth of $15,000, according to his E-Trade account application, is believed to have fled to Russia, the SEC said. He has no attorney, authorities said.

On Aug. 21 last year, Kamardin booted up his computer in his apartment in Tampa and logged into his E-Trade account, according to the SEC complaint, which forms the basis for the following account.

At 2:10 p.m. he bought 43,000 shares of Thomas Equipment.

Between 1:29 p.m. and 3:41 p.m., an intruder -- either Kamardin or an accomplice -- hacked into two TD Ameritrade accounts, using those investors' stocks to buy 60,900 Thomas Equipment shares.

At 3:28 p.m., an intruder hit a Charles Schwab account, buying 20,000 shares.

At 3:32 p.m., an E-Trade account was hacked, boosting that investor's portfolio by 68,000 Thomas Equipment shares.

At 3:35 p.m., Kamardin began to sell the Thomas shares.

One minute later, Schwab, evidently onto the fraud, canceled an order to buy 50,000 Thomas shares in a second hacked account.

By 3:53, Kamardin had unloaded all his Thomas shares, netting $13,158.

The SEC is not saying how Kamardin's ring obtained the user names and passwords on the investors' accounts. Typically, authorities said, hackers use keystroke monitoring software placed on a public computer, or they purchase personal data, such as stolen Social Security and credit card numbers, from criminal enterprises.

The fraud affects not only the investors, but the market and companies whose stocks are pumped then dumped.

Hugo Cancio was stunned when trading on his company's stock increased from fewer than 1,000 shares a day to 1.1 million shares last Aug. 24.

"For no reason whatsoever," he said, the share price for Fuego Entertainment, a Miami-based entertainment firm targeting the burgeoning Latino media market, zoomed from 88 cents to $1.28.

"My phone rang off the hook," he said. "We couldn't figure out what was going on."

Allegedly, between 11:51 a.m. and 3:05 p.m. that day, Kamardin had bought and sold 55,000 Fuego shares, raking in $9,164.

In the interim, 10 accounts with Fuego holdings were hacked into at TD Ameritrade, Scottrade, E-Trade and Schwab.

"Wow, wow," Cancio said, upon hearing the allegations. "That's unbelievable."

The following day, Cancio said, his company's share price had plummeted to 13 cents, where it has been ever since. TD Ameritrade, the third-largest online broker by volume, has restricted online trade on the company's stock.

Cancio said that on Aug. 24 he was negotiating a deal to buy 14 television stations, and when he saw the price surge, he began to suspect the stations' owner of insider trading.

The owner denied it, but the deal soured, and with the share price down, Cancio said, the deal is on the rocks. "We were knocking on the door of a multibillion market," he said. "We haven't seen any progress. It's all due to that particular day."

On Aug. 28 and Aug. 29, Kamardin wired proceeds from his E-Trade account to a Wachovia bank account and then transferred the funds to an account owned by his Russian-born roommate. The roommate wired the money to a bank account in Riga, Latvia, the SEC alleges.

DOJ_NMG_0122486

E-Trade, which regularly monitors unusual activity, at some point became concerned and alerted the SEC and the FBI of possible fraudulent activities, said sources familiar with the matter.

Kamardin is charged with securities fraud. The SEC is seeking return of the money and payment of civil penalties.

Florida Man Used E*Trade Account For Illegal Trading (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Bradley Keoun

Bloomberg, January 26, 2007

Jan. 25 (Bloomberg) -- A 21-year-old Florida man hacked into online accounts at E*Trade Financial Corp. and four other brokerage firms in the second case to emerge from a probe of Internet trading fraud, U.S. officials allege.

The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission sued Aleksey Kamardin, claiming he took control of the accounts and netted $83,000 in illegal profits. The regulator said Kamardin bid up 17 stocks and then sold the shares in his own E*Trade account at inflated prices.

The SEC, FBI, U.S. Secret Service and NASD are investigating a wave of online trading fraud that has cost brokerage firms at least $22 million. In December, the SEC said a Russian man made $354,000 in illegal profit by using an Estonian Internet address to hack into accounts at E*Trade, TD Ameritrade Holding Corp. and Scottrade Inc.

``This is typical of what we've seen a lot of lately," John Reed Stark, chief of the SEC's office of Internet enforcement, said in an interview. ``We have other cases like this in our inventory that we expect to be rolling out."

Stark declined to say whether criminal charges would be filed against Kamardin, who he said is believed to have fled the U.S. and gone into hiding in Russia. A contact telephone number provided by the SEC at Kamardin's last known address in Tampa was answered by a woman who said she didn't know him.

Illegal Profit

The illegal trades occurred between July 13 and Aug. 25, according to the suit, which was filed today in U.S. District Court in Tampa, Florida.

Kamardin on Aug. 28 and 29 wired the illegal profit from his online brokerage account at E*Trade to a Wachovia Corp. bank account in the U.S. The money was then transferred to a second account owned by Kamardin's Russian-born roommate, who in turn wired it to a bank account in Riga, Latvia, the SEC said.

A July 2006 application opening an account in Kamardin's name at E*Trade said he was a U.S. citizen with a liquid net worth of $15,000, the SEC said. Stark declined to comment on whether the agency had confirmed Kamardin's citizenship. He said the roommate hasn't been accused of wrongdoing.

Other online brokerage firms whose accounts Kamardin manipulated included Scottrade, JPMorgan Chase & Co. and Charles Schwab Corp., according to the complaint.

`Circumstantial Case'

The SEC named 14 of the 17 stocks it believes were manipulated by Kamardin. They included Gales Industries, a Bay Shore, New York-based manufacturer of aircraft structural parts; Butler National Corp., an Olathe, Kansas-based provider of electronic monitoring of water-pumping stations; and Thomas Equipment Ltd., a Milwaukee-based manufacturer of farm equipment.

Stark said the SEC couldn't link Kamardin directly to the unauthorized use of the accounts. Kamardin probably gained access by stealing usernames and passwords through software that allows outsiders to spy on keystrokes on another person's keyboard, or by buying the logins from Web sites outside the U.S. that traffic in such information, Stark said.

``It is a circumstantial case" built on ``compelling" evidence, Stark said. ``He did this 17 times and profited 14 times."

The SEC claimed, for example, that on Aug. 21 between 2:10 p.m. and 2:36 p.m., Kamardin bought 43,000 Thomas shares at about 43 cents each. About the same time, an intruder used unauthorized access to buy 60,900 Thomas shares in two TD Ameritrade accounts, 20,000 shares in a Schwab account and 68,000 shares in an E*Trade account.

The buying -- trading volume was 10 times its daily average -- drove the shares as high as 80 cents, the SEC said.

From 3:35 p.m. to 3:53 p.m., Kamardin sold all 43,000 of his Thomas shares, for a profit of $13,158, the SEC said.

Pump-and-Dump

Federal regulators and law enforcement authorities said in October they were investigating securities schemes on the Internet after New York-based E*Trade reported that it had spent $18 million in the third quarter to reimburse victims of the fraud. In one instance, E*Trade had to take possession of 1 million shares of BoysToys.com, the owner of a San Francisco strip club. Omaha, Nebraska-based TD Ameritrade also had $4 million in expenses related to the schemes.

E*Trade, TD Ameritrade and San Francisco-based Schwab, under policies begun last year, reimburse customers who lose money because of unauthorized trading in their accounts.

DOJ_NMG_0122487

Spokesmen for E*Trade, New York-based JPMorgan and St. Louis-based Scottrade declined to comment on the SEC lawsuit. A spokeswoman for TD Ameritrade didn't return a call seeking a comment.

`Unusual Behavior'

``We monitor client transactions using a combination of sophisticated automated and manual surveillance techniques, watching for unusual account behavior," Schwab spokeswoman Sarah Bulgatz said in an e-mailed statement. ``This enables us to intervene preemptively as needed."

Investigators have compared the online fraud with traditional pump-and-dump schemes in which criminals use false statements or advertisements to spur a rally in the prices of stocks they own so they can sell them at inflated prices.

``It's like a boiler room without the boiler room," Stark said of the online fraud. ``Instead of having to convince an investor to buy your stock you just steal that investor's password and username and buy it in his account."

E*Trade shares fell 70 cents, or 2.8 percent, to $23.97 today in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

D.C. Clubs Dreading Proposed Teen Ban (WP)

By Keith L. Alexander And Darragh Johnson

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

District nightclubs, which have become the center of a thriving music scene that attracts fans and performers from across the country, could be devastated by a proposal to bar teenagers from establishments with liquor licenses, according to musicians and club owners who say the business relies significantly on youths.

Saturday's killing of Taleshia Ford, 17, in a Northwest club spurred an often heated, standing-room-only crowd yesterday at a D.C. Council hearing over a multipronged proposal to place new restrictions on nightclubs where alcohol is served.

Nightclub owners said that the District, unlike many cities in the country, has become a popular destination for bands and clubgoers because of its all-ages policies. They allow club owners to admit patrons as young as they choose -- typically a minimum age of 15 to 18 -- even if the establishment serves alcohol that is legal only for those at least 21.

"The artists don't particularly like to play to 21-and-older clubs," said Steve Lambert, talent booker for the Rock and Roll Hotel on H Street Northeast. "A lot of their audiences are college-aged, between 18 and 21, and they depend on those people to buy tickets to the show."

In emotional testimony that lasted almost two hours, about a dozen of Ford's relatives and friends called for better security in clubs that cater to teenagers.

Many at the hearing defended the venues, saying they strictly enforce age limits. "Some clubs, like H2O, 9:30 Club, the Black Cat, Platinum and Envy -- they do it very well," said Ronald Moten, co-founder of Peaceaholics, an organization that works to solve disputes among youth. "They monitor for fake IDs, they have bracelets or stamps they put on people who're underage, and they're very strict on this."

The clubs feature a range of music, from the hard-thumping go-go to indie-rock, reggae, hip hop and rhythm and blues.

The District's all-ages policies allow nightclubs to attract larger audiences, particularly die-hard teenage music fans. But many teenagers admitted yesterday that part of the growth of area nightclubs is due to the ease with which young people can obtain alcoholic drinks. Several said they either pay club employees an extra $5 or $10 to get a drink or find a club patron who is 21 or older to buy the drink.

Briejon Smith, 14, Ford's cousin, said that at several city clubs, it is "easy" for teenagers to get alcohol. "All you have to do is slip the bartender $10 and you can get a drink. They ask me if I have ID, and I say 'No,' and then they charge me extra. But I can still get in and order a drink if I wanted to," she said.

Some suburban teenagers, who had left school early to testify at the hearing, said they were concerned that the fatal shooting would give officials a reason to expand restrictions on all clubs, even those that already have tight rules.

Maya Gibson-Reinemer, 18, of Arlington said teenagers go to the clubs mainly to listen to the bands. "You can get drunk anywhere. But where can you see music?" she said.

Council member Jim Graham (D-Ward 1) is considering legislation that would establish a minimum age for patrons within the District. In Boston, those younger than 14 are not permitted into nightclubs that serve alcohol. In some other cities, the minimum age is 21. His proposal would also require teenagers, even when accompanied by a legal-aged adult, to leave the establishment after a certain time.

Graham is also considering creating a new license for nightclubs that want to cater to under-21 patrons. It would require them to have minimum-standard security, training and aggressive monitoring during an event for underage drinking. And he wants to restrict the renting of venues to outside promoters. That was the case Saturday morning at Smarta/Broadway, also known as Club 1919, on Ninth Street just off the bustling U Street corridor. Police said that Ford was shot there when the club's bouncer got into a scuffle with a patron carrying a gun. There have been no arrests.

At least one club's advertised rules regarding teen patrons are vague. The Web site for the Black Cat, at 1811 14th St. NW, says: "Black Cat events are all ages. Patrons under 18 should have parental permission, and we prefer them to be accompanied by an adult."

Graham said he did not want to use the fatal shooting as a way to target go-go clubs, popular nightspots mostly frequented by blacks. Instead, he said, he decided to focus on all nightclubs. At the time of the shooting, the Smarta/Broadway was booked as a venue for local go-go bands. Some go-go dances have been marred by violence, but there is a growing movement to change their reputation by promoting peaceful go-gos.

"There needs to be a safe place for these kids to go. There are safe places out there with extra security and where we don't have to be afraid for our kids' safety," Moten said.

Charles A. Burger, chairman of the D.C. Alcoholic Beverage Control Board, said that Smarta/Broadway's liquor license has been suspended since the shooting and that a hearing is scheduled for Monday.

"We're going to get to the bottom of this. This was a troubled establishment doing whatever it needed to do and didn't care one bit about public safety," Graham said.

Fieger Sues U.S. Attorney General (FREEP)

By NAOMI R. PATTON, FREE PRESS STAFF WRITER

Detroit Free Press, January 26, 2007

Southfield lawyer Geoffrey Fieger filed a complaint against U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Federal Election Commission Chairman Michael Toner alleging they unlawfully investigated Fieger and his law firm.

In the complaint filed Thursday in U.S. District Court Eastern District of Michigan, Fieger alleges that in June 2005 Gonzales illegally directed his office and agents to investigate Fieger and members of his firm, Fieger, Fieger, Kenney and Johnson for violating the campaign finance act.

It is unclear what violations they were investigating, but the complaint contends that, by law, Gonzales' office cannot conduct such an investigation until the Federal Election Commission conducts an investigation, and refers it to the attorney general's office.

The complaint says the FEC never conducted an investigation or referred any violations to the attorney general's office.

Toner is included as a defendant, because the FEC "is tacitly cooperating and conspiring with the Attorney General."

Fieger also contends that investigators required witnesses to identify who they voted for in the 2004 presidential election.

Feiger is seeking a declaration from Gonzales and Stoner that their action was unconstitutional. He also seeks to have all legal fees recouped.

A spokesperson for the Attorney General's Office did not return calls.

Fieger Sues U.S. Attorney General (DEN)

By Paul Egan, The Detroit News

Detroit News, January 26, 2007

Southfield attorney Geoffrey Fieger filed a federal lawsuit today against U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and the Federal Election Commission, alleging a grand jury investigation of Fieger and his law firm is unlawful.

A federal grand jury has been investigating more than $50,000 in political donations from Fieger and his associatesto Democrat John Edwardswhenhe was a candidate for his party's 2004 presidential nomination.

Many of the donations were made on the same day, and prosecutors are investigating whether Fieger unlawfully funneled the donations by having employees make the donations and then reimbursing them.

In his lawsuit, Fieger alleges such a matter can only be referred to the attorney general after an investigation and referral by the election commission. Fieger alleges such a referral never happened. He asks the court for a declaration that the grand jury investigation is unlawful.

Federal officials could not immediately be reached for comment.

Evidence Concludes In Framed Men's Suit (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 26, 2007

As they strolled out of federal court yesterday, Joseph Salvati and Peter Limone said they are happy that a federal judge has now heard all the evidence in a civil trial over whether the government should pay more than $100 million for the wrongful conviction that sent them and two other men to prison for decades for a 1965 murder they didn't commit.

But with a decision in the case not expected until at least mid-March, Salvati, 74, of the North End, said: "Now starts the worst part. Like Yogi Berra said, 'It's not over till it's over.' "

Salvati and Limone, 72, of Malden, attended every day of the 21-day civil trial with their wives, sons, and daughters. The two other men, Henry Tameleo and Louis Greco, died in prison before FBI reports surfaced five years ago indicating that the four had been framed for the slaying in Chelsea of Edward Deegan.

After seeing the reports, a state judge overturned Limone's murder conviction in January 2001, and he walked free after 33 years in prison. She also vacated the conviction of Salvati, who was paroled in 1997 after 30 years in prison. Greco's exoneration came two years ago, when his conviction was posthumously set aside.

Yesterday, hours after evidence concluded in the federal civil trial, state prosecutors filed a motion urging Suffolk Superior Judge Margaret Hinkle to vacate the murder conviction posthumously of Tameleo, who was 84 years old when he died in prison in 1985.

After receiving a petition from Tameleo's family last June and reviewing the other three cases, Suffolk District Attorney Daniel F. Conley "determined that vacating Mr. Tameleo's conviction was the legal, ethical, and moral thing to do," said Jake Wark, a spokesman for Conley's office.

The motion asserts there is "newly discovered evidence indicating that justice may not have been done at Tameleo's trial," Wark said.

In federal court yesterday, US District Judge Nancy Gertner accepted the last of thousands of exhibits and filings just before 11 a.m. in the civil suit for wrongful imprisonment. Lawyers for the four men and the government will file briefs next month, and final arguments in the case will be given Feb. 27. The judge said she will try to reach a decision about two weeks later.

During the trial, lawyers for the four men accused the FBI of making a mockery of justice by failing to tell state prosecutors or defense lawyers about evidence that suggested that notorious hitman Joseph "The Animal" Barboza, who had been recruited by the FBI as a witness against local Mafia leaders in another case, framed Salvati, Limone, Tameleo, and Greco. At the time, Tameleo was the reputed consigliere of the New England Mafia, according to organized crime reports compiled by the FBI.

Deegan was gunned down in a Chelsea alley in March 1965. Local police were unable to solve the slaying until the FBI struck a deal with Barboza, whose testimony resulted in the 1968 convictions of the four men and of two others whose involvement in the slaying has not been disputed.

A Justice Department lawyer asserted during the trial that the FBI cannot be blamed because state prosecutors were responsible for investigating and trying the case. She also argued that the FBI had no obligation to share internal documents with state prosecutors, but also said that agents provided some information about the Deegan slaying to state and local police.

After yesterday's session, Limone, said: "I'm glad it's all over. It was like going to trial again."

Wal-Mart To Pay More Than $33 Million For Overtime Violations (FINDLAW/AP)

By Marcus Kabel, Ap Business Writer

AP, January 26, 2007

(AP) - BENTONVILLE, Arkansas-Wal-Mart Stores Inc. will pay more than $33 million (â,¬25.5 million) in back wages to thousands of employees after turning itself in to the Labor Department for paying too little in overtime over the past five years, according to an agreement announced Thursday by the U.S. Labor Department.

Wal-Mart said the department's review of its overtime calculations also found it had overpaid about 215,000 hourly workers during the same five-year period. The company said it will not seek to recover any overpayments, which were at least $20 (â,¬15.41) per worker.

Steven Mandel, associate solicitor in the Labor Department's Fair Labor Standards Division, said the case - involving nearly 87,000 employees - resulted from Wal-Mart coming to the department in early 2005 and asking for a review of its overtime calculations.

"They had some concern that some of the practices were not in compliance" with federal wage laws, he told a conference call for reporters

"It's not particularly unusual for an employer to come to us and talk to us about potential payroll violations," Mandel said.

But Mandel said the overtime settlement was one of the largest ever reached by the department's wage and hour division.

Wal-Mart said the settlement includes no fines or penalties and that it has adopted measures to prevent the errors from occurring again.

Last October, Wal-Mart workers in Pennsylvania won a $78.5 million (â,¬60.5 million) judgment for working off the clock and through rest breaks. Wal-Mart denied wrongdoing and is appealing the jury award.

One of Wal-Mart's most vociferous critics, union-backed WakeUpWalMart.com, said the overtime settlement was a sweetheart deal that favored the retailer rather than its workers.

WakeUpWalMart.com spokesman Chris Kofinis said workers were not represented in the settlement talks and added that the idea that Wal-Mart "would negotiate in the best interests of its workers is ludicrous on its face."

Critics had previously denounced a separate Labor Department settlement with Wal-Mart over child labor violations, which was made public last February.

That $135,540 (â,¬104,438) settlement was later found by the Labor Department's inspector general to contain significant concessions for the retailer. The inspector general's report said the settlement was "significantly different" from other such agreements and included far-reaching restrictions on the government's ability to assess monetary penalties.

Regarding the overtime issue, Mandel said the department carried out a national review of all Wal-Mart stores over a two-year period from February 2005 to this year.

The settlement was approved Thursday by a federal judge in the U.S. District Court for western Arkansas, Mandel said.

The highest award to an individual employee was about $39,000 (â,¬30,051), he said.

Wal-Mart is the world's largest retailer with about 1.3 million employees.

Wal-Mart Reaches Deal Over Back Pay (WP)

By Amy Joyce And Ylan Q. Mui

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

Wal-Mart must pay nearly $34 million in back wages and interest to employees who were not paid for overtime hours under a settlement announced yesterday by the U.S. Labor Department.

The company said that because of errors in calculation, it underpaid about 87,000 employees nationwide by at least $20 during the past five years. But some are due much more, with one person to receive $39,775.

Wal-Mart approached the Labor Department in 2005 after errors were discovered in an internal audit, according to Steven Mandel, associate solicitor in the department's fair labor standards division. He said employees will receive their pay within 90 days.

"It's not particularly unusual for an employer to come to us to talk about potential payroll violations," said Mandel, who noted that the settlement is one of the largest overtime settlements ever reached. The settlement, filed in U.S. District Court in Arkansas, does not include any fines or penalties.

Wal-Mart rectified several problems in 2005 but was not in complete compliance until Jan. 19, he said.

"The issue has been resolved," said John Simley, a Wal-Mart spokesman. "We are committed to our associates, and we have apologized to them for this error."

About 75 employees are owed more than $10,000, according to Simley. The retailer also said it overpaid about 215,000 current and former workers $20 or more, which amounts to at least $4.3 million. The actual total was not disclosed. Wal-Mart said it would not seek to recover the overpayments.

Wal-Mart found the errors in 2004 during a routine internal review, Simley said. Problems stemmed from "calculation errors and procedural errors" at headquarters, he said, but he declined to say how they occurred. Wal-Mart reviewed data going back to Feb. 1, 2002, the first year for which it has "consistently reliable records," Simley said.

Wal-Mart said it found that some non-exempt salaried employees were expected to work 45 to 48 hours before they earned overtime pay. They did not receive the extra half-time they were owed for hours between 40 and 45 or 48. Other errors also occurred, Wal-Mart said.

The company will still face legal challenges from at least one state.

The California labor commissioner filed suit against Wal-Mart yesterday in Superior Court in Sacramento, alleging miscalculations of overtime pay. The retailer notified the state in December 2005 of payroll errors that resulted in underpayment of about 50,000 workers in the state. About 90 percent are owed less than $20, according to the state Department of Industrial Relations. It estimates that a settlement would exceed $2 million.

"While Wal-Mart has indicated its desire to pay all additional wages owed under California law, we will not agree to any settlement terms until state auditors have the opportunity to verify the accounting records relied upon by [U.S. Labor Department] officials and to examine additional records that relate to those issues that are subject to more stringent California statutes," said Robert Jones, acting state labor commissioner.

State and federal wage-and-hours laws require employers to pay time and a half to workers who put in more than 40 hours a week. Salaried managers and independent contractors are exempt unless their salaries fall below a certain threshold.

DOJ_NMG_0122491

Wal-Mart has been involved in other overtime suits. In October, a Pennsylvania jury decided that Wal-Mart forced hourly employees to work through breaks and beyond their shifts without overtime pay. The plaintiffs were awarded $78.5 million. Wal-Mart is appealing.

In 2002, a federal jury in Oregon found that Wal-Mart employees were forced to work off the clock and awarded back pay to 83 workers. In 2004, Wal-Mart settled a similar lunch-break case in Colorado for $50 million.

At least 57 other wage-and-hours cases have been filed across the United States against the world's largest retailer, and many of them are awaiting class-action certification, according to company filings.

Wal-Mart's decision to report the problem is indicative of how visible it has become, according to Harley Shaiken, a labor professor at the University of California at Berkeley. "They realized there was a problem and didn't want to see it become a worse problem," he said. "I think Wal-Mart has really learned that putting it under the rug doesn't make it better."

Trustee: Sen. Clinton's Brother Owes Debts To Carnival Operators (AP)

By Rose French, The Associated Press

AP, January 26, 2007

Tony Rodham, the brother of Democratic presidential contender Sen. Hillary Clinton, is being asked again to appear in court on debts owed to a Tennessee carnival operator whose owners received presidential pardons from President Bill Clinton.

A bankruptcy trustee asked a federal judge today to schedule a new court date in the case to address Rodham allegedly failing to repay $109,000 in loans from now-defunct United Shows of America Inc.

Edgar Allen Gregory Jr. and his wife, Vonna Jo, owners of United Shows, were convicted of defrauding several banks and were given pardons in 2000 after Rodham asked the president to intervene on their behalf. Ed Gregory died in 2004.

A report by the U.S. House Committee on Government Reform in 2002 concluded United Shows paid Rodham $240,000 for undocumented consulting services, and that the president was interested in the pardons solely because of his contacts with Rodham.

The Gregorys denied paying or promising Rodham for anything related to the pardons. The loans their company gave to Rodham occurred both before and after the pardons were issued.

Edgar Gregory filed for bankruptcy in 2002 for two family businesses, including United Shows, which operates state and regional fairs and carnivals across the Southeast. The company stopped operating in 2004, the same year as Ed Gregory's death.

Nashville-based federal bankruptcy trustee Michael Collins said he has tried to get Rodham to repay the loans for almost two years.

Collins had Rodham's accounts frozen in 2005 after Rodham failed to respond to an initial complaint. A judge ruled that Rodham was in default on the loans, but later unfroze the accounts after Rodham appealed.

Collins said the latest filing seeks to establish "realistic deadlines for the future progression of this litigation."

"It's collecting a receivable that was owed to the company," he said. "Its just like any loan."

Collins says he's seeking the loan money which, with interest, comes to nearly $150,000.

Rodham's lawyers in Virginia did not immediately return phone calls on today seeking comment.

The Gregorys hired Rodham in June 1998, five months before they filed pardon applications with the Justice Department.

Rodham says he was hired to help bring new business to the Gregorys' carnival operation. But the report by the U.S. House Committee on Government Reform said that without any documentation the episode raises "substantial questions ... as to what Rodham actually did for the Gregorys that was so valuable."

"It appears that the president was interested in the Gregory pardons solely because of his contacts with Tony Rodham," the report says. "It is fair to conclude that, but for Tony Rodham's lobbying efforts, the Gregory pardons would not have been granted."

Rodham refused to appear before the committee. He did, however, at the time tell CNN's Larry King Live he talked about the pardons with President Clinton, but said Clinton made the decision to grant clemency to the Gregorys on the merits of their case.

"If I used any kind of influence, then why did it sit in the Justice Department for 18 months? It's absurd to even say that I used any kind of influence. ... The Gregorys are the type of people the pardon system is made for."

CNN, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- After the investigation into the May 1964 deaths in rural Mississippi of his brother and a friend went cold, Thomas Moore was convinced he would never see justice done.

But when a documentary filmmaker for the Canadian Broadcasting Corp. began to research the case about a year and a half ago, Moore saw a glimmer of hope.

And Thursday, 71-year-old James Ford Seale, who court documents state is a former Ku Klux Klan member, made an initial appearance in court in Jackson, Mississippi, on charges of kidnapping and conspiracy in the abduction and killing of Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee, both 19, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced. (Watch how a 42-year-old cold case heated up)

Seale has pleaded not guilty. He is being held without bail, Gonzales said. (Dee's sister prayed for justice "somehow, some way")

Moore said that after momentum began to build on the case two years ago, he told his late brother he wouldn't give up.

"I promised him in 2005 at his grave in Franklin County ... that I would fight until I die," Moore told reporters in Washington on Thursday shortly after the indictment was announced.

"When I got the word yesterday ... I cried," he continued. "And I felt that my mom and my dad and Charles Moore and Henry Dee said, 'Thank you.' " (Watch Moore savor the day he's been waiting for)

Moore said he returned to Franklin County with CBC producer David Ridgen to help research the case.

At one point, Moore said, he told some friends there it was too bad that one of the suspects -- Seale, who was initially arrested along with Charles Edwards soon after the murders -- had died.

"They said, 'He hasn't passed away,' " Moore said. "They directed us to where he lived. That changed our mission."

Soon after their arrests in 1964, Seale and Edwards were released on bail and were never tried.

According to the CBC, FBI documents stated that Edwards confessed that he had picked up the two young African-American men, beaten and interrogated them.

But he said they were alive when he left.

Edwards, who also is still alive, was not named in the recent indictment.

The allegations in the indictment against Seale say that "Dee and Moore were beaten by their captors, then transported and finally forcibly drowned by being thrown into the old Mississippi River tied to heavy objects alleged to have included an engine block, iron weights and railroad ties," Gonzales said.

"These allegations are a painful reminder of a terrible time in our country, a time when some people viewed their fellow Americans as inferior and as a threat based only on the color of their skin," the attorney general added. (Watch the FBI's top agent describe 'a dark chapter' in history)

After learning that Seale was alive, Moore gave Dunn Lampton, the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of Mississippi, the FBI files on the case that he got from a reporter in Mississippi.

"The really most important factor, in my mind, was Thomas Moore coming to see me," Lampton said. "And at that time, I had not really looked at the file. And the case had lain dormant for years. And I thought that there was nothing we could do about it."

"I took the file home with me and read it," Lampton said. "I was a district attorney for 20 years; I've tried a lot of murder cases. I read the file and I thought that perhaps something could be done either on the state side or on the federal side."

Lampton said he helped form a task force and that the end result -- the indictment -- was a joint effort.

"Nineteen months ago was the start of a journey," Moore said. "Had no idea what it would lead to, but we had hoped and we tried and we continued to push.

"And I'm so glad."

Man Pleads Not Guilty In 1964 Race Case (AP)

By Emily Wagster Pettus, The Associated Press

AP, January 26, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. (AP) — A reputed Ku Klux Klansman accused in the 1964 slayings of two black men pleaded not guilty Thursday, and in a measure of how things have changed across the South, the judge he stood before was a black woman.

With his wrists and ankles shackled, 71-year-old James Ford Seale repeatedly addressed the judge as "ma'am," a social courtesy whites typically denied to blacks in Mississippi 43 years ago.

Seale was arrested Wednesday on federal charges of kidnapping and conspiracy. Prosecutors said Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee, both 19, were seized and beaten by Klansmen, then thrown into the Mississippi River to drown.

DOJ_NMG_0122493

A second white man long suspected in the attack, reputed KKK member Charles Marcus Edwards, 72, has not been charged. People close to the investigation who spoke on condition of anonymity said Edwards was cooperating with authorities.

Seale and Edwards were arrested in the case in 1964. But the FBI — consumed by the search for three civil rights workers who had disappeared that same summer — turned the case over to local authorities, who promptly threw out all charges.

The U.S. Justice Department reopened the case in 2000. But it was not until a few years ago that authorities even realized Seale was still alive.

"Forty years ago, the system failed," FBI Director Robert Mueller said in Washington. "We in the FBI have a responsibility to investigate these cold-case, civil rights-era murders where evidence still exists to bring both closure and justice to these cases that for many, remain unhealed wounds to this day."

On Thursday, U.S. Magistrate Linda R. Anderson asked Seale whether he understood the charges, which carry up to life in prison.

"Yes, ma'am, I think so," Seale said in a calm voice.

Seale was jailed for a bail hearing on Monday. His court-appointed attorneys said he is suffering from cancer. His trial is scheduled for April 2.

Suspect Pleads In 1964 Slayings (USAT)

By Jerry Mitchell And Ana Radelat

USA Today, January 26, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. — A 71-year-old reputed Ku Klux Klan member pleaded innocent Thursday to charges linked to the killings of two black teens in Mississippi almost 43 years ago.

James Seale is charged with two counts of kidnapping and one count of conspiracy to commit kidnapping in connection with the May 2, 1964, abduction, beating and drowning deaths of Henry Dee and Charles Moore, both 19. If convicted, Seale could face up to three life sentences.

Seale, now in custody in the Madison County Jail near Jackson, faces a hearing Monday on whether he will be released on bond. His court-appointed public defenders are likely to argue Seale should be freed because he has cancer.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Linda Anderson asked Seale on Thursday whether he understood the charges.

"Yes, ma'am, I think so," replied Seale, his wrists and ankles shackled.

Six years ago, in an interview with the Jackson, Miss., Clarion-Ledger, Seale scoffed at the idea he would ever be arrested in the case.

The charges were announced in Washington on Thursday by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Dunn Lampton, U.S. attorney for the Southern District of Mississippi, and Robert Mueller, head of the FBI.

"This was a horrible crime inflicted with stunning disregard for the suffering of these victims," Mueller said. "These tragic murders are straight from the darkest page of our country's history."

Lampton said prosecutors were able to bring the case largely due to the efforts of Moore's brother, Thomas Moore, who pressed authorities to investigate the deaths.

Thomas Moore, 65, traveled to Washington on Thursday with Dee's sister, Thelma Collins. Looking back on the years since his brother's death, he said his hopes surged any time someone took an interest in the case.

"Every now and then, people would get my hopes up, and then it would fade away," he said.

The indictment said Seale and other Klansmen who abducted Dee and Moore thought the two had information about local gunrunning and thought Dee might be a civil rights activist.

The teens eventually were driven to Parker's Landing in Mississippi, according to the indictment, where the Klansmen tied a Jeep engine block, iron weights and railroad rails to them and then threw them into the Mississippi River.

Seale, along with Charles Edwards, now 72, was arrested once before, on Nov. 6, 1964, in connection with the slayings. The FBI, consumed by the search for three civil rights workers who had disappeared that same summer in Philadelphia, Miss., turned the case over to local authorities, who threw out the charges.

Edwards has not been charged, and Gonzales declined Thursday to say whether there will be more charges in the case.

A federal grand jury charges a Mississippi man with the 1964 killings of two black men, in the latest in a series of charges involving racially motivated killings from the civil-rights era. The two men had been hitchhiking when they went missing. Their bodies were found in the Mississippi River, shackled to an engine block.

James Ford Seale, 71, pleaded not guilty to the charges in Jackson, Miss. The former sheriff's deputy and reputed Klansman was one of two suspects originally charged in the deaths decades ago. But the FBI turned the case over to local authorities — at the time, the agency was consumed with the search for three missing civil-rights workers.

James Ford Seale, a 71-year-old reputed Ku Klux Klansman, is escorted into the federal courthouse by marshals in Jackson, Miss., on Thursday. The former Sheriff's deputy, once thought to be dead, faces charges for his alleged involvement in the kidnapping and slaying of two black teenagers in 1964 in one of the last major unsolved crimes of the Civil Rights era. AP

More than 40 years ago, two black hitchhikers were found dead in Mississippi. Thursday, a reputed Ku Klux Klan member — James Ford Seale, 71 — will be charged with kidnapping, but not murder. Reporter Jerry Mitchell of The Clarion-Ledger newspaper in Jackson, Miss., discusses the case with Steve Inskeep:

SI: Would you remind us exactly what happened in 1964, and what James Seale's alleged role was.

JM: This was a case of forgotten killings, really. These two teenagers, African-American teenagers, were hitchhiking. And the Klan believed that there was gunrunning in the county [Franklin County, Miss.] and believed they might know something about it, or did know something about it. [They] took them out into the woods, beat them, then hauled them out to the Mississippi River and tied them to a Jeep motor block and dumped them alive into the Mississippi River.

SI: And James Seale, was he a member of the KKK at that time?

JM: [He was] reputed to be. He denied being a member when I talked to him in 2000. And, of course, he went on to deny that he knew anybody in the Klan. But, of course, his brother was in the Klan, and his dad was supposedly in the Klan. So, I found that kind of interesting.

SI: You mentioned that you talked to him in 2000. It was your newspaper that got this old case reopened. Can you describe to me what evidence led you to James Seale?

JM: Basically, federal authorities had reopened another case, the Chester White killings that the Klan did in '66 in Mississippi. It had taken place on federal property, in the Homochitto National Forest. And the name rung a bell. So, I was like, "it seems like there was something else that took place there." And, sure enough, Henry Hezekiah Dee and Charles Eddy Moore were both beaten in that forest. So that's what led them to reopen that case at that point.

SI: And what led you to Seale? Had he been a suspect at the time?

JM: Yes. He had been arrested along with a guy by the name of Charles Marcus Edwards. But the case never went anywhere.

SI: You mean the Mississippi authorities never did…

JM: [The] never did a thing with it. It was on the state side. The state never prosecuted. In fact, they've dismissed the charges.

SI: Based on what you've seen, how strong is the evidence connecting him to this crime, and what is the evidence?

JM: The case against him, I think, is probably similar to what it would have been in '64, if authorities had been able to put the case together. And this is laid out in FBI documents. Mr. Edwards confessed to authorities his involvement in the case, and identified Mr. Seale as being one of the fellow participants. But Mr. Edwards also said he didn't take part in anything beyond that.

SI: This other suspect confessed to a role in the beating, not the killing. And he leads you, then, to James Seale, the man who's been arrested now?

JM: Correct. I was able to, you know, [use] old records and other things [that] led me to him. And [I] actually had help from people that knew him [that] helped me track him down.

SI: These two men were 19 when they were killed. Are their parents still alive?

JM: No, they're not. But the brother of Charles Moore, Thomas Moore, really deserves a tremendous amount of credit for this case being re-prosecuted. He's been working with a CBC documentary filmmaker, and he's the one who approached the U.S attorney in 2005 and I think really deserves the credit for this case finally going forward.

SI: After more than 40 years, he was still going after the killers of his brother, and he's part of the reason we're hearing about the case again now.

'System Failed' In 1964 Race Killings: FBI Director (CBC)

CBC News, January 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0122495

An elderly Mississippi man could spend the rest of his life in prison in connection with the 1964 slayings of two African-American teenagers afterÂ interestÂ in theÂ cold case wasÂ rekindled by a CBC documentary maker andÂ one ofÂ the victim'sÂ brothers.

James Ford Seale, a 71-year-old reputed Ku Klux Klansman, is escorted from the federal courthouse in Jackson, Miss., on Thursday. Seale pleaded not guilty to federal kidnapping charges tied to the 1964 slayings of two black teenagers.

Seale faces two counts of kidnappingÂ and one count of conspiracy to commitÂ kidnapping in the case of Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee, both 19,Â Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said ThursdayÂ in Washington.

Each count carries a maximum sentence of life in prison.

In a news conference attended by Moore's brother Thomas Moore and Dee's sister Thelma Collins, Gonzales said the case was "a painful reminder of a terrible time in our country."

Gonzales wouldn't comment on why aÂ second suspect, church deacon and reputed KKK member Charles Marcus Edwards, now 72, was not charged.

FBI Director Robert Mueller acknowledgedÂ that it took too long for prosecutors to lay charges.

"Forty years ago, the system failed," Mueller said bluntly with Gonzales and Dunn Lampton, the U.S. attorney for southern Mississippi, at his side. 'My son don't have an uncle. I don't have a brother'

Moore, who joined CBC documentary filmmaker DavidÂ Ridgen on seven journeys toÂ Mississippi,Â said heÂ cried tears ofÂ joy when he heardÂ Seale was in custody, butÂ still struggles withÂ his brother's death.Â

Thomas Moore and CBC documentary filmmaker David Ridgen discovered James Ford Seale, the suspect in Moore's brother's slaying, was still alive in Mississippi.

"I will continue to feel bad," Moore said after the news conference. "My son don't have an uncle. I don't have a brother to call. So I've struggled for 42 years."

Collins said she didn't think she would live toÂ see progressÂ in her brother's case.

"I thank the Lord that I got to see it at my age," she said. "I'm 70 years old. I did see some good come of it."

For years, Seale's family told reporters that he had died. But in JulyÂ 2005, Moore andÂ Ridgen found Seale alive and residing a fewÂ kilometres from where the kidnapping took place.

"When I first met Thomas Moore, heÂ knew more about the case than I did,"Â said Lampton, who headed the task forceÂ launched after the discovery.

"We thought that there was nothing we could do with it."

On May 2, 1964, Moore and Dee, both 19, disappeared whileÂ hitchhiking near Meadville, in southwestern Mississippi.

According to the FBI, they were interrogated and tortured in a nearby forest, locked in a trunk, driven to Louisiana, chained to a Jeep motor and some train rails, and dropped alive into the Mississippi River, whereÂ they drowned.

TheirÂ mangled torsos were discovered more than two months later during the search for Michael Schwerner, Andrew Goodman, and James Chaney â€" three civil rights workers who disappeared June 21 the same year.

Those three bodies were found in Mississippi a short time later, and the case was made famous in the 1988 film Mississippi Burning. Case never went to trial

Seale, then 28, and Edwards, then 31, were arrested in the original investigation, but released soon thereafter on a $5,000 bond. No grand jury or trial was ever held.

FBI documents allege Edwards admitted that he and Seale picked up Moore â€"Â who was on his way home after being expelled from Alcorn A&M University for taking part in a student protest â€" and Dee, who worked at a lumberyard.

According to the documents, EdwardsÂ said he and Seale took the two men to a wooded area, where they were whipped with beanpoles and interrogated.Â Edwards insisted that when he left, the two men were still alive.

He later denied making the statement. None of the allegations have been proven in court.

The FBI turned over Edwards' statement and other files on the investigation to local authorities, and a justice of the peace dismissed all charges.

Gonzales said Seale was not charged with murder because prosecutors examined the evidence and determined a murder case would be too difficult to prove.

"These are very difficult cases to make," Gonzales said, citing the death of witnesses and oldÂ evidence that is no longer available.

TheÂ Justice Department was slow to act on evidence and pursue those responsible for the crime,Â according to Jerry Mitchell,Â an investigative reporter for the Jackson newspaper the Clarion-Ledger who hasÂ worked onÂ the case and numerous other civil-rights slayings.

"It could have been done years ago," Mitchell told CBC News Thursday. With files from the Associated Press

Seale Pleads 'not Guilty' (JCL)

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, January 26, 2007

In court, after 42 years

A judge will decide Monday whether to free on bond reputed Klansman James Ford Seale, who pleaded not guilty to federal kidnapping and conspiracy charges in connection with the 1964 slayings of two black teenagers.

Assistant U.S. Attorney John Dowdy said Thursday the 71-year-old former crop-duster should stay behind bars. Seale is charged in the May 2, 1964, abduction of Henry Hezekiah Dee and Charles Eddie Moore, who were hitchhiking in Meadville when they were grabbed, beaten and thrown into the Mississippi River, where they drowned, according to FBI reports.

Jackson lawyer Kathy Nester of the federal public defenders' office said Seale, who suffers from cancer, should be freed because he is in poor health.

Seale's trial on two counts of kidnapping and one count of conspiracy is set for April 2, although that date likely will be pushed back.

The clash between past and present became apparent when the reputed Klansman stood in front of U.S. Magistrate Judge Linda R. Anderson, the first African-American magistrate in Jackson. Shackled in chains and wearing an orange jumpsuit, he responded to many of her queries with "yes, ma'am" or "no, ma'am."

Seale now faces a trial before U.S. District Judge Henry Wingate, the first African-American district judge in Jackson. If convicted, Seale could face up to three life sentences.

His arrest is the 28th in connection with a civil rights-era slaying since 1989, when Mississippi reopened its investigation into the 1963 assassination of NAACP leader Medgar Evers in Jackson.

Since then, authorities in seven states have re-examined 29 killings from the civil rights era, leading to 22 convictions, most recently in 2005 when a Mississippi jury convicted Edgar Ray Killen of manslaughter for orchestrating the Klan's killings of civil rights workers James Chaney, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner.

In a Thursday news conference in Washington, FBI Director Robert Mueller called the killings of Dee and Moore "tragic murders ... straight from the darkest page of our country's history."

It's been an emotional roller coaster for Moore's 65-year-old brother, Thomas, who began his quest in 1998 to get authorities to prosecute the killings.

"Every now and then, people would get my hopes up, and then it would fade away," said Thomas Moore, who was in Washington for the news conference.

Dee's 70-year-old sister, Thelma Collins, who also traveled to Washington, "cried and sat down and cried again" after hearing of Seale's arrest.

In most criminal cases, defendants waive the reading of the indictment, but Seale sat Thursday and listened to Dowdy read the entire five-page document.

It says Seale and other Klansmen thought Dee might have information about gunrunning in Franklin County, and that's why they abducted him and Moore.

Taking the two teens to Homochitto National Forest, Seale pointed a sawed-off shotgun at Dee and Moore while fellow Klansmen beat the teens with switches and tree branches, the indictment says.

Dee and Moore fabricated a confession there were guns hidden in a Roxie church, which Klansmen and the local sheriff searched, only to find no guns, the indictment says.

Klansmen used duct tape to bind Dee and Moore, weighted them down with a Jeep engine block, iron weights and railroad rails before throwing them into an old Mississippi River channel, where they drowned, the indictment says.

Dowdy read the details of the crime and then said the Klansmen "met to discuss the murders of Dee and Moore and the need to maintain secrecy among the co-conspirators."

He looked straight at Seale, who showed no emotion.

Seale had been arrested for the slayings in 1964, too, along with Charles Marcus Edwards, who admitted he was involved in the beatings but said the teens were alive when he last saw them. No charges are expected against Edwards.

Authorities confronted Seale in 1964, telling him they knew he and others had taken Dee and Moore "to some remote place and beat them to death," FBI records say.

"You then transported and disposed of their bodies by dropping them in the Mississippi River," the records say. "You didn't even give them a decent burial. We know you did it. You know you did. The Lord above knows you did it."

"Yes," Seale was quoted as replying. "But I'm not going to admit it. You are going to have to prove it."

Asked in a 2000 interview with The Clarion-Ledger if he had anything to do with the crime, Seale replied, "I ain't in jail, am I?"

DOJ_NMG_0122497

Charges against Seale have renewed attention on other unsolved cases. A bill now in Congress would create a cold-cases unit in the Justice Department to track down unpunished civil rights-era killers.

"I think today is a step in the right direction, and I think it will contribute to the passage of the Emmett Till Unsolved Civil Rights Crime Act," said Alvin Sykes, whose work helped lead to the reopening of the 1955 killing of Emmett Till.

When he saw Seale in court Thursday, he said he felt sadness "to see such an old man, but if it's true what he's alleged to have done, he has wasted his life with hatred when he had an opportunity to live a life more fruitful. If he did the crime, he has to do the time. It doesn't matter how old he is."

Reputed Klansman Pleads Not Guilty To Civil Rights Era Murders (WLBT)

By Marsha Thompson

WLBT-TV, January 26, 2007

Fast moving developments in a civil rights era cold murder case. A reputed K.K.K. member is behind bars after facing a federal judge Thursday. James Ford Seale was arraigned in federal court in Jackson Thursday morning, charged with conspiracy charges and the kidnapping of Charles Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee 43 years ago.

United States Attorney General Alberto Gonzales commented on this case, saying authorities are dedicated to tracking down criminals, even if the case dates back decades.

As Seale's wife, brother and family members left the federal courthouse, they ignored the media's questions. The feds say they are out to prove James Ford Seale and other K.K.K. members pretended to be sheriff's deputies when they picked up Charles Moore and Henry Dee near Mendenall May 2, 1964.

The indictment alleges the teenagers were taken to the Homochitto National Forest beaten and their bodies later weighted down and dumped in the Mississippi River. Those seeking justice in forgotten civil rights era cases said they view the arrest of James Seale one step closer to justice.

Alvin Sykes, the president of Emmett Till Campaign Justice says, "In Washington federal officials including Mississippi's U.S. Attorney said it's time for justice."

FBI Director Robert Mueller said, "This was a horrible crime. Indicted with stunning disregard for the suffering of the victims."

Thomas Moore, the brother of Charles Moore believed Seale was dead, until he tracked him down in Roxie, Mississippi. His tenacity persuaded the feds to reopen the decades old case.

U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said, "Thomas Moore uncovered the fact he was alive and well. He came to see me. The case had lain dormant for years."

A grisly reminder of the darker days in Mississippi during the so-called "Summer of Freedom." The 43 year old cold case is no longer dormant, but active with a living suspect.

Feds Get Indictment In Cold Case (ABC)

By Stephanie Sy

ABC News, January 26, 2007

Suspected former Ku Klux Klan member James Seale was indicted for his alleged role in the kidnapping and murder of two black teenagers, 40 years ago. U.S. attorney Alberto Gonzales said Seale faces two counts of kidnapping resulting in death, and one count of conspiracy.

The charges fall just short of murder.

"In late spring of 1964, Henry Dee and Charlie Moore, both age 19, both African-American, were kidnapped by members of the Ku Klux Klan and beaten," said FBI director Robert Mueller.
And then, while still alive, their bodies were tied with weights, pushed into a river, and they were left to drown.

Outside the courthouse, Seale's family kept silent. For years, his son had led reporters to believe he was dead. Seale entered a not guilty plea. If convicted, the 71-year old could spend the rest of his life in prison.

At the time, authorities say they knew it was murder. But such was the power of the Klan in the 1960s, that Seale was never charged.

The case went cold until a few years ago when Charles Moore's brother, along with a documentary filmmaker, started digging deeper.

"I promised him in 2005 at his grave in Franklin that I would fight until I die," said Thomas Moore. "I got the word yesterday. And I cried."

DOJ_NMG_0122498

In 1999, another man implicated in the case spoke to ABC's 20/20. Even though Charles Edwards' allegedly gave a partial confession, he still hasn't been charged. But the ABC report led investigators to obtain the evidence they needed to indict Seale, four decades after the crime.

This posting has been altered from its original version, in which Seale was referred to as a former sheriff's deputy. ABC News later confirmed that Seale was never a police officer or deputy sheriff as previously reported.

US Charges Suspect In 1964 Civil Rights Murders (VOA)

By Jim Malone

Voice of America, January 26, 2007

An elderly white man in the southern state of Mississippi faces federal charges of kidnapping and conspiracy in connection with the 1964 murders of two African-American men. The case is the latest in a series of prosecutions brought by the government to solve racially-motivated crimes from the civil rights era of the 1950s and 1960s. National correspondent Jim Malone has more from Washington.

James Ford Seale, 71, a reputed Ku Klux Klansman, is escorted into the federal courthouse by marshals in Jackson, MississippiThe suspect now under arrest is James Seale, 71, from Mississippi. Prosecutors say Seale was a reputed member of the white supremacist organization known as the Ku Klux Klan and was part of a group of whites that kidnapped two 19-year-old black men in May of 1964.

The two victims, Henry Dee and Charles Moore, were taken to a nearby forest, tied to a tree and beaten.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales describes what happened next:

"Dee and Moore were beaten by their captors, then transported and finally forcibly drowned by being thrown into the old Mississippi River, tied to heavy objects that allegedly included an engine block, iron weights and railroad ties," he said. "These allegations are a painful reminder of a terrible time in our country, a time when some people viewed their fellow Americans as inferior."

The bodies of the two men were found months later and James Seale and another man were initially arrested by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), on murder charges in November of 1964. But local authorities declined to prosecute the two suspects and the case was dropped.

The case was reopened in 2000 after previously uncovered documents indicated the murders of the two black men took place on federal land, allowing the FBI and the Justice Department to once again pursue the case.

A brother of one of the victims, Thomas Moore, pressed federal investigators to reopen the case after he found out that the main suspect, James Seale, was still alive. Seale's family had claimed for years he was dead.

FBI Director Robert Mueller notes that the kidnapping and conspiracy charges against Seale are only allegations at this point that must be proven at trial.

But Mueller says federal officials remain committed to prosecuting civil rights era murder cases that have remained unsolved for decades.

"These tragic murders are from among the darkest page of our country's history," he said. "And while sadly we cannot right the wrongs of the past, we can pursue justice to the end, and we will, no matter how long it takes until every living suspect is called to answer for their crimes."

In recent years, authorities in Mississippi and Alabama have won convictions in several notable civil rights cases from the past including a 1963 church bombing in Alabama that killed four black girls and the 1964 murders of three civil rights workers in Mississippi.

Ex-policeman Charged Over 1964 Killing Of Black Teens (UKIND)

By Andrew Buncombe In Washington

The (UK) Daily Independent, January 26, 2007

A former sheriff's deputy and alleged member of the Ku Klux Klan has been charged over the killing of two black teenagers more than four decades ago - one of the very last of the civil rights-era cases authorities are likely to seek to bring to justice.

James Seale, 71, once believed to be dead, appeared in court in Jackson, Mississippi, yesterday morning where he was charged over the deaths of the two 19-year-olds who were beaten, tied to weights and then thrown alive into a river. Their remains were found several months later by federal authorities who were hunting for the bodies of three civil rights workers who were also murdered by members of the Klan.

According to a three-page indictment laying out the accusations, Mr Seale and several accomplices abducted Henry Dee and Charles Moore as the pair were hitchhiking near an ice-cream stand in the town of Meadville in south-west Mississippi and drove them to Homochitto National Forest. There they allegedly beat the teenagers with tree branches, questioned them at gunpoint and bound them with tape.

Mr Dee was apparently tied to an engine block from a car while Mr Moore was tied to iron weights from a railroad track. Both men were then thrown into the Mississippi river. "It was a horrible crime committed with stunning disregard for the victims," said the FBI director Robert Mueller.

When the case was initially investigated, Mr Seale and another suspect were arrested. But the FBI - perhaps distracted by the "Mississippi Burning" case involving the deaths of three civil rights workers - passed the case to the local authorities and a judge promptly threw out the charges.

For many years, Mr Seale's family told reporters that he was dead. But two years ago Mr Moore's brother, Thomas, and a Canadian filmmaker discovered he was still alive and living in rural Franklin County, close to the scene of the crime.

Thomas Moore put pressure on federal authorities to reopen the case. Mr Seale was arrested on Wednesday.

Yesterday, he was charged with two counts of kidnapping and one count of conspiracy to commit kidnapping. The Attorney General, Alberto Gonzales, said authorities had decided to proceed with these charges rather than murder after examining all the available evidence. He declined to say why an alleged accomplice of Mr Seale's was also not charged, though reports said that the man - a church deacon now aged 72 - has been co-operating with authorities.

In court in Jackson, Mr Seale pleaded not guilty to the charges. The court ordered he be held in custody until Monday when a bail hearing is scheduled to take place. His court-appointed lawyer said his client was suffering from cancer.

The case is the latest in a flurry of crimes and killings dating from the civil rights era that authorities have belatedly sought to prosecute.

In recent years, they have secured convictions against two former Klan members, Thomas Blanton and Bobby Cherry, for the murder of four black girls killed in the bombing of a church in Birmingham, Alabama, in 1963, and Edgar Killen, for the murder of the three civil rights workers in 1964. Killen, a former Klan recruiter, has appealed against his conviction.

Penny Weaver, of the Southern Poverty Law Centre, a civil rights and anti-racism group, said: "It's extremely important [that these cases are brought to trial]. All you have to do is look at the comments of the family members. It's a great relief. They are overwhelmed... by a sense that after all these years someone is taking their loved ones' deaths seriously."

Anthony Collins, the grandson of Thelma Collins, the sister of Henry Dee, said his grandmother had for decades suffered from depression over the death of her brother.

He told The Independent: "Right now, she is happy that there is going to be some resolution. It's been a long time trying to make sure justice is served."

Thomas Moore, a brother of the other murdered man, said: "I'm very satisfied at this point ...I never thought it would happen. I never forgot my brother or Henry Dee."

Man Pleads Not Guilty In 1964 Race Case (ABC)

By Harry Phillips

ABC News, January 26, 2007

Jan. 25, 2007— By all accounts, it was a typically sultry afternoon in tiny Meadville, Miss., on May 2, 1964, the day that two 19-year-olds, Henry Dee and Charles Moore, vanished while walking along a highway on the edge of town.

As far as anyone knew, Dee and Moore had no enemies, nor had they any connection with the burgeoning civil rights movement. They'd never done anything to pique the ire of the notoriously racist and violent White Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, many of whom lived in the rural settlements across Franklin County.

Around Meadville, Dee and Moore were just known as average, law-abiding young black men.

But these were not average times in Mississippi. The civil rights struggle had become a virtual war, defined by the white supremacist KKK taking on anyone who would seek to end racial discrimination.

Ratcheting up the tension, civil rights organizations had recently announced "Freedom Summer" for 1964, a bold initiative to bring activists into the Deep South and register black voters for the coming presidential and congressional elections. Mississippi was, in fact, bracing for the worst summer in a most painful chapter of American History.

In 1964, young men like Henry Dee and Charles Moore knew that to stay safe, they needed to avoid doing anything that might be viewed by the KKK as activism. They also knew to avoid any contact with Klansmen. And so, on that early May afternoon, when a Volkswagen Beetle pulled to a stop beside them, Dee and Moore knew enough to respectfully decline the white driver's offer of a ride.

More than two months later, investigators got their first clue about what happened to the two young men when the partial remains of a black man surfaced in a remote section of the Mississippi River some 90 miles from Meadville. A college identification card found in a pants pocket helped identify the remains as those of Charles Moore.

For another two months, FBI investigators conducted a fruitless investigation of the case until they received a call from an anonymous informant who said he had information about Dee and Moore's disappearance.

The informant was so terrified of the KKK that he insisted on anonymity. The FBI gave him a code name: JN-30R.

Over the ensuing weeks, JN-30R provided the FBI all the information they would need to identify five Klansmen as prime suspects in a horrifying tale of how Henry Dee and Charles Moore were murdered for little reason beyond the color of their skin.

In dozens of pages of reports to the FBI, JN-30R described in gut-wrenching detail how Dee and Moore were kidnapped and taken deep into the Homochitto National Forest and beaten with bean-poles until their bodies were broken and bleeding profusely.

They were then stuffed into the trunk of a car and driven 90 miles to a Mississippi River bank where they were bound and tied to a Jeep engine block and dumped into the river alive.

Brother Wins Arrest In '64 Case (MH)

By Allen G. Breed

The Miami Herald, January 26, 2007

As a deacon at Bunkley Baptist Church, Charles Marcus Edwards was responsible for opening up for Sunday school. And so on that sultry Mississippi morning, he and his wife were the first to arrive at the tiny brick chapel.

A minivan pulled into the gravel drive behind them. A black man got out of the van and approached, followed by a younger white man carrying a video camera. Betty Edwards gave them a friendly wave.

"Mr. Edwards," the black man said, extending a hand with a sealed manila envelope. "I have something for you, sir."

"What is this?" the 72-year-old deacon asked, bemused.

Inside were pages from an unfinished story.

The nine sheets, copied from a 42-year-old FBI file, told a tale of Ku Klux Klansmen and secret codes and terror. They told, in gruesome detail, of the kidnap, torture and slaying of two black men - Henry Hezekiah Dee and Charles Eddie Moore.

Edwards limped quickly toward the church and climbed the three steps. At the top, he stopped and turned.

"What's your name, fella?" the elderly white man asked.

"My name is Moore," the stranger replied. "Thomas James Moore."

The reputed former Klansman moved to enter the sanctuary, then paused and turned again.

"I'm going to tell you, fella," he said, gesturing down at Moore with the church keys in one hand and his Bible clutched in the other. "I DID not kill your brother. I didn't have, I didn't have anything to do with that."

As Edwards disappeared inside the darkened church, his wife jiggled the door handle to make sure it was locked, then slammed it behind her. As the cameraman filmed, Moore walked back to the van, a satisfied grin on his face.

The old man hadn't confessed. But tucked under his arm, along with the black-covered Bible, was the manila envelope, with those chilling documents for the deacon to ponder.

The Sunday morning drama, which happened last year, would become a turning point in the quest for justice in the long-dormant Dee and Moore killings.

Just this week, another document was added in the case: a three-count federal indictment.

Never Too Late For Justice (USAT)

USA Today, January 26, 2007

In the summer of 1964, they were two black teenagers hitchhiking near an ice cream stand in Meadville, Miss.

A car picked up Henry Dee and Charles Moore and drove them into the woods, where Ku Klux Klan members tied them to trees and whipped them. Still alive, the two 19-year-olds were bound, weighted down and thrown into a river, where their bodies were later found.

Their deaths never drew the kind of attention garnered by the nearby murders of three young civil rights workers that same summer. In that, Dee and Moore were more like scores of victims who died in obscurity when the young civil rights movement met the South's last gasp of raw racism.

At the time, both their community and the justice system failed them, as it did many victims of racially motivated slayings. But on Thursday, Dee and Moore found a measure of justice. For that, it is never too late.

Federal authorities arrested and charged James Seale, 71, a former sheriff's deputy and reputed Klan member, in connection with the murders.

Seale was a suspect in 1964, but the case was dropped by local authorities. For years, the case lay dormant. Then, in 2000, The Clarion-Ledger of Jackson, Miss., uncovered documents that gave federal authorities a new hook. And in 2005, while

DOJ_NMG_0122501

Seale family members insisted Seale was dead, Thomas Moore, the brother of one of the victims, found Seale living not far from the murder scene. Moore persuaded authorities to take another look.

Since 1989, authorities have won 22 convictions in cold cases revived from the civil rights era. Some came in murders where suspects, now old men, had bragged that they'd never be punished for their crimes.

To the nation's credit, changing times and values continue to prove them wrong.

LA Gang Member Sentenced To Life In Prison For Targeting Blacks (AP)

AP, January 26, 2007

LOS ANGELES - The fourth member of a Hispanic street gang convicted of hate crimes in a bloody campaign to drive blacks from their neighborhood was sentenced Monday to life without parole in federal prison.

Porfirio Avila, 32, and three other members of the Avenues were found guilty in August in what authorities charged was a conspiracy to attack blacks over six years in the Highland Park area, east of downtown Los Angeles.

Gang members killed one man, Christopher Bowser, who was waiting for a bus in 2000 and another, Kenneth Wilson, who was looking for a parking spot a year earlier, authorities said.

Avila was implicated in the shooting death of Bowser. His three co-defendants were sentenced to two consecutive life terms for their role in the conspiracy and for Wilson's murder.

"Today's sentence, as well as the sentences handed down last November, demonstrate how seriously we take these incidents," said Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general for the civil rights division.

Defense attorneys had claimed police concocted the conspiracy charges by tying together random attacks committed largely by unknown perpetrators. They also questioned the credibility of two former members of the gang who became government witnesses.

Avila has been serving a life sentence in state prison for the murder of Bowser and another black man. A fifth defendant, Merced Cambrero, is a fugitive.

Avila's sentencing punctuates a month that has some residents of another neighborhood and activists fearing a race war between gangs.

Police say a 34-year-old black man was shot without provocation by a Hispanic man in the Harbor Gateway area Saturday - just south from where a 14-year-old black girl was shot to death after she entered an area claimed by a Latino gang last month.

Prison Sex Suit Can Go Forward (DEN)

By Ronald J. Hansen, The Detroit News

Detroit News, January 26, 2007

DETROIT -- A federal judge has overturned a Michigan law intended to write prison inmates out of the state's civil rights act.

The ruling means a lawsuit alleging rampant sexual abuse of female inmates by state prison employees may proceed with its civil rights claims. That lawsuit echoes many of the same abuse problems identified by similar suits and a federal probe of Michigan's prisons more than a decade ago.

U.S. District Judge John Corbett O'Meara said the March 2000 decision to exempt inmates "essentially permits the state to discriminate against female prisoners without fear of accountability under Michigan's civil rights law.

"Given the state's abhorrent and well-documented history of sexual and other abuse of female prisoners, the court finds this amendment particularly troubling," O'Meara wrote. "It appears that the state legislature has not attempted to deter frivolous lawsuits, but rather preclude meritorious ones."

Rusty Hills, a spokesman for the Michigan attorney general, whose office is defending the lawsuit, said, "We're recommending appeal to the (prison) agency because we think the judge is incorrect." The state has argued that inmates still had ample federal civil rights protections and could sue in federal court.

Deborah LaBelle, an Ann Arbor lawyer who is suing the state, said the ruling should send a message to state officials to help end inmate abuse rather than fight lawsuits.

"Instead of addressing the degrading and intolerable abuse of women and girls held in Michigan's prisons, the Department of Corrections thus far has focused its energies on denying the reality of the abuse and silencing women and their families through shutting down legal avenues," LaBelle said.

An April 2005 memo to the Corrections Department from a state lawyer suggests the abuse problem has continued, LaBelle said. "The failure of the Department to take action against this employee is compelling support that the Department is aware of the sexual misconduct of its officers but allows it to continue," the state lawyer wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0122502

In 1999, the state settled a U.S. Justice Department investigation of sexual abuse by promising sweeping changes. At the same time, lawmakers made it more difficult for inmates to pursue abuse claims, in part by eliminating state civil rights protections.

A 2005 Detroit News investigation found that sexual abuse complaints by the women were higher a decade after federal officials first noted Michigan had a problem in 1995.

O'Meara's ruling came a day after the U.S. Supreme Court held that the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which covers Michigan cases, was overly aggressive in throwing out inmate lawsuits.

The Paradox Of Supermax (TIME)

By Jeffery Kluger

Time, January 26, 2007

There's no such thing as a good day for a prisoner at the highest level of security within the Ohio State Penitentiary, a 504-bed supermax prison in Youngstown, Ohio. Every inmate lives alone in a 7-ft. by 14-ft. cell that resembles nothing so much as a large, concrete closet, equipped with a sink, a toilet, a desk and a molded stool and sleep platform covered by a thin mattress. The solid metal door is outfitted with strips around the sides and bottom, muffling conversation with inmates in adjacent cells. Three times a day, a tray of food is delivered and is eaten alone. The prisoner may spend 23 hours a day in lockdown, emerging to exercise once a day. The lights in the cell never go off, although they may be dimmed a bit at night.

If there's not much to like about the conditions in Youngstown, there's not much to like about the people confined there either. These are the men corrections folks like to call "the worst of the worst," the kind of felons who dealt drugs or led gangs or killed on the outside and continued to do so in prison. For them, maximum security would not be enough--only supermax would do. And say what you will about the draconian environment, it keeps them under control.

But that level of control may be counterproductive. It's possible that the very steps we're taking to keep society safe and such prisoners in check are achieving just the opposite. The U.S. holds about 2 million people under lock and key, and 20,000 of them are confined in the 31 supermaxes operated by the states and the Federal Government. That may represent only 1% of the inmate population, but it's a volatile 1%. Push any punishment too far and mental breakdown--or at least a claim of mental breakdown--is sure to follow. When that happens, a constitutional challenge can't be far behind.

In December, officials in Texas and California conceded that the suicide rates in their prisons are on the rise, with the majority occurring among inmates in solitary. This prompted an outcry against both systems. Lawyers for accused terrorist facilitator Jose Padilla challenged his fitness last month to stand trial, arguing that his 312 years in solitary lockdown at a South Carolina military brig have rendered him unable to assist in his own defense. Around the same time, convicted bomber Eric Rudolph began corresponding with a reporter for a Colorado newspaper, describing his days in his 7-ft. by 12-ft. cell as a form of confinement "designed to inflict as much misery and pain as constitutionally permissible."

But is it constitutionally permissible? And even if it is, is this the kind of open-ended mental-health experiment the government should be running? "We have to ask ourselves why we're doing this," says psychiatrist Stuart Grassian, a former faculty member at the Harvard Medical School and a consultant in criminal cases. "These aren't a bunch of cold, controlled James Cagneys. We're taking criminals who are already unstable and driving them crazy."

The origin of solitary confinement in the U.S. is actually benign. It was the Philadelphia Quakers of the 19th century who dreamed up the idea, establishing a program at the city's Walnut Street prison under which inmates were housed in isolation in the hope of providing them with an opportunity for quiet contemplation during which they would develop insight into their crimes. That's not what has happened.

By the 1830s, evidence began to accumulate that the extended solitude was leading to emotional disintegration, certainly in higher numbers than in communal prisons. In 1890 the U.S. Supreme Court weighed in, deploring solitary confinement for the "semi-fatuous condition" in which it left prisoners. The case was narrow enough that its effect was merely to overturn a single law in a single state, but the court's distaste for the idea of solitary was clear. "The justices saw it as a form of what some people now call no-touch torture," says Alfred W. McCoy, a professor of history at the University of Wisconsin at Madison and author of the book A Question of Torture. "It sends prisoners in one of two directions: catatonia or rage."

Modern science has confirmed this, with electroencephalograms showing that after a few days in solitary, prisoners' brain waves shift toward a pattern characteristic of stupor and delirium. When sensory deprivation is added--as when Padilla was seen being led from his cell wearing a blindfold and sound-deadening earphones--the breakdown is even worse. As long ago as 1952, studies at Montreal's McGill University showed that when researchers eliminate sight, sound and, with the use of padded gloves, tactile stimulation, subjects can descend into a hallucinatory state in as little as 48 hours.

All of this is providing legal traction for constitutional lawyers. The most obvious point of attack is the Eighth Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishment. One suit involving prisoners in a Wisconsin supermax has led to rulings requiring that mentally ill inmates be kept out of such facilities. The state is challenging the decisions, and arguments will be heard in February, but at least six other states have fought similar suits, and all of them have failed. "So far, the prisoners are batting a thousand on the issue of mentally ill inmates," says David Fathi, a senior staff counsel with the A.C.L.U.

Another approach--one that's a bit of a constitutional bank shot--is to rely on the 14th Amendment's requirement of a due-process hearing before the state denies an inmate a "liberty interest," something courts define as a reasonable expectation of a freedom or right. People confined to prison have few liberty interests left and thus have little ground to challenge assignment to a strict level of security. Confinement to supermax, however, may be so qualitatively different that it does require a hearing. That's the argument Ohio inmates made in 2005, and that's the argument a unanimous Supreme Court bought, with Justice Anthony Kennedy writing that supermax isolation imposes such an "atypical and significant hardship" that prisoners must have a formal opportunity to make their case against the assignment before prison officials decide.

The eventual ruling on Padilla's fitness could liberalize things further, and similar suits are sure to follow. Even so, no one thinks the supermax system is going away soon. For all the debate the prisons generate, it may not take much to make them more palatable to civil libertarians. TVs or radios, reading material and clocks, as well as a bit of natural lighting--which provides critical time-of-day orientation--would help stabilize inmates. So would human contact with guards or other prisoners.

"Just how sterile do you have to make that cell?" asks retired prison expert Chase Riveland, who spent his career as an official in the Colorado, Wisconsin and Washington prison systems.

What's more, inmates aren't the only ones hurt by extreme incarceration. People like Padilla or the GuantÃ¡namo Bay detainees are, in theory, resources for information about the extremist groups with which they are putatively associated. "To an overwhelming degree, such people are not threats behind bars. They're opportunities," says Grassian. "We hurt ourselves by destroying their sanity." Closer to home, prisoners serving sentences for more mundane crimes do sometimes get released. Demolish their psyches while they're in prison, and nobody's safer when they get out.

Part of the reason we build prisons at all has always been the retributive urge. Those who do very bad things while they walk among us should lead very hard lives after they have been removed. That makes a lot of emotional sense. Whether it always makes practical sense is something else entirely.

By Tamar Lewin

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

With Michigan's new ban on affirmative action going into effect, and similar ballot initiatives looming in other states, many public universities are scrambling to find race-blind ways to attract more blacks and Hispanics.

At Wayne State University Law School in Detroit, a new admissions policy, without mentioning race, allows officials to consider factors like living on an Indian reservation or in mostly black Detroit, or overcoming discrimination or prejudice.

Others are using many different approaches, like working with mostly minority high schools, using minority students as recruiters, and offering summer prep programs for promising students from struggling high schools. Ohio State University, for example, has started a magnet high school with a focus on math and science, to help prepare potential applicants, and sends educators into poor and low-performing middle and elementary schools to encourage children, and their parents, to start planning for college.

Officials across the country have a sense of urgency about the issue in part because Ward Connerly, the black California businessman behind such initiatives in California and Michigan, is planning a kind of Super Tuesday next fall, with ballot initiatives against racial preferences in several states. He is researching possible campaigns in Arizona, Colorado, Missouri, Nebraska, Nevada, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah and Wyoming, and expects to announce next month which states he has chosen.

Ann Korschgen, vice provost at the University of Missouri, said in a recent interview, "Just this morning, we had a conversation along the line of how we would continue to ensure diversity at our campus if we could not consider race."

The issue is already heating up in Colorado. This month, two Republican representatives in Colorado asked the state to examine the University of Colorado's spending on diversity, after a libertarian group questioned the expenditures.

Mr. Connerly said that a decade ago, when California passed its ban, Proposition 209, he thought the state was ahead of its time, but that now, he believes "the country is poised to make a decision about race, about what its place in American life is going to be — and I really believe the popular vote may be the way to achieve that."

Both defenders and opponents of affirmative action say the lesson of last fall's campaign in Michigan — where Proposition 2, banning race and gender preferences in public education, employment and contracting, passed by 58 percent to 42 percent despite strong opposition from government, business, labor, education and religious leaders — is that such initiatives can succeed almost anywhere.

"Certain things become popular as state initiatives, like the ban on gay marriages, and restrictions on affirmative action could become one of those things," said Terry Hartle, senior vice president for government and public affairs at the American Council on Education.

If so, he said, private universities, with their wide discretion in admissions and financial aid, could have a competitive advantage regarding diversity, reshaping the landscape of higher education.

"Private universities can do whatever they want, consistent with federal law and the Supreme Court," Mr. Hartle said. "Where minority students have a choice between selective public universities that cannot use affirmative action, and selective private universities with strong affirmative action programs, the private universities may seem like the more hospitable places, which would give them an advantage in drawing a diverse student body."

To many educators, that would be a troubling turnabout.

"You'd think public universities are charged with special responsibility for ensuring access, but it could come to be exactly the opposite, if there are a lot of these state initiatives," said Evan Caminker, the dean of the University of Michigan Law School, adding, "in terms of public values, it's a big step backward."

Mr. Connerly is unbothered: If black and Hispanic students are rare at selective universities, the solution is better academic preparation, not special treatment in admissions. "Every individual should have the same opportunity to compete," he said. "I don't worry about the outcomes."

Legally, affirmative action has been a moving target. In 2003, the Supreme Court ruled in cases involving the University of Michigan that race could be one of many factors in admissions, although admissions offices could not give extra points to minority candidates. Many colleges nationwide then moved to "holistic" review, considering applicants' ethnicity, but not awarding a set number of points. In states that could face a ballot initiative campaign, though, that standard could fall.

Nationwide, after 30 years of debate, and litigation, over affirmative action, universities have made strikingly little progress toward racially representative student bodies. And recently, with growing awareness that affluent students are vastly overrepresented at selective colleges, the longstanding focus on racial diversity has been joined by a growing concern about economic diversity.

Currently, four states with highly ranked public universities — California, Florida, Michigan and Washington — forbid racial preferences, either because of ballot propositions or decisions by elected officials.

Texas banned affirmative action for seven years. The University of Texas resumed consideration of race after the 2003 United States Supreme Court ruling. "We need every tool we can get," concluded Dr. Bruce Walker, the university's director of admissions.

In California and Texas, the first two states to ban racial preferences, underrepresented minorities at the flagship universities declined — even though both states, and Florida, adopted plans giving a percentage of top high school graduates guaranteed admission to state universities.

In Texas, students admitted through the Top 10 percent plan swamped the flagship Austin campus. But the plan, now being rethought by the Legislature, never brought in many minority students. Last fall, with both race-conscious admissions and the Top 10 plan, blacks made up an all-time high of 5 percent of the freshman class, and Hispanics 19 percent.

A decade after the California ban, only 2 percent of this year's freshmen at the University of California, Los Angeles, are black: a 30-year low. Hispanic representation at U.C.L.A. has dropped, too. At Berkeley, the number of blacks in the freshman class plunged by half the year after the ban, and the number of Hispanics nearly as much.

Systemwide, blacks make up only 3 percent of U.C. freshmen, although about 7 percent of the state's high school graduates are black. Most top black students choose private institutions over state campuses. Over all, of the top third of all students offered admission to the University of California class of 2005, most enrolled and only 19 percent went instead to selective private colleges. But among blacks in that group, 51 percent chose selective private colleges. Meanwhile, up the coast, Stanford University is enrolling more underrepresented minority students. Among this year's freshmen, 11 percent are African-American, up from 8 percent in 1995; Hispanic enrollment has risen, too.

The University of Michigan, with other state institutions, tried to win a delay of the ban so it would not hit in the middle of this year's admissions cycle. But the courts rejected this effort, so officials have stopped considering race and gender as factors in admissions, and worry that next year's entering class will be less diverse. Many officials worry that they will lose top minority candidates to selective private universities.

DOJ_NMG_0122505

"We know from colleagues in Texas and California that if we can't take race into account, we're at a competitive disadvantage," said Julie Peterson, a spokeswoman for the University of Michigan, where two-thirds of the applicants are from out of state.

Since most of Michigan is overwhelmingly white, said Mary Sue Coleman, the university's president, a plan guaranteeing admission to a percentage of top high school graduates would have little impact, and nothing short of affirmative action will maintain the university's racial diversity.

"Of course, you want to look at family income, and being the first in the family to attend college and those kinds of factors, of course we do that, but it doesn't get us to a racially diverse student body," Dr. Coleman said.

At the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, a program guaranteeing that low-income students can graduate debt-free helped to increase the percentage of blacks in the freshman class to 12 percent, and to increase both economic diversity and the enrollment of underrepresented minority students. Other states have started similar programs.

In Detroit, Wayne State University Law School recently adopted a new admissions policy. Jonathan Weinberg, the professor assigned last year to draft a contingency policy, looked at other states with race-blind admissions and found that instead of race, they look to "a set of broader diversity concerns that go to socioeconomic status."

Last month, the faculty adopted his policy, eliminating any mention of race, but broadening the factors the admissions office may consider. Those include being the first in the family to go to college or graduate school; having overcome substantial obstacles, including prejudice and discrimination; being multilingual; and residence abroad, in Detroit or on an Indian reservation.

Frank Wu, the law school's dean, said Wayne State's effort to comply with the law could bring a legal challenge.

"There's a new fight building," Mr. Wu said, "and that's going to be whether the mere fact that you're striving for diversity means you're somehow trying to get around the ban and find proxies, or pretexts, for race, and that that's impermissible. It's ironic, but in some quarters our effort to adopt a new policy to comply with Prop 2 has been interpreted as an effort to circumvent it."

Roger Clegg, president of the Council for Equal Opportunity, which opposes racial preferences, said policies like Wayne State's do raise questions.

"I have a real problem when schools adopt what on their face are race-neutral criteria, if they are doing so to reach a predetermined racial and ethnic goal," Mr. Clegg said. "Both in law and in common sense, the motivation matters."

At Ohio State University, where admissions are increasingly selective, officials are looking for a long-term answer. "When we saw what was coming down the road, we started looking to other models, but no other model results in as much diversity," said Mabel Freeman, assistant vice president at Ohio State. "The only long-term solution is to do better in the pipeline and make sure all kids get the best education possible, K-12."

ANTITRUST:

Senate Hearing On Airline Mergers Highlights Delta Issues (FCDR)

By Philippa Maister, Fulton County Daily Report

Fulton County (GA) Daily Report, January 26, 2007

US Airways' contention that bigger airlines are better for the public got unexpected support Wednesday from a senior official in the U.S. Department of Transportation testifying at a Senate hearing on airline mergers.

Since Sept. 11, the declining health of network carriers has created a growing need to subsidize air service to smaller communities, Andrew B. Steinberg, assistant secretary for aviation and transportation affairs, told the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation -- many of whose members represent largely rural states like Alaska, West Virginia and Minnesota.

"Contrary to what may have been suggested, having fewer, larger network carriers could result in having more services to smaller communities as they try to serve the entire country," Steinberg said.

While US Airways CEO Doug Parker supported Steinberg's statement, Delta Air Lines CEO Gerald Grinstein, who also testified, countered that a merger would only improve service if it involved airlines where there is not a significant amount of overlap, as there is in the Delta-US Airways case.

The Committee's hearing comes as two key deadlines in the first and second weeks of February loom for Delta as it struggles to take control of its future.

The first deadline is Feb. 1, the self-imposed date on which Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways' offer to buy Delta will expire -- unless Parker chooses to extend it. Although some bankruptcy lawyers and financial analysts are questioning its chances for success, a group of creditors holding billions of dollars in claims wants Delta to look at it more closely.

DOJ_NMG_0122506

The second deadline is Feb. 7, when the U.S. Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of New York will hold a hearing on Delta's revised disclosure statement -- essentially a prospectus that provides creditors and other interest-holders with the financial information they need to help them decide whether to go along with Delta's reorganization plan.

As the deadlines approach, both sides have stepped up their public relations campaigns. Delta's unions and employees have rallied to their company's cause in displays of support, as have Georgia Sens. Johnny Isakson and Saxby Chambliss. Meanwhile, US Airways has placed ads in two Capitol Hill publications, Roll Call and The Hill, to persuade legislators that its offer, which it valued at $12.7 billion to $15.4 billion, is best for the traveling public and the companies' employees.

In a letter to Parker, Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., raised "serious concerns" about the merger, which he said "could cast a huge shadow over upstate [New York] air service." Schumer demanded answers to questions about how a merger with Delta would affect routes, fares and employees in his state.

The Senate can't block the merger; only the U.S. Justice Department has that authority. Still, it has influence. Schumer claimed credit in his letter for foiling an attempted hostile takeover of Independence Airline by Mesa Airlines in 2003. Schumer said his request that the Department of Justice investigate Mesa's possible anti-competitive behavior caused Mesa to drop its plan.

Paul Burke O'Hearn, a partner in Burr & Forman's Atlanta office, predicted that a bankruptcy court-appointed unsecured creditors' committee is likely to support Delta's stand-alone plan. O'Hearn is a past chairman of the American Bar Association's Subcommittee on Lender Liability and of the State Bar of Georgia's Bankruptcy Section. He is not involved in the Delta bankruptcy case.

According to Delta's revised disclosure statement, unsecured creditors of Delta subsidiary Comair will get stock in the new Delta projected to be worth 76 percent to 100 percent of their claims. Delta's unsecured creditors will get a 62 percent to 78 percent projected recovery of their claims.

"That's a pretty good deal, assuming all the valuations are right," O'Hearn said. He noted that valuations are performed by investment banks and involve sophisticated analysis of business plans.

But O'Hearn acknowledged there are other players who may not support Delta's reorganization plan.

One group that may not is an unofficial committee of unsecured creditors made up largely of hedge funds that want Delta to take another look at US Airways.

The Unofficial Committee of Unsecured Claimholders, formed Dec. 7, is represented by Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison. It includes 18 hedge funds and investment management companies that hold $2.35 billion worth of creditors' claims against Delta and its subsidiaries. On Jan. 10, the group called on Delta to allow US Airways to do due diligence on the merger and to postpone the Feb. 7 disclosure hearing so that the proposal could be fully evaluated.

O'Hearn said hedge funds -- or, as he termed them, "vulture funds" -- buy up stock and debt in troubled companies at significant discounts and can make a 300 percent return on a six-month investment when the claims are settled.

Another player is the federal Pension Benefits Guaranty Corp., which holds $2.2 billion in claims against Delta. O'Hearn said the PBGC may be attracted to the US Airways buyout offer -- but may also be concerned that, if the merged company failed, it could wind up with an even larger number of pension obligations.

Delta's fate could become clearer after the Feb. 7 disclosure hearing. Creditors could object to approval of Delta's disclosure statement, claiming it doesn't accurately value the US Airways offer and the official and unofficial creditors committees could square off.

If approved, the statement will be submitted to a vote of all creditors.

Hatch Urges Caution In Merger (DESERET)

By Suzanne Struglinski, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON — The potential merger of US Airways and Delta Air Lines concerns Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, according to a letter he sent to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales Thursday.

Hatch and Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., urged the Justice Department to "carefully and thoroughly consider the substantial competitive impact of this merger" should it get to the point of being reviewed."

"From what we are able to glean from publicly available information, there appears to be even more overlap between the US Airways and Delta route networks," Hatch and Kohl wrote. "These two airlines are strong domestic competitors in the East and Mountain West. Their merger would appear to result in a significant increase in concentration — especially on routes serving smaller communities — and could adversely affect Delta's hubs, as well as lead to a reduction in capacity and higher overall fares."

DOJ_NMG_0122507

Delta has a hub at the Salt Lake City International Airport that some Delta employees fear would close under a merger, although US Airways has said it would do no such thing.

The senators said their letter does not "express a firm position on a potential transaction" but that they felt the need to "underscore our firm expectation that the Department will investigate this or any other merger among airlines of all sizes with all due care and vigor."

Kohl is chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Antitrust, Competition Policy and Consumer Rights where Hatch is the top Republican.

Microsoft Executive Wanted To `Whack' Dell Over Linux (Update6) (BLOOM)

By Bob Van Voris And Dina Bass

Bloomberg, January 26, 2007

Jan. 25 (Bloomberg) -- A Microsoft Corp. executive said he wanted to ``whack'' computer maker Dell Inc. over its relationship with Red Hat Inc., the same week a judge ordered the company not to retaliate against sellers of competing software.

In a series of e-mails in November 2002, Microsoft executives discussed how to respond to Dell, then the world's biggest personal computer maker, to discourage its collaboration with Red Hat, the biggest distributor of Linux software. The e- mails came several days after U.S. District Judge Colleen Kollar- Kotelly in Washington approved a consent decree to end the Justice Department's antitrust suit against Microsoft.

``We should whack them, we should make sure they understand our value,'' said Paul Flessner, then the leader of the division that sells Microsoft server software, in an e-mail that was disclosed in a private antitrust class action case against Microsoft currently on trial in Des Moines, Iowa, state court.

The Iowa suit was filed on behalf of a statewide class of consumers who bought Microsoft products from May 1994 to June 2006. They claim Microsoft, the world's biggest software maker, illegally used its market muscle to hobble competitors and charge inflated prices. The consumers claim $329 million in damages, which may be tripled under Iowa law.

Didn't Retaliate

Kollar-Kotelly's order approving the 2002 decree came at the end of a landmark antitrust lawsuit by the U.S. government, one that had threatened Microsoft with a judicially ordered breakup.

The judge's order prohibited the software giant from retaliating against computer makers by ``altering Microsoft's commercial relations,'' or holding back money from manufacturers who partner with companies that produce competing operating systems.

``What counts at the end of the day is what actually happened,'' said Microsoft spokesman Jack Evans. ``We didn't take any retaliatory action against Dell. In fact, we very clearly increased our investment with Dell.''

Robert Lande, who teaches antitrust law at the University of Baltimore law school, said ``on its face it looks like this is anti-competitive.''

``You're allowed to do almost anything to sell your own product,'' Lande said. ``What you can't do is say if you buy from our competitors, we'll whack you.''

Forwarded Message

One of about a dozen Microsoft executives who received the e-mails forwarded Flessner's message to the company's legal department, according to Microsoft Associate General Counsel Richard Wallis.

Wallis declined to disclose the identity of the e-mail recipient who forwarded the message to the legal department, or advice provided as a result, citing the need to preserve privileged communications between attorney and client.

``If anything, this is evidence that our compliance process worked,'' said Evans, the Microsoft spokesman. Microsoft plans to introduce additional e-mails in the trial to show it took appropriate, legal steps to address its relationship with Dell, he said.

As part of the Iowa case, the consumers are trying to prove that Microsoft, whose Windows operating system runs almost 95 percent of the world's personal computers, abused its monopoly in software markets after it settled the Justice Department case.

Dominant Position

Lawyers for the consumers claim Microsoft used its dominant position to stifle competition from Linux, an open-source operating system. In her opening statement in December, Roxanne Conlin, one of two lead lawyers for the plaintiffs, told jurors she will call Red Hat executive Michael Tiemann to testify.

The e-mails show that ``if Microsoft can leverage its market power to its advantage and to disadvantage a competitor, it will do so,'' said Richard Hagstrom, the other lead consumer lawyer.

DOJ_NMG_0122508

The e-mail exchange began with a Nov. 7, 2002, message in which Bill Veghte, Microsoft's vice president for Windows Server, discussed an industry conference he had attended the week before, which included a panel discussion of Linux.

``Each company's position was quite predictably slamming us but the one that really got me animated was Dell," wrote Veghte.

A Dell vice president on the panel said his company was the No. 1 Linux distributor among computer makers and that the company was committed to selling even more, according to Veghte.

At the time of the e-mail exchange, Microsoft viewed Linux as one of the top threats to its business software revenue as some customers considered the program a cheaper alternative to Microsoft's Windows server software.

`Job One'

Microsoft Chief Executive Officer Steve Ballmer, in an interview the month before the e-mails were sent, said he had told his sales force that derailing Linux was ``job one." To keep some customers from choosing Linux, Microsoft offered free support and price cuts.

``I can disagree with your statement that Dell's behavior won't change," Veghte wrote in an e-mail to Microsoft's Flessner. ``If it won't change, then we should just throw in the towel and settle for 50 percent market share at best."

Dell spokeswoman Amy King didn't return a call seeking comment. Red Hat spokeswoman Leigh Day declined to comment.

``I want them to think very, very carefully about when and which forums they decide to push Linux," wrote Veghte in another e-mail. ``Today, they do not. When they do, you can bet, behavior will evolve."

Microsoft shares fell 64 cents to $30.45 in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading.

High Court Upholds Extradition (FT)

By Nikki Tait, Law Courts Correspondent

Financial Times, January 26, 2007

Ian Norris, former chief executive of Morgan Crucible, the engineering group, yesterday lost his appeal against extradition to the US over alleged white collar crimes, which could have wide implications for the business community.

The 63-year-old businessman is the first foreign national to be sought byUS authorities on antitrust charges. His case is also the latest high-profile extradition sought by the US under controversial new fast-track arrangements between the UK and US.

Two High Court judges yesterday dismissed his lawyers' arguments that the price-fixing charges Mr Norris faces in the US did not amount to a criminal offence in the UK at the time and could not constitute an "extradition offence".

Instead, they found the common-law offence of conspiracy to defraud could en-compass cartel activity if an element of dishonesty were present. The judges acknowledged that no price-fixing case had been prosecuted as one of dishonesty in England and that it was not until the 2002 Enterprise Act that a statutory criminal cartel offence was introduced.

But they said: "Although previous competition law did not of itself criminalise cartel activity, it does not follow that it was not previously chargeable as conspiracy to defraud where circumstances might have justified and required it."

Mr Norris's lawyers will appeal to the House of Lords. "We continue to believe that the issues raised in this case need to be heard by theUK's highest court," said Alistair Graham, partner at White & Case.

"The question of whether price-fixing can be characterised as the old English common-law offence of conspiracy to defraud is an absolutely critical point of law, not only in this case and, therefore, for future potential extradition requests, but also for UK competition law and UK businesses in general," Mr Graham said.

"Any decision in this matter has significant ramifications for large numbers of UK businessmen and women, who will be potentially exposed to price-fixing charges in relation to the period prior to 2002."

Mr Norris is being sought by the US authorities for his alleged involvement, while at Morgan Crucible, in an international carbon products cartel, as well as on separate obstruction of justice counts. According to the charges, which he denies, the offences occurred be-tween 1989 and May 2000.

A furore erupted last year when three former NatWest bankers were sent to the US to face Enron-related fraud charges.

Yesterday, in an effort to defuse the controversy, Lord Goldsmith, attorney-general, unveiled a protocol for UK and US prosecutors dealing with cross-border cases. It focuses on early liaison and exchange of information.

"The fundamental issue is that British citizens can still be extradited to the US without prima facie evidence of an offence. The government has not addressed the concerns of business that this is unfair treatment," said Richard Lambert, director-general of the Confederation of British Industry.

Northrop Completes Buyout Of Essex Firm (AP)

Northrop Grumman Completes Buyout of Cybersecurity Company Essex Corp. for $580 Million

LOS ANGELES (AP) -- Military contractor Northrop Grumman Corp. said on Thursday it completed a multibillion-dollar buyout of cybersecurity company Essex Corp., a day after federal regulators granted antitrust approval.

The Los Angeles company will acquire all outstanding shares of Essex for $580 million, or $24 per share, including assumed debt.

The purchase price represents a 0.2 percent premium to Essex's Wednesday closing price of $23.95 on the Nasdaq Stock Market. Based on the 21.8 million outstanding shares held by Essex, the deal will close at roughly $522.7 million.

The defense firm announced plans in November to acquire Columbia, Md.-based Essex to expand its defense and intelligence offerings. Essex is a provider of signal, image and information processing and other services.

Essex will operate as a business unit within Northrop Grumman's Mission Systems unit, considered to be one of the more highly classified areas of the defense company.

Earlier this month, industry insiders speculated there could be a delay on the proposed deal, after Northrop announced plans to refile its merger notice with the Federal Trade Commission to extend the 30-day regulatory waiting period and provide further review by antitrust authorities.

Essex shareholders approved the acquisition in December by more than two-thirds of the majority vote.

Shares of Essex gained 2 cents to $23.99 in aftermarket trading, after gaining 2 cents to close at $23.97 on the Nasdaq. Northrop gained 1 cent to $71.31 in aftermarket trading, after dropping 50 cents to finish at $71.30 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Siemens Touts Purchase Of Texas Company (AP)

Siemens Says Texas Company Fills Key Hole in Its Lineup

DALLAS (AP) -- The leader of UGS Corp. says his company had to grow to survive in the fast-changing business of making software to manage products through their life cycle -- and that being acquired by conglomerate Siemens AG accomplishes the same goal.

"It takes us from being a small player with limited resources to being a major player," said Tony Affuso, the chairman and chief executive of UGS.

Late Wednesday, Siemens announced it would buy UGS from private equity firms Bain Capital, Silver Lake Partners and Warburg Pincus for $3.5 million, including debt that officials for Siemens and UGS put at about $1.4 billion.

Siemens will run UGS as part of its automation and drives group, which is based in Nuremberg, Germany, and managed by Helmut Gierse.

In a phone interview, Gierse said the software company would fit nicely with Siemens' factory-automation business, one of the German conglomerate's biggest and most profitable units.

"It opens up a fascinating possibility for us as the key automation supplier in the world, and UGS will widen our footprint in the United States," he said.

UGS is in the still-young business of PLM, or product lifestyle management. Its customers include automakers as well as aerospace and defense companies in the United States and Europe.

Although UGS lost $7.4 million in the Sept. 30 quarter, and $22 million in 2005, the company has reported 13 straight quarters of year-over-year sales growth and annual revenue of more than $1.1 billion.

Affuso said the company took on more than $1 billion in debt when Electronic Data Systems Corp. sold it to the private equity firms for $2.05 billion in 2004, and added more to buy back preferred shares.

Since then, he said, the company has built up its sales organization and invested in products and marketing, he said. Executives kept reviewing a checklist for taking the company public, but never got close to an IPO, he said.

Gierse said the negotiations to buy UGS took less than six months. He said Siemens hopes to complete the purchase before midyear. The deal will require approval of regulators in the United States and Europe, but Gierse said there was virtually no overlapping business and he didn't expect antitrust concerns to arise.

DOJ_NMG_0122510

For Siemens, the UGS purchase is part of a restructuring strategy that has included several large acquisitions. The company is trying to shed an unprofitable telecommunications equipment division while buying companies in other lines, including medical diagnostics and water treatment.

The Munich-based conglomerate is also dealing with regulatory problems and investigations. On Wednesday, European Union regulators ordered Siemens to pay $517 million for helping fix prices for heavy equipment used by power utilities. Authorities are also investigating suspected bribes to win contracts.

On Thursday, Siemens reported that its profit in the Dec. 31 quarter fell 16 percent because of the price-fixing fine, but would otherwise have jumped 51 percent, to $2.1 billion.

U.S.-traded shares of Siemens rose $4.90, or 4.9 percent, to close at $105.09 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Siemens Profit Falls 17%, Hit By Price-Fixing Fine (WSJ)

By Joon Knapen

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

MUNICH -- Siemens AG posted a 17% decline in fiscal first-quarter net profit because of a European Union fine for price fixing, though its operating profit improved after a turnaround at its information-technology unit.

Net profit in the three months ended Dec. 31 fell to €739 million ($957.8 million) from €886 million a year earlier, weighed down by a €423 million charge tied to the EU fine.

Sales rose 6.1% to €19.07 billion from €17.98 billion, while new orders were up 3.9% to €24.58 billion. Sales and new orders were boosted by double-digit percentage growth in power generation and transmission and automation and drives.

The company posted a 51% rise in operating profit, which excludes expenses such as the EU fine.

The quarterly results were disclosed just hours after the German engineering and technology giant announced a sweeping portfolio revamp: It agreed to buy U.S. software firm UGS Corp. for $3.5 billion, while planning to sell a minority stake in its Siemens VDO Automotive car-parts division through an initial public offering.

Siemens shares ended up 6% Thursday at €82.60 in Frankfurt.

The information-technology-services unit, SBS, posted profit of €24 million, compared with a loss of €232 million, while earnings climbed at other units, such as medical equipment and transportation systems.

Chief Executive Officer Klaus Kleinfeld has disposed of the loss-plagued cellphone arm, unveiled job cuts and made several big purchases since taking the helm in early 2005. He also vowed to bring profit margins in line with peers such as General Electric Co. by April.

Mr. Kleinfeld still has his work cut out to raise the profitability of four of the conglomerate's 10 divisions in the current quarter in order to meet that April deadline.

Meanwhile, Siemens has been haunted by several issues, with the latest blow coming Wednesday from a €423 million penalty imposed by the European Commission for price fixing among providers of gas-insulated electric-power switchgear. The company also is a target of investigations by Munich prosecutors in a wide-ranging bribery probe, with several former executive-board members of the company among the suspects.

"In terms of underlying performance of our business, the first quarter got the fiscal year off to a strong start," Mr. Kleinfeld said, adding that Siemens remains committed to achieving the divisional profit margin targets by April.

Meanwhile, the CEO continues to overhaul Siemens's industrial holdings that make items including steam turbines, high-speed trains and light bulbs, in a drive to boost the company's profitability.It is in the process of transferring its telecommunications equipment unit into a joint venture with Nokia Corp., as the initial starting date was delayed due to the bribery investigations. Mr. Kleinfeld yesterday said that he still expects the deal to be completed in the current quarter.

Kroes: EU Probe Has Uncovered Problems (AP)

EU Official Says Probe Into World Body's Banking Sector Has Uncovered Antitrust Problems

DAVOS, Switzerland (AP) -- A yearlong investigation into the European Union's banking sector has uncovered antitrust problems, according to the bloc's Antitrust Commissioner, Neelie Kroes.

The European Commission, the EU's executive arm, is slated to publish its final report on the banking probe on Jan. 31.

Kroes told Dow Jones Newswires on the sidelines of the World Economic Forum's annual meeting that "some segments of the market are anticompetitive."

"I'm not against profit, but there are some cases where there are firms making too much," she said, declining to elaborate.

DOJ_NMG_0122511

People familiar with the study say individual companies won't face antitrust charges at this point, but the report will show credit card companies such as Visa International and MasterCard Inc. and the retail banks that issue the cards are charging too much for their services.

The commission's efforts to lower credit and bank-card fees are aimed at integrating the EU's banking sector, which remains fragmented despite the advent of the euro.

By 2010, the commission hopes to have a framework to allow businesses and customers to make cross-border electronic payments as easily and at the same cost as within their own country.

Some electronic-payment companies are monopolies, a situation the commission's report is expected to criticize in broad strokes. For instance, Belgium's Banksys -- formed as a partnership of the country's largest retail banks and now owned by French information technology company Atos Origin SA -- handles all the country's electronic payments. Banksys issues the card readers that stores and restaurants use to process credit and bank-card payments and also controls the country's automated teller machines.

Since taking office in November 2004, Kroes has initiated two main investigations: a wide-ranging look at the financial-sector and a similar study of Europe's energy market.

Earlier this month, Kroes' final report on the energy-sector probe showed the EU's gas and electricity prices are unreasonably high because of limited cross-border integration and overly dominant former state-owned monopolies.

The report didn't name-and-shame monopolies, but some sections showing market shares in specific countries pointed to companies such as Electricite de France SA and Germany's E.On AG.

When the report was published, Kroes said she is prepared to order the breakup of some monopolies if they don't change their business practices.

Cardinal, Refocusing On Core, Sells A Unit (WSJ)

By Heather Won Tesoriero

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

Reversing a decade-long campaign of diversification, Cardinal Health Inc. is selling its drug manufacturing and packaging division for $3.3 billion to the private-equity powerhouse Blackstone Group.

The deal is the latest move by Cardinal's new chief executive, R. Kerry Clark, to refocus the Dublin, Ohio, company on its core business of drug distribution, and on products to promote the safe use of drugs and to control medication dispensing.

· The News: Drug distributor Cardinal Health will sell its drug manufacturing and packaging unit to Blackstone Group for $3.3 billion.

· Why: The unit, roughly 10 years old, had underperformed in recent years.

"We're looking at all our businesses and making sure they have a strategic fit," Jeff Henderson, Cardinal's chief financial officer, said in an interview. The unit "didn't fit with the direction we're headed."

The divestiture is a marked departure from the path charted by Mr. Clark's predecessor, Robert Walter, who was the architect of Cardinal's growth through the acquisition of smaller drug distributors and, ultimately, companies that provide services such as manufacturing and packaging to pharmaceutical makers.

Separately, the company disclosed that Mr. Walter, who remains executive chairman of Cardinal's board, and four other former officers and employees received Wells notices from the Securities and Exchange Commission, stemming from a years-old accounting probe. A Wells notice indicates that the SEC staff intends to recommend action against the recipient.

Cardinal spokesman Jim Mazzola said that the notice "pertains to an individual and not the company. It doesn't impact settlement discussions with the SEC." Mr. Mazzola said Mr. Walter wasn't available for comment.

As a result of the Blackstone deal, expected to close by June, the drug distributor would shed a unit that aimed to be a one-stop outsourcing center for drug makers. The unit contracted with pharmaceutical companies to manufacture a host of prescription and over-the-counter products, including Advil Liqui-Gels for Wyeth and Tamiflu for Roche Holding AG. Cardinal even built a showroom in New Jersey, home to many major drug manufacturers, to entice companies to use its services.

But the business proved disappointing for Cardinal. It "had become a distraction for them," said Larry Marsh, a drug-distribution analyst with Lehman Brothers. "It wasn't really generating the kinds of returns that they wanted," he said. Mr. Marsh said that based on the unit's acquisitions and capital spending costs over the years, he doesn't think the company profited much from the sale. However, based on depreciating the assets and some write-offs, its tax basis allows for a slight gain, which Cardinal noted.

Drug distributors have been roiled by shrinking margins and consolidation in recent years. Roughly 90% of all drugs in the U.S. are distributed by three companies. Through the 1980s and early part of the 1990s, Cardinal and rivals McKesson Corp. and AmerisourceBergen Corp. grew robustly through acquisitions and business expansion. Of the three, Cardinal took the most divergent path by entering into medical technology and contract manufacturing with the goal that such services would give it a competitive edge in attracting and keeping its drug distribution business. Products from Cardinal units include medical-device software and computerized medicine cabinets that help hospitals control and monitor drug inventory.

Now, all of the so-called "Big Three" are reassessing their businesses and making efforts to return to their roots. McKesson announced plans to sell its medical-supply business later this year. And AmerisourceBergen has beefed up its drug distribution business in Canada.

Cardinal announced its intention to sell its manufacturing arm in November. Morgan Stanley was slated to handle an auction of the unit, but Blackstone stepped in and offered $3.3 billion, which was higher than some analysts' estimated price tag of $2.1 billion to $3 billion.

Blackstone Senior Managing Director Chinh Chu said the Cardinal unit was very attractive and could see robust sales with "more capital to accelerate growth and pursue acquisitions."

Also yesterday, Cardinal reported earnings for its fiscal second quarter. For the quarter ended Dec. 31, revenue increased 13% to $21.8 billion and earnings from continuing operations rose 10% to $316 million, or 77 cents a share.

Finally, the company also announced an agreement to acquire SpecialtyScripts Pharmacy to broaden its specialty pharmaceutical service offerings for pharmaceutical manufacturers. Terms weren't disclosed.

Cardinal shares rose 3.4%, or $2.39, to $72.42 in New York Stock Exchange 4 p.m. composite trading.

Blackstone Raises Ante In Battle For Equity Office (NYT)

By Terry Pristin

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

The biggest leveraged buyout ever got bigger yesterday.

The Blackstone Group, a private equity firm, increased its bid for Equity Office Properties to $54 a share. Equity Office is the nation's largest office landlord, with nearly 600 buildings across the country.

The new offer represents an 11 percent premium over the price that Equity Office and Blackstone had agreed on in November when they announced the deal. With the assumption of $15.3 billion in debt, the deal would have a value of $38.3 billion, Equity Office said in yesterday's announcement.

In exchange for raising its bid, Blackstone got Equity Office to increase the breakup fee — the amount it would receive if its bid failed — to $500 million, from $200 million.

Last week, a group of real estate investors led by Vornado Realty Trust made an informal bid of $52 a share in cash and stock for Equity Office, a real estate investment trust founded by the Chicago real estate magnate Samuel Zell. Equity Office has since allowed the Vornado team access to its books and has set a deadline of next Wednesday for a formal offer.

A spokeswoman for Vornado, a REIT with a diversified portfolio that includes office buildings, retail space and showrooms, said yesterday that the company would respond to the latest offer "at the appropriate time."

Shares of Equity Office rose 8 cents, to $54.90, and Vornado shares rose $1.11, to $125.76.

Blackstone, controlled by Stephen A. Schwarzman, bought interests in more than $28 billion worth of real estate from 2001 to 2006, 38 percent more than next largest buyer, according Dan Fasulo, director of market analysis for Real Capital Analytics, a New York investment firm.

Blackstone says its offer has advantages over the Vornado bid aside from price. It is all cash, and could be completed three days after a vote by Equity Office shareholders, set for Feb. 5. If Vornado prevailed, a deal might need approval of its shareholders, analysts said.

"Our offer is now materially superior on price, timing, form of consideration and certainty," said John Ford, a Blackstone spokesman.

Kathy Shanley, a corporate bond analyst, for Gimme Credit, an independent research company in Chicago, said the new offer had shifted the odds in Blackstone's favor. "They have all their financing locked up, they could close quicker, and there's a lot less uncertainty," she said.

But, she added: "Vornado has said they don't anticipate any problems, and they have some heavy hitters on their side. At some level, it all depends on who blinks first."

Barry Vinocur, the editor of REIT Wrap, a daily newsletter about real estate investment trusts, said Vornado and its partners in the deal, the Starwood Capital Group and Walton Street Capital, two real estate investment funds, were almost certain to raise their bid.

Vornado has said that if its bid is successful, it will retain the Equity Office buildings on the East and West Coasts, including the Verizon building at 42nd Street and the Avenue of the Americas in the red-hot Midtown Manhattan market.

Starwood — whose chief executive, Barry S. Sternlicht, founded the Starwood Hotel and Resorts chain — and Walton Street Capital would take Equity Office buildings in markets like Miami, San Jose and Seattle, where real estate values are expected to rise in the next couple of years. Neil G. Bluhm, the president of JMB Realty, a Chicago development company, is a co-founder of Walton Street.

Mr. Vinocur said Mr. Zell and his investment bankers had done a “masterful” job of steering the acquisition process by setting the breakup fee low enough so that other bidders would enter the contest.

“This is chess at its highest level,” he said.

Fox Subpoenas YouTube Over Pirated TV Shows (WSJ)

By Nicole Urbanowicz

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

News Corp.'s Twentieth Century Fox has subpoenaed Google Inc.'s YouTube video-sharing site to unveil the identity of a user who uploaded pirated copies of recent episodes of "24" and "The Simpsons."

The subpoena filed Jan. 18 in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California requests that YouTube disclose information sufficient to identify the subscriber so that Fox can stop the infringing immediately.

According to the subpoena's declaration made by Jane Sunderland, vice president of content protection for Twentieth Century Fox, the four-episode season premiere of "24" appeared on the site ahead of its TV broadcast, and 12 episodes of the Simpsons were being distributed on the site by a subscriber identified as "ECOtotal."

On Jan. 8, Fox said it officially notified YouTube about the infringed episodes and requested immediate removal or to disable access to the service. News about the subpoena filed surfaced on the blog, Google Watch.

The same group of episodes were uploaded under the username of Jorge Romero on the video site LiveDigital, to which Fox also issued a subpoena.

A spokesman for LiveDigital said the material was taken down right away and LiveDigital intends to comply with the subpoena immediately.

A recent YouTube search revealed only a prequel to Season 6 of "24" and several clips from The Simpsons episodes.

This isn't the first time the Twentieth Century Fox has had a piracy issue involving YouTube; a young user was identified in a case in which a Family Guy episode was posted on YouTube ahead of its premiere. However, in this recent case, Fox noted in the subpoena it has been unable to discover through its own investigation the identity of the subscriber.

The issue of piracy has sparked concern among entertainment companies and music and video-sharing sites, along with legal implications of whether the sharing sites should be financially accountable.

Excluding damages related to piracy of TV episodes, the Motion Picture Association estimates that major global movie studios lost about $2.3 billion to Internet piracy in 2005.

It is unknown whether YouTube has responded to the subpoena at this point and calls to YouTube weren't immediately returned.

Energy Mandates Fuel A Rift (WSJ)

By JOHN J. FIALKA

Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Raising the federal mandate for using renewable and alternative energy sources may mean bigger government incentives for efforts to turn coal into diesel-engine fuel. But President Bush's push for domestic alternatives to imported oil has ignited a battle between coal interests and environmentalists -- and underscored tension between the goals of increasing U.S. energy security and curbing global warming.

Greater use of liquid fuels made from coal, the nation's most plentiful energy source, would reduce reliance on imported oil. But making the liquid fuels and burning them in automobile engines would release additional carbon dioxide, a greenhouse gas thought to accelerate climate change, environmentalists say.

The president's proposal, described in his State of the Union address, would require blenders of gasoline to include 35 billion gallons of renewable and alternative fuels by 2017. The 2005 energy law includes incentives for renewable fuels, such as ethanol, but not for alternatives, such as coal-based fuel.

James Connaughton, who heads the White House Council on Environmental Quality, says the president's proposal is designed "to create an opportunity for a variety of other approaches," which, he said, could include such fuels as methanol and diesel oil made from coal. The goal, he says, is to create a technological horse race that will make it easier for promising ideas for alternative fuel to find investors. Currently, there are no commercial-size coal-liquefaction plants in the U.S.

While administration officials have assured coal-industry lobbyists that coal-to-liquid fuels are embraced in the president's proposal, Mr. Bush has kept the focus on more environmentally popular options, such as corn-based ethanol and ethanol produced from farm wastes, including corn stalks. But even before Mr. Bush's speech, leaders of 11 environmental groups wrote lawmakers last week that they would oppose "any effort to support coal-based transportation fuels."

"The more you scratch this, the dirtier it gets," says Anna Aurilio, director of the Washington office of the U.S. Public Interest Research Group. She worries that oil made from abundant shale formations in Colorado and Utah might also get support. Environmentalists are backed by the ethanol industry, which doesn't want the coal industry muscling in on a fuel mandate that ethanol producers now have to themselves.

The divergence over the fuel mandate opens up gaps that some politicians may find difficult to straddle. Sen. Barack Obama, an Illinois Democrat and White House hopeful, is a sponsor of the Coal-to-Liquid Fuel Promotion Act, which provides more tax incentives and federal loan guarantees for companies interested in making coal-based fuels. Mr. Obama also supports ethanol subsidies. He has said that the nation's continued use of fossil fuels such as coal is "condemning future generations to global catastrophe" posed by climate change.

Tommy Vietor, a spokesman for the senator, says Mr. Obama's "vision" is that "any coal-to-liquids production would have to operate within the framework of a bipartisan Senate proposal to reduce greenhouse-gas emissions across all major sectors of the U.S. economy."

Rep. Rick Boucher, a Virginia Democrat who is chairman of the subcommittee that will put together the package of fuel incentives, says "I think coal-to-liquids should be a part of the mix of alternatives going forward." Mr. Boucher, who represents a coal-mining area, says that a process of deriving diesel oil from coal was used by both Germany and Japan during World War II to make up for shortages of imported oil, and may be the most proven alternative to gasoline.

Coal companies say that problems for makers of ethanol-based fuels render coal-based fuels more competitive. They see an annual production ceiling on corn-based ethanol of about 15 billion gallons annually; above that point, food experts say, demand for corn will raise food and meat prices to unacceptable levels. Coal-industry spokesmen also say that the technology to make ethanol from farm wastes, called cellulosic ethanol, hasn't been proven commercially.

Vic Svec, a senior vice president for Peabody Energy Corp., the nation's largest coal producer, says the company already is scouting for sites to build a coal-to-liquid plants "We are very encouraged by the bipartisan support that's been expressed on this, from President Bush to Senator Obama," says Mr. Svec, who notes that governors and officials from 16 Southern states also support new incentives for coal-based liquids.

Bob Dinneen, president of the Renewable Fuels Association, which represents ethanol manufacturers, says his group will fight to keep such alternative fuels out of any new federal mandate for renewable fuels. "Doing this ecumenical approach of all alternative fuels, I think, will just confuse the investment community," he says.

It isn't clear who will win the competition to produce new domestic fuels. Ethanol-industry experts predict that at least two companies will commit to building cellulosic ethanol plants this year. But DKRW Energy LLC, of Houston, already has the permits and partners for a plant that makes diesel oil from coal that could begin production by 2010.

Robert Kelley, DKRW's chairman, says the facility will be built near Medicine Bow, Wyo., and will produce 13,000 barrels a day. DKRW has two partners in the project, Arch Coal Inc., which owns a nearby mine, and Sinclair Oil Corp., which will market the diesel fuel. Mr. Kelley says the diesel oil produced won't harm the environment because the production turns the coal into a gas, from which carbon dioxide will be removed and sold to oil companies. And the oil companies will inject the carbon dioxide generated in the process back into the ground to produce more oil.

David Hawkins, a climate-change expert for the Natural Resources Defense Council, says the diesel fuel still contains carbon dioxide, which will be released into the air when it is burned in the engines of cars and trucks. "This issue is the classic example of why you need to have an integrated policy on both global warming and energy," he says.

The President's Energy Policy (WP)

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

ANTICIPATING Tuesday's State of the Union speech, Al Hubbard, President Bush's national economic adviser, spoke of "headlines above the fold that will knock your socks off in terms of our commitment to energy independence." The address that Mr. Bush delivered certainly was bold. But by choosing energy independence as his main policy target, Mr. Bush missed opportunities to improve energy security and to combat climate change.

DOJ_NMG_0122515

The president was on firmest ground with his call for stricter fuel economy standards. His administration has already increased the standard for light trucks by executive order, but it lacks the authority to do the same for cars; he has asked Congress to step forward. The standards that the president supports are weaker than they could be because they aim to improve the fuel efficiency of each category of car rather than also prodding manufacturers to build smaller cars in greater numbers. Still, Mr. Bush called for an improvement of 4 percent per year in the miles-per-gallon rating of new vehicles. If enacted without loopholes, this would reduce the nation's vulnerability to oil shocks and slow global warming.

Mr. Bush also used his speech to propose a shift away from gasoline toward alternative fuels. The nation's cars and trucks already burn about 4 billion gallons of non-gasoline fuel per year, and current law requires fuel blenders to boost that quantity to 7.5 billion gallons by 2012, which they will do by stepping up the use of corn-derived ethanol. This replacement of oil with corn ethanol reduces oil imports but cuts carbon emissions only slightly. Mr. Bush now proposes to shoot for fully 35 billion gallons of alternative fuel to be used annually by 2017. Where could this extra fuel come from?

Corn-based ethanol can't provide more than 15 billion gallons to fulfill the mandate, since there's a limit to the land available to plant corn, and livestock farmers are already complaining that the price of corn feed has been driven up by the ethanol mandate. In an ideal world, the other 20 billion gallons of alternative fuel might come from ethanol distilled from switch grass and other plant material; this "cellulosic" ethanol has the potential to cut carbon emissions far more substantially than the corn-based variety. But cellulosic ethanol remains an unproven technology. Unless that changes, Mr. Bush's alternative fuel standard could open the door to oil derived from coal -- an option that's known to work but that would be far worse for global warming than burning traditional gasoline.

The president's other energy proposal was to double the size of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve, which insures against the risk of an oil supply disruption. This is where the focus on energy independence obscures true energy security. In the face of the danger of oil price shocks, what matters is not the size of oil reserves in the United States but the size of such reserves globally. U.S. energy security depends, for example, on whether India has a reserve that it could tap in the event of a sudden shortage: If it doesn't, India will respond to a shortage by buying more oil on world markets, forcing up global oil prices and hitting motorists on the Beltway. Mr. Bush's unilateral solution -- build a bigger oil reserve at home -- is hugely expensive and less likely to be effective than an effort to energize existing diplomacy aimed at bringing the Indians and Chinese into the system of strategic oil reserves coordinated by the International Energy Agency.

Congress should embrace Mr. Bush's call for higher fuel efficiency standards and treat his other ideas cautiously. In particular, it should not use his alternative-fuel target as an excuse to throw yet more subsidies at corn-based ethanol -- a policy that farm-state members will find tempting as they write this year's farm bill. Instead, Congress should press ahead with legislation aimed squarely at slowing climate change. That, not independence, should be the top priority for energy policy.

Is there anything more depressing than yet another promise of energy independence in yet another State of the Union address? By my count, 24 of the 34 State of the Union addresses since the oil embargo of 1973 have proposed solutions to our energy problem.

The result? In 1973 we imported 34.8 percent of our oil. Today we import 60.3 percent.

And what does this president propose? Another great technological fix. For Jimmy Carter, it was the magic of synfuels. For George Bush, it's the wonders of ethanol. Our fuel will grow on trees. Well, stalks, with even fancier higher-tech variants to come from cellulose and other (literal) rubbish.

It is very American to believe that chemists are going to discover the cure for geopolitical weakness. It is even more American to imagine that it can be done painlessly. Ethanol for everyone. Farmers get a huge cash crop. Consumers get more supply. And the country ends up more secure.

This is nonsense. As my colleague Robert J. Samuelson demonstrated this week, biofuels will barely keep up with the increase in gasoline demand over time. They are a huge government bet with goals and mandates and subsidies that will not cure our oil dependence or even make a significant dent in it.

Even worse, the happy talk displaces any discussion about here-and-now measures that would have a rapid and revolutionary effect on oil consumption and dependence. No one talks about them because they have unhidden costs. Politicians hate unhidden costs.

There are three serious things we can do now: Tax gas. Drill in the Arctic. Go nuclear.

First, tax gas. The president ostentatiously rolled out his 20-in-10 plan: reducing gasoline consumption by 20 percent in 10 years. This with Rube Goldberg regulation -- fuel-efficiency standards, artificially mandated levels of "renewable and alternative fuels in 2017" and various bribes (er, incentives) for government-favored technologies -- of the kind we have been trying for three decades.

Good grief. I can give you 20-in-2: Tax gas to $4 a gallon. With oil prices having fallen to $55 a barrel, now is the time. The effect of a gas-tax hike will be seen in less than two years, and you don't even have to go back to the 1970s and the subsequent radical reduction in consumption to see how. Just look at last summer. Gas prices spike to $3 -- with the premium going to Vladimir Putin, Hugo ChÃ¡vez and assorted sheiks rather than the U.S. Treasury -- and, presto, SUV sales plunge, the Prius is cool and car ads once again begin featuring miles-per-gallon ratings.

No regulator, no fuel-efficiency standards, no presidential exhortations, no grand experiments with switch grass. Raise the price, and people change their habits. It's the essence of capitalism.

Second, immediate drilling to recover oil that is under U.S. control, namely in the Arctic and on the outer continental shelf. No one pretends that this fixes everything. But a million barrels a day from the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge is 5 percent of our consumption. In tight markets, that makes a crucial difference.

We will always need some oil. And the more of it that is ours, the better. It is tautological that nothing more directly reduces dependence on foreign oil than substituting domestic for foreign production. Yet ANWR is now so politically dead that the president did not even mention it in the State of the Union or in his energy address the next day.

He did bring up, to enthusiastic congressional applause, global warming. No one has a remotely good idea about how to make any difference in global warming without enlisting China and India, and without destroying the carbon-based Western economy. The obvious first step, however, is an extremely powerful source of energy that produces not an ounce of carbon dioxide: nuclear.

What about nuclear waste? Well, coal produces toxic pollutants, as does oil. Both produce carbon dioxide that we are told is going to end civilization as we know it. These wastes are widely dispersed and almost impossible to recover once they get thrown into the atmosphere.

Nukes produce waste as well, but it comes out concentrated -- very toxic and lasting nearly forever. But because it is packed into a small, manageable volume, it is more controllable. And it doesn't pollute the atmosphere. At all.

There is no free lunch. Producing energy is going to produce waste. You pick your poison, and you find a way to manage it. Want to do something about global warming? How many global warming activists are willing to say the word nuclear?

So much easier to say ethanol. That it will do farcically little is beside the point. Our debates about oil consumption, energy dependence and global warming are not meant to be serious. They are meant for show.

Potomac Watch If The Cap Fits (WSJ)

By Kimberley A. Strassel

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

Washington this week officially welcomed the newest industry on the hunt for financial and regulatory favors. Big CarbonCap may have the same dollar-sign agenda as Big Oil or Big Pharma, but don't expect Nancy Pelosi to admit to it.

Democrats want to flog the global warming theme through 2008 and they'll take what help they can get, even if it means cozying up to executives whose goal is to enrich their firms. Right now, the corporate giants calling for a mandatory carbon cap serve too useful a political purpose for anyone to delve into their baser motives.

The Climate Action Partnership, a group of 10 major companies that made headlines this week with its call for a national limit on carbon dioxide emissions, would surely feign shock at such an accusation. After all, their plea was carefully timed to coincide with President Bush's State of the Union capitulation on global warming, and it had the desired PR effect. The media dutifully declared that "even" business now recognized the climate threat. Sen. Barbara Boxer, who begins marathon hearings on warming next week, lauded the corporate angels for thinking of the "common good."

There was a time when the financial press understood that companies exist to make money. And it happens that the cap-and-trade climate program these 10 jolly green giants are now calling for is a regulatory device designed to financially reward companies that reduce CO2 emissions, and punish those that don't.

Four of the affiliates -- Duke, PG&E, FPL and PNM Resources -- are utilities that have made big bets on wind, hydroelectric and nuclear power. So a Kyoto program would reward them for simply enacting their business plan, and simultaneously sock it to their competitors. Duke also owns Cinergy, which relies heavily on dirty, CO2-emitting coal plants. But Cinergy will soon have to replace those plants with cleaner equipment. Under a Kyoto, it'll get paid for its trouble.

NOTE

We reintroduce today the weekly Potomac Watch column from Washington. It will appear on Fridays and be written by Kimberley Strassel, a member of the Journal editorial board. Ms. Strassel joined the Journal in 1994 and has worked as a reporter in Europe and as an editor and editorial writer in New York.

DOJ_NMG_0122517

DuPont has been plunging into biofuels, the use of which would soar under a cap. Somebody has to cobble together all these complex trading deals, so say hello to Lehman Brothers. Caterpillar has invested heavily in new engines that generate "clean energy." British Petroleum is mostly doing public penance for its dirty oil habit, but also gets a plug for its own biofuels venture.

Finally, there's General Electric, whose CEO Jeffrey Immelt these days spends as much time in Washington as Connecticut. GE makes all the solar equipment and wind turbines (at $2 million a pop) that utilities would have to buy under a climate regime. GE's revenue from environmental products long ago passed the $10 billion mark, and it doesn't take much "ecomagination" to see why Mr. Immelt is leading the pack of climate profiteers.

CEOs are quick learners, and even those who would get smacked by a carbon cap are now devising ways to make warming work to their political advantage. The "most creative" prize goes to steel giant Nucor. Steven Rowlan, the company's environmental director, doesn't want carbon caps in the U.S. -- oh, no. The smarter answer, he explains, would be for the U.S. to impose trade restrictions on foreign firms that aren't environmentally clean. Global warming as foil for trade protectionism: Chuck Schumer's dream.

What makes this lobby worse than the usual K-Street crowd is that it offers no upside. At least when Big Pharma self-interestedly asks for fewer regulations, the economy benefits. There's nothing capitalist about lobbying for a program that foists its debilitating costs on taxpayers and consumers while redistributing the wealth to a few corporate players.

This is what comes from Washington steadily backstepping energy policy into the interventionist 1970s, picking winners and losers. In ethanol, in biodiesel, in wind farms, success isn't a function of supply or demand. The champs are the ones that coax out of Washington the best subsidies and regulations. Global warming is simply the biggest trough yet.

Both Republicans and Democrats understand this debate is increasingly about home-state economics, even as they publicly joust about environmental rights or wrongs. The softening Republican stance on a mandatory program is one result. New Mexico's Pete Domenici appeared to undergo an epiphany about global warming in 2005, voting for a Senate resolution supporting caps. The switch might have more to do with remembering that his state is nuclear-power central, and will win big under a new program. Just ask his fellow New Mexican, Jeff Bingaman, who introduced the resolution.

Economic interests also motivate those Democrats who won't play nice. The senators who have voted against previous bills represent those industries that will suffer most under Mr. Immelt's agenda. Louisiana's Mary Landrieu (oil); Montana's Max Baucus (coal); West Virginia's Robert Byrd (ditto). House Energy & Commerce Chair John Dingell remains a skeptic, since the last thing his Michigan auto makers need is yet another reason for people to not buy their cars.

Which is fine with Ms. Pelosi. The Democratic leadership ran out of the winner's circle last November promising to tackle climate. And much was made this week of Madam Speaker's decision to wrest control of the debate away from Mr. Dingell's purview, handing it instead to a new "select" committee on climate change.

But read the fine print. The new vaunted committee will have no legislative authority, but exists solely to hold hearings and to "communicate with the American people." Ms. Pelosi and Harry Reid want to talk about this issue . . . and talk, and talk and talk. But not necessarily anything more.

That's because Democrats want global warming as an issue through 2008. With Al Gore getting his Oscar nod, they've got a "problem" that captures the public imagination, as well as an endless supply of cash from thrilled environmental groups. No need to spoil it with a solution. And a Democratic president in 2009 would be more open to any ultimate legislation.

Best yet, they've got the "support" of the business community, or at least the savvier elements of it. Welcome, Big CarbonCap; we're likely to be hearing a lot from you.

New Dem Leader Challenges GOP Over Religion (POL)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, January 26, 2007

Many of the models displayed at the Washington Auto Show have brought couples together over the years. Did it work for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and Energy and Commerce Chairman John Dingell, D-Mich.?

The Politico heard differing accounts of the success of the auto date and a subsequent meeting at Pelosi's office in diffusing an escalating battle over the select committee on climate change. (Pelosi wants to create it. Dingell opposes it on the grounds that it would impinge on his committee's jurisdiction.)

A Democratic aide close to Pelosi suggested that the meeting, which also included Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., had been a turning point: "We no longer anticipate a floor battle," the aide said.

But Dingell wasn't so sure. In a memo to his committee members this afternoon, he noted progress in diffusing the dispute:"I am pleased to report that the Speaker agreed to work closely with us when drafting the resolution to create the Select Committee …we will continue working in good faith to find a solution that will satisfy the concerns of our Members while preserving the overall objectives of the Speaker. I am confident this is possible."

But, he added, he's still keeping his firepower at the ready: "If we are unable to satisfy the concerns of this Committee, however, I reserve all options available under the Rules of the House and will request a caucus of the Democratic Members of the Committee to weigh those carefully." Translation: Nancy, I reserve the right to make this ugly for you.

Still, it's unclear whether Dingell has the muscle to win this one on the floor. He'll have some help from Republicans eager to deliver a loss to Pelosi, but a Republican leadership aide conceded that "25 to 35" moderate Republicans likely would break ranks and side with her. So Dingell can only count on around 170 Republican votes, which is a long way from 218 even if every one of the 31 Democratic members of the Energy and Commerce Committee vote with him, which they won't. (Committee member Anna Eshoo, D-Calif., a Pelosi confidante, declared in a closed-door meeting last week that she "doesn't worship at the altar of jurisdiction," according to a Democratic aide.)

By DAVID N. GOODMAN, The Associated Press

AP, January 26, 2007

DETROIT (AP) — A waste treatment company that came under scrutiny after a major oil spill in 2002 that sent a slick as far as Lake Erie was indicted, along with three former employees, on charges of violating federal clean water laws and conspiracy.

The indictment was not based on the April 2002 spill, for which no one was ever charged.

A federal grand jury in Detroit issued the indictments Wednesday against Comprehensive Environmental Solutions Inc. of Dearborn and the ex-employees, the U.S. Justice Department said in a news release.

In the aftermath of the 2002 spill, FBI and Environmental Protection Agency agents searched the company's offices.

A Comprehensive Environmental Solutions spokesman said Thursday that the company was not responsible for the 2002 spill and has replaced the top management and upgraded its facilities since then.

The company "added a new management team, including two full-time onsite chemists, and voluntarily installed millions of dollars to complete an aggressive campaign to improve operations and engage in more environmentally friendly practices," said spokesman Robert Moll.

Moll said the company "fully cooperated with the investigation" of the 2002 spill and continues to believe it was not involved.

Those charged Wednesday were former president and chief executive Bryan Mallindine, 50, of Carlsbad, Calif.; former president and general manager Michael Panyard, 44, of Pleasant Ridge; and former plant manager Charles D. Long, 41, of Wayne County's Brownstown Township, the Justice Department said.

All three were charged with conspiracy and violating the Clean Water Act. Mallindine also was charged with obstruction of justice, and Panyard was charged with making false statements.

The obstruction of justice charge carries up to 10 years in prison; conspiracy or making false statements, up to five years; and violating the Clean Water Act, up to three years.

A message seeking comment was left Thursday for Mallindine. There was no phone listing for Panyard, and Long's telephone number was unlisted.

Former plant manager Donald Kaniowski, 37, of Dearborn, reached a plea agreement to a charge of violating the Clean Water Act, the Justice Department said.

The 2002 spill released an estimated 255,000 gallons into the Rouge River, from which it entered the Detroit River and Lake Erie. The investigation and cleanup cost at least $5 million.

Comprehensive Environmental Solutions acquired a Dearborn waste treatment facility in 2002. Company officials "continued to accept millions of gallons of liquid wastes which it could not treat or store," the Justice Department said.

"The defendants often bypassed treatment processes and discharged untreated wastes directly to the sewer," part of the Detroit water and sewer system, the statement said.

Comprehensive Environmental Solutions has about 20 employees, is privately held and does not release financial details of its operations, Moll said.

When Superfund Expenses Go Mega (LAT)

By Marla Cone

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2007

FORT EDWARD, N.Y. — After the winter thaw, a huge enterprise — so expensive and risky that it ranks among the most ambitious environmental projects on Earth — will rise up from an abandoned cornfield in upstate New York.

Not far from Saratoga, where Americans defeated British soldiers in the Revolutionary War, 40 miles of the Hudson River will be excavated to remove hazardous compounds discharged by General Electric. The project, expected to cost more than $700 million, will rival the price of the new Yankee Stadium and remove enough toxic mud to fill the stadium twice.

Yet, despite 50,000 tests of the river sludge and three decades of review, there are no guarantees that this cleanup will succeed.

The Hudson River is one of 154 places across the country — 16 in California — dubbed Superfund "mega sites" because eliminating their toxic chemicals is such a big and costly job. And like this project, in which dredging could stir up even more chemicals, many of them involve huge investments in uncertain outcomes.

Mega cleanups — those expected to cost more than $50 million — usually last for decades. For some, there's no end in sight.

In Southern California, off the Palos Verdes Peninsula, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency is trying to decide the best way to immobilize a huge ocean-floor deposit of the pesticide DDT that has been poisoning fish and other marine life for decades.

Near Redding, on a mountain fractured by a huge copper and silver mine that opened in 1879, the EPA has constructed a dam and diverted a creek to try to contain a continuous flow of acids and metals that will probably go on forever.

In Butte, Mont., one mega site is so notorious that it has become a tourist attraction. At a viewing stand above an old copper mine, visitors peer into a 900-foot-deep pit of toxic waste. When migratory birds land on this brew of acids and metals, mistaking it for a watering hole, they die.

'Blight on communities'

Yet EPA officials say tackling such engineering challenges is justified because doing nothing at these super-sized toxic sites poses an even worse threat to human health, the environment and the economy.

"Usually, they are a blight on communities. In our case, the stigma of the contamination is hurting the economy of the upper Hudson," said David King, the EPA's Hudson River project manager.

Twenty-six years after Congress passed the Superfund law to clean up the nation's most dangerous dumping grounds, the list of mega sites keeps growing as more mines, landfills, military bases and factories qualify.

Superfund's national priority list includes more than 1,200 chemical sites, but only one of every eight rises to "mega" status. New Jersey leads with 18, but California's 16 megas will soon more than double, with 18 others expected to meet the $50-million mark.

"State programs can deal with garden-variety sites, but mega sites are ones that nobody but the federal government can deal with," said Katherine Probst, a senior fellow at Resources for the Future, an environmental think tank in Washington, who has researched Superfund for 15 years.

Mega cleanups averaged $140 million each in 2000, 10 times the standard Superfund project, according to Resources for the Future. California's 16 mega sites' cost estimates range from $100 million to $450 million, said Elizabeth Adams, the EPA's regional Superfund cleanup chief in San Francisco.

"Today, a real mega site is well over the $100-million mark. Sadly, $50 million may not be what it once was," Probst said.

Funding lags behind

Yet federal funding for Superfund oversight has not kept up with the surge in mega sites, and many cleanups remain in the early stages. At 22% of all sites, human exposure to chemicals is not under control, the EPA says.

Polluters pay for most cleanups, but Superfund's annual budget, which supports EPA analyses, has remained at about $1.2 billion since 1987. With inflation, that is a 40% decline.

"The Superfund program's real purchasing power has decreased dramatically at the same time that large, complex and expensive sites — often referred to as mega sites — make up an increasing proportion of the program's workload," Probst said at a congressional hearing in June.

What makes a site such a headache that it becomes a mega? "It's the number of contaminants, the size, how far the contamination has spread and how remote it is," Adams said.

Some, such as the Hudson River, involve one company and gigantic volumes of a single pollutant. Others, such as a Monterey Park landfill that towers over surrounding hills, have multiple chemicals and sources.

In the Northeast, many megas are old factories. But around Los Angeles, the worst are immense underground basins in which water supplies, polluted by industrial solvents, have had decades of pumping and treatment. The San Gabriel Valley aquifer is the state's most expensive mega cleanup, expected to reach at least $450 million.

"A lot of these industries came in during the '40s, and these underground plumes are now miles long — sometimes six or seven miles," Adams said. "It's a huge effort, and very costly, to make sure everything meets drinking-water standards."

The trickiest megas — 11 including the Hudson River — are underwater. Dredging them risks uncovering more polluted layers or leaving toxic residue.

"It's not like vacuuming your carpet," said Richard Luthy, Stanford University's chairman of civil and environmental engineering and a member of a National Research Council committee on mega sites. "You are, in every case, left with some material on the bottom that you haven't completely picked up. Just because you can dredge doesn't mean you can get everything."

At a small cleanup in San Francisco Bay's Richmond Harbor, DDT-laden sludge was dredged in 1997. But high concentrations resurfaced a year later. A sloped bottom and barge debris complicated the work.

With problems at small sites, Luthy said, "you have to wonder about the big sites. You might actually make them worse."

The most unusual underwater site is half a mile deep in the Pacific, a mile off the Palos Verdes Peninsula. For 25 years, a pesticide plant near Torrance released DDT into sewers. Now the EPA is trying to decide whether to use clean sand to cap part of the deposit, which covers several square miles of ocean floor.

Decades of analysis often occur before the EPA decides whether to dredge, cap, dam, pump — or some combination. At many, the EPA wrestles with remedies that might be ineffective — or worse.

Hazards of cleanup

In the Hudson River Valley, the debate over dredging has gone on for three decades, predating Superfund.

Two GE plants discharged as much as 1.3 million pounds of polychlorinated biphenyls, or PCBs, into the river for 30 years beginning in 1947. Used to insulate large electrical equipment, the PCBs, which are likely human carcinogens and can disrupt immune systems and brain development, rendered the river's fish inedible.

GE maintained that removing PCBs from the Hudson was too risky, and in 1984, the EPA agreed. The agency reversed course in 2001, concluding that dredging could be done safely and setting performance standards. Finally, in a November court settlement, GE agreed to dredge 10%. If an independent panel approves the results, GE can voluntarily dredge the rest or face a likely EPA order.

The main risk, King said, is unleashing buried PCBs. To reduce that threat, clamshell buckets will tightly seal as they bring mud to the surface. Work will stop if water standards are violated.

"Technically, it's not anything exotic; it's the size and the logistics that make it a challenge," he said. "I can't recall anything of this scale before."

The dig will remove 2 million cubic yards of PCB-contaminated mud. Another PCB cleanup along Wisconsin's Fox River could dredge a record 7 million cubic yards. "That makes them the largest by volume and us the largest by cost. Both are dubious honors," King said.

This spring, before the first bucketful is scooped in 2008, workers will descend on Fort Edward, a town of 6,000, to build a treatment plant, rail tracks, a wharf, marina, rail yard, utility lines and filtering presses. That alone is "like constructing a small city," said John Haggard, GE program manager.

Dug up by mechanical dredgers, the mud will be transported by barges and tugs to the plant, where the PCBs will be extracted, squeezed through presses, then hauled by 81-car freight trains to a landfill.

The dredging is expected to last six to eight years, but after decades of delay in the start-up, Hudson River Valley residents are skeptical about when the toxic mud will be gone.

In Fort Edward's museum, a sign reads: "The roots of the present lie deep in the past." For residents of mega-site communities, the past, present and future are defined by a toxic legacy.

"We could come back two decades from now, and it will still be going on," said Peter Berle, New York's former environmental commissioner. "Hopefully, someday, we'll be free of PCBs."

Concerns, Finger-pointing Greet Audit Of Sewage Spills (LAT)

By Sharon Bernstein And Tony Barboza, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2007

A county report that says most incidents aren't acted on sparks calls for new measures.

DOJ_NMG_0122521

Southern Californians love their beaches.

So to keep the beaches and ocean unfouled, government agencies have over the last decade passed strict pollution laws and spent millions of dollars trying to reduce sewage spills and urban runoff.

But a county audit released this week determined that all of the regulations and disclosure requirements have created a communications breakdown that has left Los Angeles County health officials in the dark about numerous sewage spills.

The audit found that the county had records for just 19 of the 208 major sewage spills since 2002, which dumped nearly 10 million gallons of untreated waste onto streets and into creeks and other tributaries that lead to the sea.

How much of this raw sewage reached the ocean is unknown, but experts said the sheer volume makes it highly likely that some did.

But either because cities and water agencies didn't notify the county health department about their spills or the department didn't follow up on notifications it did receive, beaches were not tested or closed, leaving beachgoers possibly exposed to effluent.

The findings alarmed county leaders and environmental groups, who called Thursday for immediate creation of a clearinghouse for information about sewage leaks that could flow into the ocean, causing dangerous increases in bacteria levels.

"There was a total communication breakdown," said Anjali Jaiswal, an attorney for the Natural Resources Defense Council, an environmental group that has been active in Santa Monica Bay pollution issues. "There would be spills and they wouldn't be reported properly. The public wasn't notified."

Part of the problem is that various ocean pollution laws require different types of notification.

State law requires county health officials to act when a raw sewage spill reaches the ocean adjacent to a public beach, but gives local health departments leeway in determining whether a spill is big enough to reach the beach. One law requires agencies to inform the state Office of Emergency Services, while another requires them to contact county public health agencies.

Meanwhile, local water agencies and the county health department were pointing fingers about where the communications breakdown took place and whether it affected water quality.

County officials say they typically log all communications with their offices, and that there are no indications that the cities and water agencies that spilled most of the sewage phoned to report it.

Dr. Jonathan Fielding, the county's public health director, said that one or two calls might have been lost by county operators, but every call routed to the health department was logged, and the spill investigated.

But the cities, including Los Angeles, which dumped the most sewage into the bay, have meticulous records documenting the size and time of the spills.

It is not clear whether the cities' records include references to phone calls made to report the spills.

But Barry Berggren, division manager for the city of Los Angeles' wastewater collection system, said he personally phoned the county Department of Public Health to report high-volume leaks that occurred in Glassell Park on Jan. 9, 2005.

On that day, a heavy rainstorm sent more than 1 million gallons of raw sewage into the storm drain system, which directs runoff into the Los Angeles River and Long Beach Harbor.

The county auditor-controller's report listed those spills as unreported, with no known action taken.

Berggren says that's not true.

"For some reason, they believe they weren't notified. I don't know why that is," Berggren said.

Neil Miller, public works director for Manhattan Beach, said his department immediately reports every sewage leak that reaches a storm drain. Because the city is so close to the ocean, any spill could pollute the water very quickly, so it is in the city's interest to report them so the county can close the beaches before swimmers are exposed, he said.

"Especially in the coastal communities, if sewage has a chance of reaching the ocean they need to do extra testing to see if it's safe for swimming," Miller said.

County Supervisor Don Knabe, who ordered the audit after a massive release of raw sewage by Culver City last year went unreported for two days, said there is no doubt in his mind that the system is broken.

"I knew we had some issues but I had no idea they were so severe," Knabe said.

The audit recommended several reforms, some as simple as providing county operators with the names and telephone numbers of officials to be contacted if a spill occurs after business hours.

The report also recommended a centralized program to field reports of spills and track their cleanup, size and costs.

At the Board of Supervisors meeting Tuesday, Knabe plans to introduce a motion to implement the recommendations, along with a request that a specialist in public health be appointed to the Los Angeles Regional Water Control Board, at the Board of Supervisors meeting scheduled for Jan. 30. He is also asking for new standards for maintaining sewer systems so leaks are less frequent, and requesting additional research into what went wrong with the reporting of a particularly egregious spill during the heavy rains of 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0122522

Regional water quality control officials support Knabe's efforts and are considering making the board's reporting requirements more stringent.

"We require them to report back within 24 hours of a spill, but apparently that's not being followed," said board Chairwoman Fran Diamond.

The Pacific Palisades resident, who said she was "horrified" by the information in the audit, said she will press to reduce the reporting time to two hours. "We're talking about tremendous public health consequences and tremendous economic consequences," Diamond said. "We have a $2 -billion coastal economy…. This is a real setback."

State Sen. Sheila Kuehl (D-Santa Monica), whose district includes shoreline communities, urged state water regulators to investigate the leaks to determine whether the cities and water agencies that released the sewage were in violation of their permits when the incidents occurred.

Diamond said she would support such investigations.

The audit's findings disturbed beachgoers interviewed Thursday — though none appeared surprised.

"Everybody knows it's filthy here," said Heidi Phillips, 26, who was with her two children, ages 3 months and 3 years. "But for them to be so careless is disgusting. I would never let my kids swim at this beach."

Phillips, who lives in Canoga Park, said the study only confirmed her lack of confidence in the city and county's ability to keep Santa Monica Bay clean.

Matt Sylvester, 26, said he comes to Venice Beach to surf twice a week with friends. He said he knows that the ocean near a big city would not likely be pristine, but expects to be notified if there were a huge sewage spill.

"We're paying for our sewage to be disposed of properly."

Officer Indicted In Steroid Probe (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy And Suzanne Smalley, Globe Staff
The Boston Globe, January 26, 2007
Faces distribution and perjury charges

A federal grand jury is investigating allegations of steroid abuse among Boston police officers and yesterday indicted veteran Officer Edgardo Rodriguez on charges of selling steroids, perjury, and attempting to thwart the probe.

"There's an ongoing grand jury investigation," Assistant US Attorney John T. McNeil told US Magistrate Judge Robert B. Collings at a hearing. "We are taking a hard look at steroid use among officers in the Boston Police Department."

Rodriguez, 37, was charged with six counts: conspiracy to distribute anabolic steroids last year, distribution of anabolic steroids in 2003, obstruction of justice, and three counts of perjury before a federal grand jury.

The 12-year department veteran was suspended without pay yesterday. He had been placed on administrative duty last summer after three other Boston officers were indicted in July for allegedly guarding large shipments of what they believed to be cocaine.

The suspected ringleader in that case is accused of trafficking steroids, and one of the other officers was a regular customer, said an FBI affidavit. After the steroid abuse allegations emerged, Mayor Thomas M. Menino vowed to try to require steroids testing for officers as part of negotiations on a new contract. Department spokeswoman Elaine Driscoll said last night that the proposal is still part of the negotiations.

The department is also dealing with other illegal drug use. In statistics it released last July, it said that 75 officers failed drug tests -- 61 of them for cocaine -- after the department started annual testing in 1999.

Police Commissioner Edward F. Davis last night pledged to strengthen training to help supervisors detect patterns of behavior suggesting an officer is abusing drugs, including steroids. "I have instructed the Bureau of Internal Investigations to develop and conduct extensive training for all Boston Police supervisors to better enable them to detect, expose, and identify illegal substance abuse," the statement said.

Yesterday, McNeill said that a number of Internal Affairs complaints had been filed against Rodriguez alleging "abusive, aggressive and violent behavior," which the prosecutor characterized as conduct "consistent with steroids use."

But Rodriguez's attorney, Philip A. Tracy Jr., said his client is not addicted to steroids and passed two drug tests he was given by the department in July and August.

McNeil also told the magistrate that Rodriguez had tried to discourage another Boston police officer four or five times from testifying before the grand jury. That officer later testified about Rodriguez's interference, McNeil said.

Prosecutors yesterday asked the judge to ensure that Rodriguez, a Jamaica Plain native and a former Marine who served in the first Persian Gulf War, does not associate with any other Boston police officers because they could be witnesses in the ongoing probe.

"We don't want to disclose who we are looking at," McNeil said. "We don't want any interference."

The indictment alleges that last Oct. 5, Rodriguez lied when he told a grand jury that he had not sold steroids to another Boston officer, who is not identified.

Just after testifying, Rodriguez met an officer in the hallway outside the grand jury room and tried to persuade him not to testify, McNeil also alleged.

However, Rodriguez's attorney told the magistrate that his client was merely warning the officer not to testify without an attorney.

Collings ordered Rodriguez not to have contact with any other Boston police officers, except for anticorruption investigators, but said at Rodriguez's arraignment on Tuesday there will be a hearing on whether to modify the order.

Collings said that because of the obstruction-of-justice charge, he was ordering Rodriguez to post a $50,000 bond, secured by a second mortgage on his Hyde Park home. Rodriguez was also ordered to surrender a handgun he keeps in his home and any department equipment still in his possession.

Rodriguez's attorney argued that it was unfair to ask his client to not talk with other officers because Rodriguez's social life revolves around the department.

Tracy said Rodriguez has been unfairly tarred by his alleged association with the three officers indicted on drug conspiracy charges.

"These charges have no relation to a much more serious conspiracy of three other officers," Tracy said. "These allegations can usually be handled internally or with less severe consequences than a federal indictment."

A source close to the probe said yesterday that prosecutors had offered Rodriguez a deal ensuring no jail time if he would resign from the department. Rodriguez rejected the deal, the source said, and was indicted.

In a statement issued with the indictment, US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan suggested Rodriguez is being charged because of how he behaved during the investigation, not just because of steroid use.

"This case is not just about steroids use by law enforcement officers," Sullivan said in the statement. "It is about an officer allegedly distributing steroids to another officer, perjuring himself, and then attempting to obstruct the grand jury's investigation."

Fourth Officer Indicted In BPD Drugs Probe (BOSH)

By O'Ryan Johnson

Boston Herald, January 26, 2007

A fourth cop was indicted yesterday as part of a long-term federal undercover probe of corruption and drug peddling inside the ranks of the Boston Police Department.

Edgardo Rodriguez, 37, faces charges including possession with intent to distribute anabolic steroids, perjury and obstruction of justice. Rodriguez, a nine-year Boston police veteran, had been on administrative duty since July for his alleged involvement.

He was put on unpaid leave yesterday, police said. His lawyer, Philip A.Tracy Jr., said Rodriguez "has nothing to do and is not connected with any more serious charges against other Boston police officers." Rodriguez was freed after arraignment yesterday.

According to the indictment, Rodriguez lied to a federal grand jury about officers, including Roberto Pulido, about possession and distribution of steroids.

Pulido and two other Boston cops, Nelson Carrasquillo and Carlos Pizarro, were arrested in July for guarding FBI-staged drug deals in exchange for cash. The agents investigating Pulido allegedly uncovered steroid use by Boston cops, police guarding illegal after-hours sex parties, and ID theft, according to a federal affidavit.

Rodriguez worked with Pulido and Carrasquillo in the Mobile Operations Patrol, the police special operations branch.

According to the indictment unsealed yesterday, when Rodriguez was called before a grand jury investigating "the unlawful activities of a number of Boston police officers and others" in October, he denied selling steroids to or buying steroids from a person identified as "Boston Police Officer A."

Prosecutors said those statements are false. Rodriguez could face 35 years in prison if convicted on all charges.

BPD Patrolman Indicted On Fed Corruption Charges (CBS4BOS)

By Maggie Mulvihill

CBS 4 Boston, January 26, 2007

(CBS4) BOSTON In another embarrassing blow to the Boston Police Department, veteran patrolman Edgardo Rodriguez was indicted on federal corruption charges late Thursday stemming from alleged steroid distribution and other potential crimes within the force.

"It is a gross betrayal of an officer's duty," said U.S. Attorney Michael J. Sullivan in a statement after perjury and obstruction of justice charges were handed down by a federal grand jury.

Calling it a "sad time" for the department, Police Commissioner Ed Davis announced he was suspending Rodriguez without pay as the department continues to root out any other officers who may be involved in drug use.

The BPD is already reeling from two other scandals - missing drugs from the Hyde Park evidence warehouse and the corruption case federal prosecutors are building against three other officers accused of protecting cocaine shipments and other alleged crimes.

The I-Team reported earlier this month that Rodriguez had been warned by police brass to quit the force as federal and department investigators continued to scrutinize his role in the on-going drug-related criminal probe that has engulfed his fellow officers.

Roberto E. Pulido, Nelson Carrasquillo and Carlos A. Pizarro denied any wrongdoing after they were arrested in July by undercover FBI agents in Miami and accused of protecting massive cocaine shipments coming into Boston.

Investigators learned Rodriguez was allegedly using and distributing steroids during their 2 1/2 year probe of the trio, while other Boston officers have been notified their voices have also been picked up on federal wiretaps, the I-Team has reported.

Rodriguez, an 11-year-veteran, has worked in Dorchester, Roxbury, East Boston and the Mobile Operations Unit.

Rodriguez is accused of in the six-count indictment of lying to a federal grand jury about whether or not anyone else in the department has possessed or distributed steroids.

Rodriguez is also accused of three counts of perjury and one count of obstruction of justice. If convicted of all charges he could face a maximum of 35 years in prison. His attorney, Philip A. Tracy, did not immediately return a telephone call seeking comment.

Feds Help Crack Big Cocaine Ring (LN)

Lancaster Newspapers, January 26, 2007

LANCASTER COUNTY, PA - Investigators said they have disbanded a multimillion-dollar cocaine operation in eastern Pennsylvania with indictments against 20 suspected smugglers.

Nine Lancaster County residents were among those indicted, investigators said, and seven of them were arrested this week.

As of Thursday night, Pablo Beltran and Tellin Cintron, both of Lancaster city, were the only suspects yet to be apprehended among the 20 indicted.

The charges are the culmination of a two-year investigation by the Drug Enforcement Administration, Pennsylvania State Police and the Lancaster County Drug Task Force.

The operation was importing 30 to 40 kilograms of cocaine into Lancaster, Dauphin, York and Lebanon counties each month, investigators said.

Assistant United States Attorney Christy Fawcett said each kilogram sold for an average of $22,000, then re-sold at a higher price.

Fawcett, lead prosecutor in the case, said it was one of the largest stings in recent memory. “This was expensive stuff,” she said.

Some of the cocaine was cooked into crack, Fawcett said, and marijuana also was sold.

The indictments were filed Jan. 11. Seven arrests were made Wednesday, Fawcett said, and some of the suspects already were serving time in prison.

The seven Lancaster County residents arrested were charged with conspiracy to distribute and possession with intent to distribute cocaine, crack cocaine and marijuana.

They were: Edward Rivera and Jorge Torres, both of High Street; Jimmy Ortiz-Rivera, Lafayette Street; Sandra Collazo-Medina, Valley Drive; Harry Delgado, East Clay Street; Nathaniel Sanchez, North Broad Street; and Pedro Rivera, Oak Ridge Drive, Millersville.

Ortiz-Rivera also was charged with possession of a stolen firearm.

Lancaster County District Attorney Donald Totaro said some of the suspects were known to be local drug dealers.

“I recognized some of the names as people we dealt with in the past,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0122525

If convicted, each suspect faces a mandatory 10-year prison sentence and fines up to $4 million.

Investigators seized about $500,000 in cash, five lots of real estate and jewelry during the investigation. A Lancaster city business — K&A Appliances at 149 E. King St. — also was seized.

The charges also include a $7.2 million substitute asset forfeiture that must be paid if the suspects are convicted. Fawcett said that sum is for money and real estate that wasn't recovered during the investigation.

A major break in the investigation came May 27, when two Mexican nationals — Jaime Cardenas-Borbon and Gabriel Rivera-Gil — were arrested at Days Inn, 30 Keller Ave.

Investigators seized 40 kilograms of cocaine and $182,000 cash from their room. It is believed to be one of the largest cocaine shipments ever intended for Lancaster County.

"As a result of that arrest, we were able to piece together additional information" about the drug ring, Totaro said.

The two-year investigation also was aided by wiretaps placed on five telephone lines authorities said were used for trafficking drugs.

"These federal agencies bring manpower and resources that enhance an investigation," Totaro said. Also, "jail sentences are far more severe" upon convictions in such cases.

Hearings for the suspects are scheduled to begin April 2, Fawcett said.

Accused Kingpin In Prison (SEN)

Sentinel, January 25, 2007

When Mycol Robinson called federal marshals and turned himself in on Tuesday, he ended more than a year of hiding from authorities.

The second alleged kingpin in a central Pennsylvania cocaine ring turned himself over to members of the U.S. Marshals' fugitive squad at the federal building in Harrisburg around 6 p.m. Tuesday, says a spokesman from the state attorney general's office. Robinson, 34, formerly of Steelton, had eluded authorities since they announced in September 2005 that they had broken up an overlapping cocaine ring with two leaders, who they identified as Robinson and George Santiago.

Santiago was sentenced last month in Cumberland County Court for drug dealing. Santiago and several smaller dealers were nabbed in September 2005.

Authorities believe Robinson stayed with friends and family in New York City, Florida and Washington, D.C., while the federal marshals hunted for him, and that he was most recently in the D.C. area. Marshals had frequent contact with Robinson's friends and relatives, which often wears them down and causes them to put pressure on the fugitive, said Nils Frederiksen, spokesman for the attorney general's office.

Later, authorities plan to look at whether to charge anyone with giving aid to the fugitive, he said.

Robinson is being held in Cumberland County Prison without bail, with a preliminary hearing set Tuesday. He is charged with five counts of delivery of cocaine, one count of possession with intent to deliver, one count of criminal conspiracy and two counts of participating in corrupt organizations, which is the state's racketeering statute. He could serve up to 90 years in prison and face $725,000 in fines.

An investigation into the drug ring found that Robinson and Santiago, 35, set up two separate but similar organizations for distributing drugs that involved at least 23 residents. According to reports, the men transported cocaine from New York before repackaging it for local sale, or "cooking" it into crack, eventually distributing more than $7 million of the drug.

The AG's office said Robinson used a home on North Second Street in Steelton and an address on Allen Road in Carlisle as distribution points, while Santiago set up shop on Beetum Hollow Road in the Newville area.

Santiago faced more counts than Robinson and was sentenced last month to 7 to 20 years in state prison and ordered to pay $110,000 in fines.

N.J. State Police, DEA Break Up South Jersey Narcotics Ring (AP)

AP, January 25, 2007

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) -- State and federal authorities broke up a major South Jersey drug distribution ring Thursday, arresting 14 people in New Jersey and Arizona, and seizing 25 pounds of crack and powder cocaine.

New Jersey State Police Capt. Jeff Simpkins said the bust resulted from a 10-month narcotics trafficking investigation that began as street-level surveillance, then grew.

"We took this one down at the trafficking level," Simpkins said. "When you stop it at the kilo level, it doesn't filter down to the school-yard level. It keeps it (the drugs) out of our neighborhoods."

"It's the most effective way to fight the drug game," said Simpkins who oversees state police in southern New Jersey.

DOJ_NMG_0122526

The cocaine was valued at about $15,000 per pound.

State Police Superintendent Col. Rick Fuentes said the information developed with the Drug Enforcement Administration during the joint investigation will be accessible to other law enforcement agents conducting future investigations through the Regional Operations Intelligence Center.

The new facility nicknamed "The Rock," is where federal, state and local officials gather to share information on evolving cases.

"This information will have a value beyond the arrest of individuals," said Fuentes. "The information will be linked up with other potential cases and the vehicle for doing that is 'The Rock.' That's our clearinghouse."

Police from Gloucester Township entered six homes and three storage facilities in Gloucester, Camden and Burlington counties Thursday morning.

Three New Jersey men were arrested in Tucson, where the New Jersey suspects went to meet their supplier, police said. Eleven others were arrested in New Jersey, with the highest bail set at $500,000 and some defendants released without bail.

Authorities also seized $244,000 in cash and three guns.

Those arrested were charged with conspiracy in connection with the distribution of narcotics. The maximum penalty upon conviction is 10 years in prison and a $150,000 fine. Additional charges are likely, authorities said.

The investigation was code-named Operation Centerfield because one of the first suspects identified was Gary Maddox, who has the same name as the former Phillies center fielder.

Gang Task Force Nets Suspects, Drugs, Guns (RMA)

By Stephanie Barry

The Republican, January 25, 2007

SPRINGFIELD - Standing behind an array of guns and street drugs, federal and local law enforcement officials yesterday announced the results of Tuesday's blitz targeting suspected dealers in Mason Square.

The FBI Western Massachusetts Joint Gang Task Force made arrests beginning at dawn that day, netting 14 suspects by yesterday morning, officials said. Charges ranged from cocaine trafficking to possession of a large capacity firearm.

Springfield Police Commissioner Edward A. Flynn said the raids were the result of a year-long investigation into the robust open-air drug trade in Mason Square.

"The goal was impact players," Flynn said, adding that the investigation included undercover operatives, sophisticated surveillance and countless drug buys through informants.

He said of those indicted in state court, 13 were apprehended; one was located in a Maine jail on unrelated charges, and four are still at large.

Laid out on a table in a conference room at police headquarters yesterday were six handguns - including five police said were previously loaded and one outfitted with a scope - plus bags of marijuana, crack cocaine and heroin.

The contraband was recovered from searches that accompanied the arrests, police said, and were labeled with various suspects' names and addresses.

The guns, some found with stashes of ammunition, will be tested to probe possible links to local unsolved shootings, yesterday's panel said.

FBI supervisor Michael G. O'Reilly said the gang task force was established in 1994. It includes members of the FBI; U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration; U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; Massachusetts State Police; Hampden County Sheriff's Department; and local police in Springfield, Chicopee and Holyoke.

"We each have a special focus ... We take that focus and bring it together," said Robert G. Tacinelli, supervisor of the Springfield office of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

The task force was responsible for a 2005 crackdown on 36 local Latin King affiliates, the largest single-day roundup of that faction in the state's history, O'Reilly said. Many of those were prosecuted in federal court.

Assistant Hampden County District Attorney James R. Goodhines said all suspects are being held in lieu of bond ranging from $50,000 to $500,000.

The suspects were arraigned in Springfield District and Superior courts during the past two days. Flynn said the hope is that the charges will get bumped up to federal court, where sentences for drug crimes are long and prison assignments are often far-flung.

He said the timing of the sweep was critical for a wary city still reeling from a spate of violent crime.

Mayor Charles V. Ryan also attended yesterday's announcement at the police station, lauding the fruits of the sweep.

"To see this type of hardware in front of us reminds us really what the stakes are," he said.

Ironworkers' Business Manager Faces Drug Charges (VANSUN)

By Peter O'Neil And Glenn Bohn, Vancouver Sun

Vancouver Sun, January 26, 2007

Perley Edmund Holmes, business manager of Ironworkers Local 97 in Burnaby, faces drug and conspiracy charges after U.S. Border Patrol officers seized cocaine valued at more than $4 million US in eastern Washington last Thursday night.

Holmes, a 50-year-old married man with eight children, is in Spokane County Jail.

According to a court affidavit filed by a special agent of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, border patrol officers responded to an electronic sensor on a road near the Curlew Border Patrol Station south of Grand Forks in B.C.'s southern Interior.

The officers followed tire tracks of a pickup truck to the driveway of a rural home, where the pickup apparently turned around. They then followed fresh tracks in snow left by two people.

The officers turned on their vehicle's bright "takedown" lights and "observed two individuals lying in the snow under some bushes," the affidavit states. A large backpack was beside each man. The officers ordered the two men to stay where they were. One -- the affidavit wasn't clear which one -- attempted to run north towards the Canadian border, less than a kilometre away, but was caught.

A U.S. Border Patrol Agency news release reported the seizure of more than 136 pounds -- 61.6 kilograms -- of cocaine in the two backpacks and the arrest of a "Canadian citizen attempting to smuggle the contraband across the border."

The agency didn't name the Canadian but the affidavit filed by the U.S. federal Justice Department in Spokane names Holmes and Case Hale Swinburne, of Okanogan County, Wash.

The criminal complaint is the first step towards a possible U.S. grand jury indictment on these recommended charges: possession with intent to distribute more than five kilograms of cocaine, and conspiracy to possess with the intent to distribute more than five kilograms of cocaine.

Dave Beatty, elected president of Ironworkers Local 97, said he and other officials were shocked by the arrest of Holmes.

"It was completely out of character for anybody who knows him," Beatty said Wednesday.

He said the union called in an independent auditor at its Burnaby office Monday to investigate union records.

B.C. Union Leader Arrested In U.S. On Drug Charge (CBC)

CBC News, January 26, 2007

The business manager of the B.C. and Yukon local of the Ironworkers union has been arrested in Washington state, where he has been charged with a serious drug offence.

Perley Edmund Holmes, 50,Â is in jail in Spokane and faces a charge of possession of cocaine with intent to distribute.

U.S. border patrol officers said they arrested Holmes and another man last Thursday near Chesam, Wash., just south of Grand Forks in B.C.'s southern Interior.

They said they seized more than 60 kilograms of cocaine, worth an estimated $4.3 million.

Union president David Beatty saidÂ the arrestÂ came asÂ a big surprise to people who know Holmes.

"It's probably as shocking as could be, for anyone I've talked to, our members, our contractors. It's completely out of character and nobody can visualize this happening."

Beatty also said Holmes is no longer on the payroll.

An auditor will be brought in to review the finances of the local to ensure no illegal activities were conducted with union funds, he said.

Holmes faces 10 years to life in an American prison if he's convicted of the allegations.

Drug 'kingpin' Says He's Guilty In Broad Scheme (REP)

Reporter, January 25, 2007

A Vacaville man who prosecutors described as a regional "drug kingpin" pleaded guilty in federal court Tuesday to charges of conspiracy to distribute cocaine and methamphetamine, money laundering and trying to hide a financial transaction.

Eduardo Pichardo, 33, now faces 10 years in federal prison and a personal financial judgment of $500,000. He will return to federal court in Sacramento on April 3 for sentencing.

Pichardo was arrested by Drug Enforcement Administration agents June 21, 2006, on suspicion of distribution and conspiracy to distribute cocaine and methamphetamine.

The arrest culminated a seven-year investigation into a drug-trafficking network that stretched from Northern California to Arizona and Alabama.

In October, Pichardo was indicted on the additional charges of money laundering.

In exchange for his plea Tuesday, prosecutors agreed not to pursue money laundering or other charges against Pichardo's wife.

According to investigators, Pichardo became a prime suspect in a drug trafficking investigation shortly after it was launched in 1999.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents said Pichardo was the head of an organization that trafficked multi-kilogram quantities of cocaine and methamphetamine, frequently traveling to Mexico to arrange smuggling across the border.

In October 2001, investigators said Pichardo arranged for the driver of a pickup truck to transport 25 kilograms (about 56 pounds) of cocaine from Phoenix, Ariz. to Alabama. On Oct. 5, the driver was stopped by Arkansas State Police during a routine traffic stop and was subsequently arrested. A search of the truck revealed the cocaine, which was concealed in a hidden compartment inside the truck's gas tank, officials said.

The street value of the seized load was estimated at $1.3 million.

According to court documents, Pichardo gave a colleague $15,500 in cash to wire to a bail bondsman in Arkansas in order to bail out his driver.

"The cash the defendant gave was proceeds of (his) drug trafficking activities," prosecutors wrote. And he used a friend to wire the funds so that the cash could not be traced back to him.

In addition, he instructed his colleague to wire the money in two separate transactions so that neither one would exceed $10,000. That order was given, prosecutors said, because he knew that any cash transaction in excess of $10,000 would be reported to authorities, thus hiding the transaction.

Pharmacist Could Face Three-year Term (MBSN)

By Josh Hoke

Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News, January 25, 2007

The 81-year-old Myrtle Beach man accused of illegally distributing prescription drugs could face three years in prison, according to a federal indictment obtained by The Sun News.

John Tuite worked as a pharmacist for Wilmington, N.C.-based United Care Pharmacy, an online business that provided prescriptions to customers throughout the country without requiring a consultation with a doctor, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Tuite is charged with conspiracy to distribute controlled substances. Three others face those charges and are accused of money laundering.

All four men were arrested earlier this month.

Tuite denied wrongdoing on Tuesday, and he could not be reached for comment Wednesday.

Tuite appeared in court last week and is free on bail.

He was to be in court Wednesday, his attorney said, but it was unclear by press time whether he made that appearance.

His attorney, public defender Bill Nettles, said, "The judge just wants an update on how the case can be resolved."

Nettles said since the indictment was filed in California, Tuite may eventually be forced to appear in federal court in that state.

Andrew Thomas Russo, 48, United Care Pharmacy's former chief operating officer; Denis Leborgne, 42, the former chief technical officer; and David John, 41, the former chief financial officer, were also arrested and charged in the case.

Cincinnati Doctor Gets Two Years For Clinic Crimes (PORTDT)

By Jeff Barron, PDT Staff Writer

Portsmouth (OH) Daily Times, January 26, 2007

A Cincinnati doctor has been sentenced to two years in prison for money laundering in connection with pain clinics in Lucasville, Hanging Rock, Jackson and Chillicothe.

Gregory L. Ebner, 55, no address, also was fined $10,000 after pleading guilty last year.

“Money laundering is not a victimless crime,” Internal Revenue Service criminal investigator Jeffrey Cooper said. “Not only are innocent people duped by various schemes, but the underground, untaxed economy harms the entire nation's strength.”

According to the U.S. Department of Justice, William Jewell Jr. owned the clinics that Ebner worked at.

Jewell, of Paintsville, Ky., and Nico Capurro of Cincinnati, have pleaded innocent to several charges in connection to the case and remain free on bail.

DOJ_NMG_0122529

According to the Justice Department, Ebner worked at the pain clinics two or three days a week and saw about 30 patients a day.

He prescribed drugs including Lorcet and Xanax after cursory medical examinations in which he never checked the height, weight or blood pressure of the patients.

He also had no diagnostic equipment at the clinics.

Patients paid in cash $175 to $200 per visit. The clinics would not accept insurance, personal checks, credit cards or any other form of payment.

New patients were required to bring an X-ray or MRI to create an aura of legitimacy, the Justice Department said.

Prescriptions were filled at only a few pharmacies, including the South Shore Pharmacy in South Shore, Ky. Many of the patients signed an agreement to only use that pharmacy.

Ebner admitted what he was doing at the pain clinics was below the accepted standards of medical practice.

Justice officials said Ebner split the patient payments with Jewell and structured them to hide his involvement in the illegal activity.

Ebner broke the money down into smaller amounts, typically less than $10,000 for deposit into his personal bank account to avoid the Currency Transaction Reporting requirements.

He used the money for a real estate down payment, shares of a medical partnership and as a payoff of his mortgage.

Ebner must surrender to officials on March 19.

IMMIGRATION:

Senate Endorses A Contracts Ban (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The U.S. Senate voted unanimously to bar companies that hire illegal immigrants from receiving federal contracts.

The ban would last for seven years and would last 10 years if the company were caught hiring illegal immigrants while it held a federal contract. The ban could be lifted if the government decided that doing so was in the interest of national security. The amendment was offered on the fourth day of debate on an increase in the federal minimum wage from $5.15 an hour to $7.25.

Alien Hiring Fine Fails On Hill (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 26, 2007

Senate Democrats quashed a proposal yesterday that would have dramatically increased civil fines on employers who hire illegal aliens.

Sen. Jeff Sessions, Alabama Republican, offered the amendment to the bill now being debated that would increase the federal minimum wage.

Ridding the economy of illegal aliens, he argued, would do far more to help low-income wage earners than simply raising the minimum wage. Not only do aliens displace U.S. citizens in the work force, he said, they also artificially suppress wages.

"Our whole purpose of the minimum-wage act is to increase the wages of working Americans, particularly low-skilled workers," Mr. Sessions said. "That's a noble goal."

One of the reasons "that those salaries have lagged behind is because of a large influx of illegal immigrant labor," he said. "That is indisputable, and it's not been discussed much here. People apparently don't want to talk about it, but we're going to talk about it."

But Democratic leaders refused to let Mr. Sessions' alien amendment reach the Senate floor yesterday, and they accused him and other Republicans of offering amendments unrelated to the minimum-wage increase in order to stall passage of the bill.

Some 60 amendments have been offered, and today marks the fifth day of debate on raising the minimum wage to $7.25 per hour from $5.15 per hour over two years.

"Amendment here. Amendment there," thundered Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat.

"Amendment on Social Security. Amendment on immigration. And all the chortling and laughing as they go on about their business," he boomed.

Republicans are "not for those millions of Americans who are heading home tonight, who've worked long and hard, facing their children hoping that at last ... the United States isn't going to fail us," he said. "What do we tell them after five days?"

After accusing Republicans of stalling, Mr. Kennedy then proceeded to read aloud for five minutes a story in the New York Times about soldiers fighting in Iraq.

Mr. Sessions said his amendment is not a delaying tactic and isn't unrelated to the overall minimum-wage bill. His provision, he said, gets at the very reason a minimum-wage increase is needed in the first place. He calls his amendment "comprehensive wage reform," a sly reference to the "comprehensive" approach to immigration reform that Democrats and President Bush are demanding, but most Republicans deride as amnesty.

It would raise the minimum fine on employers from $250 per hired alien to $5,000 per alien. And it would raise the maximum fine from $10,000 per alien to $40,000 per alien.

Though Democrats turned back Mr. Sessions' employer-sanctions amendment, they allowed through a second Sessions amendment aimed at federal government contractors who are caught hiring illegal aliens.

He ticked off a half-dozen recent examples of federal contractors using illegal aliens, even in the most sensitive of positions.

"It's astounding how widespread this problem is," Mr. Sessions said. "In one alarming incident, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission was caught allowing illegal aliens who obtained documentation by using fake Social Security numbers to work as contract painters at nuclear facilities."

Under the amendment that Democrats allowed last night, any government contractor caught using illegal labor would be prohibited from future government contracts for ten years. It was approved on a 94-0 vote.

Bonkers At The Border (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

Most people would consider corrupt border patrol agents to be part of the illegal immigration problem, not the solution. So it's passing strange that anti-immigration Republicans in Congress are calling for the federal government to release Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean, two former border guards from Texas who were sent to prison last week for shooting an unarmed man in the back and then trying to cover up their crime.

Several GOP lawmakers, including outspoken restrictionists like Congressmen Tom Tancredo and Duncan Hunter, have hailed the ex-agents as American heroes. President Bush is even being urged to pardon Ramos and Compean, who received sentences of 11 years and 12 years, respectively. GOP Representative Dana Rohrabacher has gone so far as to accuse Mr. Bush of being "on the side of [America's] enemies" for allowing the men to go to jail.

CNN's Lou Dobbs has also weighed in repeatedly with pseudo-reporting designed to rile up his viewers rather than inform them of the facts. Speaking of facts, they are as follows, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Western District of Texas and evidence presented at the ex-agents' jury trial:

Agents Ramos and Compean were guarding the Mexican border near El Paso, Texas, on Feb. 17, 2005, when they encountered a van driven by Osvaldo Aldrete-Davila. When the driver saw the agents he sped off, eventually abandoning the vehicle and fleeing toward the border on foot. At one point, Aldrete-Davila stopped running and raised his empty hands to surrender. But when the first border agent to approach him stumbled, Aldrete-Davila took off again toward the Rio Grande.

At this point, Agents Ramos and Compean opened fire, shooting at the back of a suspect who they knew was unarmed. They fired 14 rounds in all -- Agent Compean even paused to reload -- finally hitting Aldrete-Davila in the buttocks. The suspect was wounded but still managed to make it across the border and escape.

It later was determined that Aldrete-Davila was in the country illegally and smuggling drugs. Nearly 750 pounds of marijuana were found in the van. But Ramos and Compean didn't know the suspect's immigration status when they shot him. Nor did they know the contents of the vehicle he was driving. What the agents did know is that they had broken any number of border patrol policies.

So Compean and another agent returned to the scene to gather shell casings and discard them in a drainage ditch. Compean and Ramos, who'd been disciplined for past conduct unbecoming a federal officer, then filed a false report. The only reason their cover-up didn't succeed is because an honest border agent who learned of the shooting eventually reported it.

After a trial lasting nearly three weeks, a federal jury in El Paso convicted both agents on charges including assault with a deadly weapon and obstruction of justice. As Johnny Sutton, U.S. Attorney for the Western District of Texas, put it: "The simple truth of this case is that former Agents Compean and Ramos shot 15 times at an unarmed man who was running away from them and posed no threat. They lied about what happened, covered up the shooting, conspired to destroy the evidence and then proceeded to write up and file a false report."

The Congressmen who are exploiting the episode haven't made an issue of the agents' guilt, which is by and large conceded. Rather, the restrictionists argue that Compean and Ramos should be given a pass because the victim of their crime was a drug-smuggling illegal alien.

This is an odd argument coming from immigration hard-liners, who typically say that while they love legal immigrants the U.S. must "enforce the law" on the border. That the agents have been held accountable for misconduct shows that no one is above the law. Letting the agents off the hook would also send a terrible message to honest border agents who perform a difficult and dangerous job.

Turning felons into political causes is the kind of stunt usually pulled by the likes of Al Sharpton. That Republicans would now stoop to it shows how immigration has caused some on the right to lose their political bearings. First they gave up their belief in free labor markets, and now they're discarding their law enforcement credentials.

And these are the same folks who assail Mr. Bush's guest-worker proposal as "amnesty." The irony is that if Mr. Bush's plan were in place and there were more legal ways to enter the U.S., border agents would have more time and resources to chase down people like Aldrete-Davila and apprehend them properly.

By John Pomfret

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

PHOENIX -- In 2001, Arizona state prosecutors trying to stem the growing tide of immigrant smuggling found a Western Union outlet in the border town of Douglas that was doling out more than $91,000 a month -- this in a community where the per capita income was barely $10,000 a year.

People across the country, prosecutors said, were sending money to the little Western Union shop in Douglas -- and scores others like it in Arizona -- to pay smugglers to sneak illegal immigrants into the United States.

To fight back, Attorney General Terry Goddard employed a controversial technique known as a damming warrant to seize $17 million in money transfers into hundreds of Western Union locations in Arizona, prosecute scores of immigrant smugglers and deport hundreds of people in a program he marvels at because of its "elegant simplicity."

On the surface, the warrants were a success. Between mid-2005 and mid-2006, according to Goddard's office, transfers of $500 and more into Arizona fell from $36.8 million a month to just $2.8 million. The only problem was that all of Goddard's other sources indicated that immigrant smuggling was still booming in Arizona.

So on Sept. 21, Goddard expanded the program, issuing a warrant blocking all Western Union money transfers of $500 and above from 26 states with a significant population of illegal immigrants to a group of Western Union outlets in the northern Mexican state of Sonora. He also planned on issuing warrants blocking money transfers through Western Union to nearby states such as Nevada.

Western Union sued to block the Sonoran warrant. "We felt that the state was overreaching," said Peter Ziverts, Western Union's vice president for compliance, "because none of this money ever touched Arizona. So how could Arizona claim it was involved in a state crime?"

On Jan. 9, Maricopa County Superior Court Judge Kenneth L. Fields agreed, quashing the warrant and ruling that it was "unconstitutional as applied under the Commerce Clause, Foreign Commerce Clause, Due Process Clause and the Fourth Amendment of the United States Constitution."

This legal battle is but one of more than 10 state and federal cases in Arizona over how to police illegal immigration. The cases underscore the pitfalls faced by local law enforcement as it intensifies its fight against immigrant smuggling and undocumented workers. Tactics prosecutors believe are a godsend in the crackdown are often, in the words of one federal law enforcement official, "either brilliant or illegal."

Arizona has emerged as the hothouse for new, sometimes controversial tactics to confront illegal immigration because, as Goddard said in an interview, "we have it rubbed in our face on a daily basis."

Since the mid-1990s when a federal crackdown in San Diego and El Paso forced illegal immigrants into the desert, Arizona has become the highway through which millions of crossers enter the United States. In fiscal 2006, the U.S. Border Patrol apprehended more than 510,000 people attempting to unlawfully enter the United States via Arizona, half of the total for the 2,000-mile-long southern border, according to government statistics.

Phoenix is recognized as the hub of the immigrant smuggling trade, stocked with safe houses where illegal immigrants, known as pollos, or chickens, are held until relatives or friends pay about $1,600 a head and they are moved out on the highways that crisscross the city. In an affidavit filed late last year, Goddard's office contended that Phoenix-based immigrant smuggling enterprises had annual revenues of $1.7 billion to $2.5 billion. The Phoenix Police Department estimates that 50 percent of that city's murders involve either an illegal immigrant as assailant or victim.

Sheriff Joe Arpaio of Maricopa County, home to 3.5 million people, has made his department one of the first local law enforcement agencies in the nation to direct its deputies to arrest illegal immigrants under a state law. So far 400 have been arrested, although Arpaio's tactics are the subject of a lawsuit.

In addition to the Western Union suit, Goddard's fight against immigrant smugglers, who are sometimes called coyotes, has also prompted a federal lawsuit by a group of Western Union customers who allege that the attorney general's office seized their money and never returned it.

According to the suit, Goddard's investigators did not tell the senders that their transfers had been blocked (a charge Goddard did not dispute) and handed money over to recipients only after they had proved that the transfers were not being used for illegal activity. "So much for innocent until proven guilty," said Matthew Piers, the lead attorney in the case.

"We have law enforcement run wild down there," Piers said. "We support interdiction of money for coyotes, that's an activity well worth stopping. But the warrants in Arizona are so broad as to be ridiculous."

Goddard's prosecutors said 91 percent of the people whose money was seized were involved in either drug or immigrant smuggling. Joshua Hoyt, executive director of the Illinois Coalition for Immigrant and Refugee Rights, which interviewed more than 400 of Western Union's customers to help prepare the case, said that while the "clear majority" of the money senders were illegal immigrants, only a small fraction were involved in felonies. "This is a legal equivalent of a drive-by shooting," he said. "People were sending money to their relatives to buy medicine and food."

Goddard said he has proof that immigrant smugglers were continuing operations in Arizona and using Western Union branches in Sonora to stash their cash. According to an attorney general's office affidavit, a suspect, who had been picking up his cash in Arizona, received $270,000 within two months from a small Western Union stand in Sonora, another garnered $136,000, a third $113,000.

"It is obvious to us that they've just moved the cash aspect of their business out of state," he said, "but the smuggling operations remain in Arizona."

Goddard's tactics were also controversial because of federal concerns that his office was overreaching. When ICE Director Julie Myers visited Arizona in late 2005, Gov. Janet Napolitano (D) suggested that they hold a joint news conference in support of the warrants. Myers declined, officials from both the state and federal governments said. And ICE pulled out of the state's financial crimes task force.

But in recent months, relations between ICE and the Arizona state government have improved. A new special-agent-in-charge, Alonzo PeÃ±a, arrived from Texas after Napolitano pressured the federal government to transfer his predecessor, law enforcement officials said. ICE will soon rejoin the state's financial crimes task force.

In an interview, PeÃ±a said ICE is considering using the surveillance warrants as a tactic to fight immigrant smuggling; that way at least law enforcement could avoid Western Union's argument that Arizona was overreaching.

"I am not really concerned about what happened in the past," PeÃ±a said, "We just want to get in and participate . . . as long as it's legal and can be introduced in court."

KPMG Placed On State Probation In Tax-shelter Case (AP)

By David Koenig, AP Business Writer

AP, January 26, 2007

DALLAS — Accounting firm KPMG LLP has agreed to be placed on probation for three years and pay a $96,000 fine to avoid losing its license to practice in Texas after an investigation into fraudulent tax shelters.

The company and the Texas State Board of Public Accountancy announced Thursday that they reached an agreement under which KPMG's license was suspended for five years but the sanction was blocked while the firm is on probation.

KPMG was also fined the maximum $1,000 for each of 96 violations of the state accountancy law, the board said.

The case stems from admissions the firm made to federal officials who investigated tax shelters that helped rich clients avoid billions in taxes.

KPMG reached a deferred-prosecution agreement with the Justice Department in August 2005, and a federal judge in New York dismissed a criminal charge this month after prosecutors said the firm had cooperated with the government's investigation.

The accounting firm has blamed the preparation of fraudulent tax returns and statements to support the tax shelters on former executives. The case against those executives is continuing.

William Treacy, executive director of the state accountancy board, said KPMG's license to practice in Texas would be suspended if it is convicted of failing to comply with terms of its deal with the Justice Department.

KPMG, which has more than 400 certified public accountants in Texas, said its activities would not be affected by probation.

"We are pleased that the Texas matter is now resolved and that it does not restrict in any way our ability to serve our clients in the state," said spokesman George Ledwith.

The case was settled through a consent order without holding a formal hearing. Ledwith said Texas is the first state to reach a settlement with the firm. Other states were considering action before KPMG settled with the Justice Department in 2005.

The accountancy board is the licensing and enforcement agency for certified public accountants and accounting firms in Texas. The agency's director said it was unusual for the board to bring a case against such a large accounting firm.

The last one, he said, involved Arthur Andersen LLP, which was convicted of obstruction of justice for shredding Enron documents. The U.S. Supreme Court overturned the conviction, but not before Andersen was devastated.

"Fortunately for the public, we don't have these very often — maybe every three or four years," Treacy said.

Kentucky Sewer District Settles With IRS Over Bond Proceeds (BLOOM)

By William Selway And Martin Z. Braun

Bloomberg, January 26, 2007

Jan. 25 (Bloomberg) -- Kentucky's largest municipal sewer operator reached a settlement with the Internal Revenue Service to prevent $68 million of bonds it sold a decade ago from losing their tax-exempt status.

Louisville and Jefferson County Metropolitan Sewer District's settlement stems from its use of bond proceeds to buy an option on an escrow account from Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., said Marion Gee, the district's finance director.

``What they determined is that you should not have used bond proceeds to purchase the put option," Gee said.

Three other local government agencies since November settled audits stemming from IRS concerns they may have overpaid for securities and options that the borrowers purchased with bond proceeds. The U.S. Justice Department is currently conducting a criminal investigation into the business of selling investment contracts to local governments.

Municipal borrowers purchase Treasury bonds for escrows used to refinance outstanding bonds. The income from those bonds is used to pay for the refinanced debt as it comes due.

Gee said the IRS didn't raise questions about the price the district paid for the option. Pottstown, Pennsylvania-based Investment Management Advisory Group Inc., one of at least three brokers that was raided in connection with the U.S. investigation, handled the bidding for the option, Gee said.

Debt Buyback

U.S. local governments agree to settlements with the IRS to prevent the agency from seeking taxes from investors who were willing to accept lower returns from their bonds because the securities weren't subject to income taxes. As part of the settlement, the district will repurchase $2.8 million of the bonds in November.

The district proposed the settlement under a program that allows municipal borrowers to head off audits if they discover that a bond issue may violate IRS regulations on tax-exempt bonds, it said in a bond filing. Gee declined to say how much the district agreed to pay to the IRS, though he said no other parties to the transaction have to pay the agency.

``I'm not at liberty to talk about that amount because the case hasn't legally been closed," he said.

Investment Management Advisory spokesman Gene Grabowski didn't immediately return a call seeking comment. Lehman Brothers spokesman Randy Whitestone declined to comment.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Touts Tax Breaks For Health Care VIDEO (KCS)

By Dave Helling

The Kansas City Star, January 26, 2007

President Bush told small business owners and health officials in Lee's Summit Thursday that new tax breaks will help Americans buy insurance, keep health care costs low, and maintain private control of health care decisions.

"We believe the private sector is the best delivery of health care," Bush told members of a selected audience at St. Luke's Hospital, East, in Lee's Summit, Mo. "We know there's a role for the federal government, but it's not to dictate, it's not to be the decision-maker," he said.

In his State of the Union speech Tuesday, Bush proposed taxing employer-provided health care benefits, after allowing a $7,500 deduction for individuals and $15,000 for families. He said the plan would help individuals buy insurance, while keeping health care costs low.

Bush traveled to the hospital to discuss the plans with small business owners, Health and Human Services secretary Mike Leavitt and St. Luke's CEO Richard Hastings.

Critics say the plan could raise taxes for some people with good health care plans and could convince some employers to drop health insurance for their workers.

Earlier, Bush toured the hospital, meeting with staff to talk about use of computers and technology to cut costs. "Medicine is finally catching up with the rest of America in the use of information technology, particularly this facility here," he said.

Around a dozen protestors picketed across the street from the hospital.

Bush Touts Health-Care Plan As Cost Control (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher And Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

LEE'S SUMMIT, Mo. Jan. 25 -- With his new health-care proposals receiving a frosty reception from Democrats on Capitol Hill, President Bush ventured here Thursday to make the case that his ideas offer the best remedy for the nation's health insurance crisis.

Speaking at a roundtable before an audience made up largely of journalists, Bush promoted his plan to offer new tax incentives for people to get modestly priced health insurance through their employers or on their own.

Bush, who announced the initiative Tuesday in his State of the Union address, said it is part of a larger strategy to use private-sector forces, new technology and changes in existing government programs to hold down health-care costs and improve access to medical coverage.

"The best way to do that is through private health insurance," Bush said. "Therein lies part of the debate we have in Washington. We believe the private sector is the best delivery of health care. We know there's a role for the federal government, but it's not to dictate, it's not to be the decision-maker."

The president wants to offer tax breaks for families who buy health insurance that costs less than $15,000 a year, and impose a new tax on those with more expensive plans. For individuals, the tax break would go to those with plans costing $7,500 or less.

Bush said his proposal would help some of the 47 million uninsured buy coverage, while giving everyone a financial incentive to seek reasonably priced health plans, which he said would slow spiraling health costs in the long run. He also promised to redirect some federal health money to state efforts to help low-income people and those whose chronic health conditions make it hard to get health insurance.

"There is no question in my mind that a proper role for the federal government is to help the poor and the elderly and the diseased get health care," Bush said. "We'll do that."

After touring facilities run by the high-tech St. Luke's East medical center here, Bush spoke in a session that included small-business owners and uninsured workers who would probably benefit from his plan.

The plan would end the tax code's longtime bias in favor of employer-sponsored insurance, allowing millions of people who buy policies in the individual market to enjoy a tax deduction on their premiums for the first time. The self-employed can deduct premium costs, but many others cannot.

Essentially, Bush would use the new tax on people with high-priced health plans to subsidize the cost of insurance for those with lower-priced coverage, a progressive feature that administration officials thought would draw interest from Democrats who now run Congress.

But so far Democrats have given the idea the cold shoulder, characterizing it as a tax on the middle class that would do little for the uninsured.

"I find the plan troubling because it does nothing to help people get insurance, hurts those who already have it and provides a tax break that benefits the wealthiest Americans," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said.

The administration, however, contends that the plan would eliminate the blatant disparity favoring employer-sponsored coverage, which has been a feature of the tax code since the middle of the last century. Currently employer contributions to their workers' health benefits do not count as taxable income for the employee, which administration officials say encourages workers to get more expensive plans and use more health care than they otherwise would. Buyers of insurance on the individual market do not enjoy the same tax advantages.

DOJ_NMG_0122535

The idea of altering that balance dates at least to the early 1980s, when President Reagan proposed limiting the amount of employer health contributions that could be excluded from an employee's taxable income and diverting the resulting tax revenue to reducing the federal deficit.

Thomas A. Scully, a Republican congressional staffer at the time who later became a top health policy adviser to President George H.W. Bush, said the plan went nowhere: Republicans panned it as a tax increase, and Democrats feared it would penalize some unionized workers with generous health benefits.

In 1992, under the first President Bush, the White House considered scaling back the unlimited tax break on employer coverage and using the new revenue to pay for refundable tax credits to help low-income people get coverage, Scully said. House Republicans, still smarting from Bush's decision to raise taxes as part of the 1990 budget deal, objected, and Bush's advisers stripped the plan out of the budget at the last minute.

"The political timing was terrible," Scully said.

A proposal similar to the current one was recommended two years ago by a presidential advisory panel studying the federal tax system. The panel recommended capping the exclusion from taxable income of employment-based health benefits at $11,500 for family coverage and $5,000 for individuals, starting in 2006. The key difference was that the panel's proposal would have limited the new deduction to the cost of premiums, while Bush's plan would allow even those with cheaper policies to claim the full $15,000 amount.

"The truth is that policy wonks have been talking about this for well more than 20 years, but politicians generally look at it and say, 'This doesn't look like a good deal for me,' " said Joseph Antos, a health economist at the American Enterprise Institute who supports the new Bush plan. "As we've joked around here for years, it's an idea that only a policy wonk could love."

Not so, said Bush.

"If people in Washington are serious about dealing with the uninsured, here is a serious idea for them to consider," he said. "They're just dismissing things because of pure politics; we have put forth ideas that are worthy of debate, and we believe will work."

Bush Promotes His Healthcare Proposal (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2007

He defends his plan to tax some employer-paid coverage, saying it would rectify 'discrimination … based upon who you work for.'

LEE'S SUMMIT, MO. — President Bush traveled to a Missouri hospital Thursday to press his case that Congress should sign on to his healthcare proposals, including his idea to pay for his initiative by taxing some employer-paid insurance premiums as employee income.

Unlike similar town-hall-style events that the White House bills as "conversations," the round table at St. Luke's East hospital had no audience other than about 30 reporters.

"If you work for a company, you get your healthcare free, in essence. It's part of the benefits package," Bush told his seven guests, who included several small-business owners and an uninsured waitress. "If you're a stand-alone person, you pay your healthcare on an after-tax basis.

"In other words, there's discrimination in the tax code based upon who you work for. It makes it harder for individuals or small-company employees to be able to buy healthcare," the president said.

Members of Congress have given the idea a cold reception, saying the idea would make little headway toward obtaining healthcare for the 47 million people in the United States who are uninsured and would eventually raise costs for average families.

Bush toured the new hospital, part of St. Luke's Health System of Kansas City, Mo., to examine its use of information technology, another cause he has promoted. In the emergency room, Bush admired a flat-screen television monitor with a blinking display of patients' vital signs, procedures and medications.

"Medicine is finally catching up with the rest of America in terms of information technology," Bush told the assembled doctors and nurses.

In his State of the Union address, the president proposed making health insurance premiums paid by employers taxable to their employees as part of their compensation. At the same time, every family would get a standard healthcare deduction of $15,000 ($7,500 for singles).

That would mean that families with total healthcare premiums less than $15,000 would get a tax break, but those with what Bush has termed "gold-plated" plans would have to pay income tax on the amount over $15,000.

The president argues that his proposal would level the playing field for those without employer-sponsored health insurance, because the standard deduction would be available to everyone. And that would make it easier for more people to afford to buy individual health insurance.

However, many healthcare experts say that the president's proposal will do little to help most of those who have no health insurance. That is because about half of the uninsured earn so little that they do not file income taxes, so the standard deduction would not help them.

Currently, about 25% of employer health plans cost companies and their employees more than $15,000 a year, meaning that roughly 75% of those with employer health plans would get a tax break under the president's proposal. But healthcare experts say that those savings could be short-lived; the deduction and cap will be indexed to inflation, whereas healthcare costs have been rising faster than the inflation rate.

Esmerelda Wergin, a waitress at her grandmother's Mexican restaurant, told the president that she and her husband had been unable to afford health coverage for themselves and their two sons, either through a job or on their own.

"Some jobs offer you health insurance plans, but they cover nothing…. It's really hard to find one that's going to suit your family's needs," Wergin said.

Bush said the Wergins would save $3,500 in taxes under his proposal, money they could put toward health insurance.

"Rather than have a family sit outside the system … why not help them afford a healthcare system through making the tax code fair?" Bush asked.

Bush Health Plan Leaves Questions (PD)

By Mary Vanac

Cleveland Plain Dealer, January 26, 2007

Mary Vanac Plain Dealer Reporter

Local insurers and employee group advocates aren't entirely sure what to make of President Bush's proposal to change the way we pay for health insurance.

During his State of the Union address Tuesday evening, Bush proposed giving a $7,500 deduction to single taxpayers and a $15,000 tax deduction to families who buy health insurance.

Practically speaking, taxpayers who pay for their own health insurance would benefit directly from the proposal.

Those who can afford health insurance but have not yet purchased it also could benefit, said Steve Millard, executive director of the Council of Smaller Enterprises, a unit of the Greater Cleveland Partnership.

But this group could account for less than 10 percent of the estimated 40 million Americans who do not have health insurance, Millard said.

But for the majority of taxpayers who get their medical insurance through an employer, the proposal means shifting that employer-paid benefit to employees as income.

This income would be tax-free up to the deduction amounts, but amounts exceeding the deductions would be taxable income for the first time.

Many of the details surrounding the Bush proposal still aren't clear, said Joe Gibbons, government-relations director for Medical Mutual of Ohio in Cleveland.

"The president offered up an interesting concept, which deserves a full review," Gibbons said.

"But I don't think anything becomes clear until after the next [presidential] election."

Jim Kappel, spokesman for WellPoint Inc., the Indianapolis owner of Anthem Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Ohio, said, "Tax policy can be an important way for people to consider health coverage."

Like many insurers and states, WellPoint has its own ideas about how to reform the U.S. health insurance system.

A WellPoint plan announced this month called for universal coverage for children and for expanding programs for the neediest, Kappel said.

John Ryan, outgoing head of the North Shore Federation of Labor, said the proposal raised concerns for people who have medical insurance, as well as those who don't.

"For people who have health-care coverage, it provides a foot in the door for tax benefits," said Ryan, who plans to become U.S. Sen. Sherrod Brown's Ohio director after his replacement at the former Cleveland AFL-CIO Federation is found.

But workers who now receive generous health-care benefits could pay taxes they don't have to pay today, he said.

People who don't have insurance because they can't afford it, though, won't benefit from a tax deduction.

"The proposal falls short of what working families need," Ryan said.

"The only good thing about [Bush's] proposal on health care is that he has stated there's a problem," Ryan said.

DOJ_NMG_0122537

COSE's Millard said he was glad to see that health care made the first 10 minutes of Bush's speech.

"I liked the comments he made supporting the Voinovich bill and alternatives for how states deal with health care costs," Millard said, referring to Ohio Republican Sen. George Voinovich's idea to provide waivers for Medicaid recipients that could bring more federal dollars to states like Ohio.

"We are advocating a number of things for changing the health care system," Millard said. Pairing the president's proposed tax deductions with a requirement that all Americans have health care coverage will bring change to the health care system, he said.

Bush Pushes Health Care Plan (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

LEE'S SUMMIT, Mo., Jan. 25 — President Bush urged Congress on Thursday to consider his new health care proposal and indicated he was ready for a fight.

"If people in Washington are serious about dealing with the uninsured, here is a serious idea for them to consider," Mr. Bush said of his health care plan. "They're just dismissing things because of pure politics."

Mr. Bush's comments came in a discussion with local doctors, small-business owners and workers here on the second stop of a tour to promote policies he proposed during his State of the Union address on Tuesday night.

Even before the speech, Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York and chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, had cast doubt on the chances of Mr. Bush's package of proposals, which is intended to improve access to health insurance with changes in the tax code. Mr. Rangel called it "a bad policy"; other Democratic leaders have since called the proposal all but "dead on arrival."

Under the proposal, workers would be newly taxed on health care plans provided by employers that were valued above new — and, administration officials say, generous — standard deductions for health care benefits. Individuals would in turn be able to buy insurance plans tax-free.

White House officials said they had received more positive feedback from some Senate Democrats, but the plan has drawn fierce resistance from the labor unions.

With record low approval ratings and most of his remaining political capital going into the defense of his new strategy for the Iraq war, Mr. Bush has little sway over Congress on his new plans, pollsters and analysts say.

But Mr. Bush's aides have said that they would try to build pressure on Democrats by accusing them of turning their backs on his proposals before truly considering them.

"We proposed a bold initiative," Mr. Bush said here. "I know Americans expect that the United States Congress will take a look at all ideas."

The president spoke at St. Luke's Hospital here, where he asked a group of workers, business owners and administrators how the current system worked against them and how the new system would help them.

Martha Gelencher, a small-business owner sitting with the president, said in a typically glowing exchange about the proposal that she could not imagine "why someone would not think it would be a good thing."

Mr. Bush portrayed the plan as in keeping with his philosophy that it was government's role to enable people to become the "decision maker," reminiscent of his reference to himself last year as "the decider."

Bush Comes To Missouri To Promote Health Plan (SLPD)

By David Twiddy

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, January 26, 2007

LEE'S SUMMIT, Mo. (AP) -- In town to push his proposal to expand access to health insurance, President Bush on Thursday praised advanced patient care technology at a local hospital.

Bush toured the Lee's Summit campus of the Saint Luke's Health System, which is less than two years old and features an array of high-tech systems that closely track patient care, even from half a state away.

In one room, Bush studied a wall of computer screens that included medical information on every patient currently receiving treatment in the hospital's emergency room, including the X-ray of a girl who had dislocated her elbow.

In another room in the intensive care unit, hospital officials showed the president a high-powered camera above a bed that would allow physicians anywhere to keep an eye on the patient's progress. A similar system allows hospital employees to watch patients at ICUs in other Saint Luke's system hospitals, including one in Hays, Kan.

"Medicine is finally catching up with the rest of America in the use of technology," said Bush, who has advocated for greater use of computerized health records as a way to bring down costs and reduce medical errors.

Afterward, Bush attended a round-table discussion in one of the hospital's conference rooms with a group of small-business owners and employees, hearing their concerns about paying for insurance.

In his State of the Union address Tuesday, Bush proposed taxing employer-financed health care benefits after a deduction of $15,000 for families and $7,500 for individuals. The deductions would also apply to people buying their own insurance plans.

The White House estimates about 80 percent of workers with health insurance would see a tax cut because of the change. The other 20 percent would see a tax increase if their insurance was worth more than the deductions.

Bush defended the plan Thursday, saying it would "level the playing field" between small businesses and large businesses, which typically get a discount because of their size and help more people afford coverage.

"If you work for a company you get your health care for free, in essence, because it's part of your benefit package," he said. "If you're a stand-alone person, you're paying for your insurance on an after-tax basis. There's discrimination in the tax code based on who you work for."

The Missouri Democratic Party joined other critics of the plan, saying it wouldn't help reduce the millions of people living without insurance and could encourage employers to limit or drop high-quality coverage.

"You don't make health care more affordable by increasing taxes on middle-class families that work hard and currently have good health care coverage," said Jack Cardetti, the state party spokesman.

Sherwin Carroll, president of the Missouri-Kansas State Council for the Service Employees International Union, said the poorest people will have to use any tax savings they receive for other living expenses, not insurance.

"We know tax cuts don't help the general public," Carroll said. "It gets President Bush around the real issue, which is universal health care."

"If people in Washington are serious about dealing with the uninsured, this is a serious idea for them to consider," he said.

As an example, he pointed to Dan Jones, a St. Louis computer engineer and one of the round-table participants, who said he's been without insurance since dropping his individual plan when premiums got to $400 a month.

"That $4,800 (a year's worth of premiums) is a lot of money," he said. "That's money that could go toward a car or a house."

Bush said the plan would save Jones more than the cost for an individual insurance plan.

"Here's a classic case, a young guy in the marketplace priced out of the individual market," he said. "The plan helps him."

Bush Promotes Health Care Proposal (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, January 26, 2007

LEE'S SUMMIT, Mo. — For Dan Jones, a single man with no health insurance, President Bush's plan to give tax deductions for health coverage sounds like a good deal.

Bush's proposal would give individuals a $7,500 tax deduction regardless of whether they buy their own health insurance or their employers pay for it. Families would receive a $15,000 deduction. It was unveiled during Tuesday's State of the Union speech.

VIDEO: Bush tours hospital

"Your health care proposal looks very profitable to me," Jones told Bush Thursday at a roundtable discussion.

Jones, who lives in St. Louis and works for a computer company, said he would be able to buy an insurance policy under Bush's plan and have money left over. Jones would be able to reduce his taxable income by $7,500, even if he spends less on health insurance.

On the second of his road trips to sell his State of the Union ideas, Bush told a group of medical professionals that the federal government should make health insurance and care more affordable. An estimated 47 million Americans are uninsured.

"The (health care) system discriminates against the Dan Joneses because the tax code … has made it harder for him," the president said. "We're trying to move somebody like Dan from being a statistic."

Democrats criticized Bush's plan. In Washington, a fact sheet released by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid's office said it would "prompt employers to stop offering health care."

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., who is exploring a White House bid, said Bush's proposal was a "halfway measure" that "does little to bring down costs or guarantee coverage."

Before the roundtable discussion on health care, Bush toured St. Luke's East hospital and learned more about new technologies that help doctors treat and diagnose diseases. The president said he wants to find ways to use information technology to help people understand the costs of medical services.

DOJ_NMG_0122539

He also repeated his call for reducing the number of medical liability lawsuits, as a way to curb health care costs. "When you've got a lawsuit, it causes good docs to quit the practice of medicine," he said.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto said public pressure — and demand for better health care — would force Republicans in Bush's party and Democrats who control Congress to work together.

"The American people are rightly concerned about any plan that will put the government between patients and their doctors," Fratto said. "Good ideas that avoid that pitfall will have a chance to prevail."

On Capitol Hill, Republicans such as Sen. George Voinovich of Ohio have expressed concern that the war in Iraq could affect Bush's ability to press a domestic agenda with Congress.

Bush meets today with House Republicans to discuss health care, energy, immigration and other issues.

"They're going to want to talk about issues that came up in the State of the Union address," White House press secretary Tony Snow said, "because that is going to play a significant role in politics over the next few months."

Leavitt Espouses Health Plan (WT)

By Gregory Lopes

The Washington Times, January 26, 2007

During the next three months, Secretary of Health and Human Services Michael O. Leavitt will travel the country to drum up support for the Bush administration's proposals for health care coverage.

Not since the early days of the Clinton administration has so much attention been paid to the problem of medical insurance.

It has been a dizzying month of calls for reforms, with conservative industry groups and liberal advocacy organizations joining forces on proposals to reduce the legions of the underinsured and uninsured.

While the new attention is necessary, it may not be effective.

"What we have here is a convergence of philosophies between the Democrats in Congress that want to expand the employer system and public programs and Republicans [the Bush administration] who believe the individual system is where we need to go," said Robert Laszewski, president of Health Policy and Strategy Associates. "You don't split the difference, we're stalemated until 2008."

The president released his proposals to Congress shortly before the State of the Union address. Almost immediately the plan was criticized on Capitol Hill.

"President Bush's proposal on health care is another step in the wrong direction," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, at the U.S. Conference of Mayors on Wednesday.

"It will actually raise taxes on middle-class families lucky enough to have good health insurance, while providing little assistance to the 47 million uninsured Americans. Quite simply, it's bad medicine."

The Democrats do not favor the president's tax proposals but Mr. Leavitt was adamant that the states alone cannot solve the problem of the uninsured.

The problem, as Mr. Leavitt explained, is that low-income people with no employer insurance must buy individual health insurance after they pay their income taxes. "It's not fair," he said.

So the administration is proposing to reform the tax code by giving families a $15,000 deduction and individuals a $7,500 deduction. But Families USA, a nonprofit consumer organization, calls the tax-reform proposal regressive, partly because a tax deduction favors people with higher incomes.

A tax credit provides more tax relief. For a family in a 15 percent tax bracket, a tax deduction reduces their tax liability by only 15 cents for every dollar spent on premiums. The Families USA analysis shows that for a family in a 15 percent bracket, the tax deduction is worth $2,250.

When asked why a deduction rather than a credit, the secretary said that the administration considered a tax credit and that "a tax credit certainly has redeeming features."

"If exclusion [deduction] is not the solution, let's talk about what is a solution, but I believe exclusion is the best policy," he said.

Under the proposal, Mr. Leavitt said 23 million to 28 million people would pay more taxes on their insurance because, for the first time, the government would levy a tax on the value of employer-sponsored health insurance in some cases. Currently, most employees are not taxed on the value of their employer-sponsored health insurance.

Meanwhile, the industry/advocacy coalition proposal, while also offering tax incentives, calls for not only an expansion of the State Children's Health Insurance Program but also broadening the coverage power of Medicaid to childless adults.

White House Touts Health Care Savings (AP)

By Kevin Freking

AP, January 26, 2007

Get health insurance through your employer? The average cost of a family policy is about $11,500, low enough to get you a tax break under President Bush's new health care initiative.

If an employer-provided plan covers you alone, the policy costs just under $4,250 on average, still low enough for a tax cut.

The administration says its proposal would enable more Americans to afford health insurance, reducing the ranks of the uninsured _ now estimated at 46.6 million _ by 5 percent to 10 percent.

The president hit the road Thursday to sell his health care plan, talking it up at a conference in Lee's Summit, Mo. But it has received a cold response from key Democrats in Congress.

The plan would do two things: For the first time, the cost of an insurance policy would be treated as taxable income. The cost includes both the employer's and the employee's payments. The result is that workers' taxable wages would shoot up dramatically.

But, then, the president calls for a standard tax deduction for those who buy health insurance _ $15,000 for family coverage and $7,500 for individual coverage. So, the key to getting a tax cut will be to keep the cost of the policy below the size of the new deduction.

The result of the proposed change would be that, initially, about 80 percent of workers who get insurance through their jobs would be in the camp that gets a tax cut. About 20 percent would see a tax increase.

About 160 million people get health coverage through their employers.

A smaller group of Americans, about 17.8 million, buy health insurance on their own because their job doesn't provide it or they can't afford the coverage their employer offers. Almost all of them would experience a substantial tax cut.

That's because they don't have a boss fronting the cost of their insurance on a tax-free basis. They pay for it themselves, and get little tax help unless they spend at least 7.5 percent of their adjusted gross income on health care.

Karen Davis, president of the Commonwealth Fund, said the people who buy insurance on their own are typically baby boomers. Of the 12 million adults in the individual market, 40 percent of them make more than $50,000 a year.

They would save, on average, about $2,500 when buying individual coverage, and $5,000 on family coverage, she said.

"I definitely think it is fiscal relief" for those in the individual market, Davis said.

That relief is much more mixed when it comes to people who get health insurance through their work, she said.

Just how much one pays or saves depends upon which income tax bracket they're in. The administration projects that the greatest benefit would go to the middle class.

The wealthy tend to have the most expensive policies, and many of them can expect to pay higher taxes. Meanwhile, the poor generally don't pay any income tax, so the help they get would be limited to lower payroll taxes.

The administration has referred to health insurance policies exceeding $15,000 for a family or $7,500 for an individual as gold-plated, but many disagree with that assessment.

"Not all these policies are gold-plated. What you get depends on where you live, where you work and what the cost of insurance is in that area," said Diane Rowland, executive vice president of the Kaiser Family Foundation.

Workers in established manufacturing industries, such as the auto and steel industry, tend to have generous health insurance benefits, so they could see their taxes go up if they stick with their current policy. So could many government workers.

Also, large firms tend to have better, more expensive policies than do small businesses. Davis said that large businesses tend to treat the great majority of employees equally.

"Typically, the person working in the mail room has the same health coverage as the person working as an executive," Davis said.

But John Goodman, president and CEO of the National Center for Policy Analysis, disagreed. He said executives at large corporations often get extra benefits on top of the insurance that everyone else at the company gets. They'll get annual checkups and undergo screenings at the most renowned medical facilities such as the Mayo Clinic, or in his home town of Dallas, the Cooper Clinic. It makes little sense for the government to subsidize such health insurance plans, he said.

While more than 100 million people would get a tax break, the administration estimates, more than 55 percent of the uninsured _ about 25 million people _ have such low incomes that they pay no income taxes, Davis said. So the tax changes would not make insurance any more affordable for them, she said.

The president's plan would not kick in until 2009. Over the years, the standard deduction would increase at the rate of overall inflation. But some tax analysts warn that the deduction would still lose value as a result.

That's because health insurance premiums have been going up much more quickly than inflation, so, eventually, more taxpayers will fall into that camp whose health insurance cost more than the deductible. When that happens, they have two choices, pay more taxes or select more basic, less expensive insurance plans.

The administration says it believes that people will seek out more basic coverage to avoid tax increases.

"We think that will bring down national health spending," said Katherine Baicker, who serves on the president's council of economic advisers.

Some analysts also worry that more small businesses will drop coverage if they know their workers can get coverage on the individual market, thanks to the new tax breaks for people buying insurance on their own.

Coverage in the individual market is generally cheaper than coverage in the group market, but many Americans, particularly those with pre-existing health conditions, will find it difficult getting a company to sell them a policy, said Len Burman of the Tax Policy Center, a joint program run by the Urban Institute and the Brookings Institution.

"For many, the nongroup market doesn't work well," Burman said. "It works fine for people who are healthy. It just doesn't work well for people who are sick."

Bush's Health Plan Might Look Familiar To Utah (SLT)

By Robert Gehrke

Salt Lake Tribune, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON - As governor, Mike Leavitt pushed a plan to give Utah taxpayers a deduction to buy health insurance.

Now, a decade later, the Health and Human Services secretary has the challenge of trying to sell a similar plan outlined in President Bush's State of the Union to deeply skeptical Democrats in Congress.

"Our goal is to get a plan for affordable, basic insurance, accessible to every citizen in every state," Leavitt told reporters Wednesday.

The Bush plan extends tax deductions to help self-employed workers or those whose employers don't offer insurance buy health coverage.

"If you're a waitress or you're a bricklayer or you're a day care worker . . . it's simply too big of a lift," Leavitt said.

There are currently about 47 million Americans without health insurance.

The second part of the plan would tax health care benefits provided by employers that exceed $15,000 for families and $7,500 for individuals.

About 20 percent of workers with plans worth more than the deduction - policies the administration calls "gold-plated" coverage - would pay taxes. However, the White House projects that after 10 years, nearly 40 percent of workers would see a tax increase or have to find a cheaper policy, White House spokesman Tony Fratto said.

That's because the cost of health care

is projected to grow faster than the value of the tax deduction, meaning that, barring changes the White House hopes will keep health costs down, more workers would have health coverage worth more than the deduction.

Leavitt said the tax issue is a question of fairness that has to be addressed if the goal is coverage for every American.

"In my mind, it's simply indefensible for our country to have a tax policy that provides a tax benefit to portion of our citizens and simply ignores the rest, and that's the policy we currently have," he said.

As governor, Leavitt proposed, and the Legislature passed, a similar proposal exempting health care costs from state income taxes, but "it became very clear that it was essentially just a gesture."

"This dilemma is simply unresolvable by the states," he said. "It has to be dealt with by the federal government."

Leavitt and the administration face a skeptical Congress.

Rep. Pete Stark, D-Calif., who chairs a House health subcommittee, said the president's plan won't help the uninsured and will discourage employers from covering workers. Senate health committee Chairman Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said the tax breaks won't improve coverage or "help working families afford the spiraling cost of health care."

Utah health care advocates also have reservations about Bush's health care plans.

DOJ_NMG_0122542

"These tax credits aren't going to come anywhere near what it's going to cost families to have credible health coverage," said Judi Hilman, executive director of the Utah Health Policy Project.

Leavitt also outlined a plan to redirect money paid to hospitals to provide care for the uninsured into new, basic health insurance polices devised by the states. He said that, for the $38.5 billion now going to hospitals, all of the uninsured earning up to twice the poverty level could be covered and have money left over.

Again, as governor, Leavitt tried something similar, reducing some benefits to Medicaid recipients to try to provide coverage to uninsured Utahns.

"I took criticism from advocacy groups, but I got letter after letter after letter of appreciation from nearly 20,000 families that had health insurance for the first time," Leavitt said.

Bush's Budget Will Detail Plans To Slow Spending On Medicare (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson said the Bush administration will offer specific proposals to significantly slow growth in Medicare spending in its new budget, but that there is little he or the president can do to jump-start the stalled effort to fix Social Security until Republicans and Democrats in Congress are ready.

Read excerpts2 from the interview with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson.

In an interview yesterday, Mr. Paulson said the budget for fiscal 2008, which begins Oct. 1, will include a number of "incremental changes" to government health programs, including some aimed at slowing the projected 7% annual growth in Medicare spending. The budget is to be released on Feb. 5.

Mr. Paulson wouldn't discuss details. Others say the savings -- expected to add up to $90 billion over five years -- are expected to come mainly from squeezing health providers, though some beneficiaries would be affected directly.

"When the budget goes up you will see a number of changes relating to Medicare which are aimed at slowing the growth of these liabilities, slowing the trajectory," Mr. Paulson said.

Talking to Congress

Mr. Paulson, who took office six months ago, said he is spending much of his time talking to members of Congress about the urgency of restraining health costs and reducing the nation's reliance on foreign oil.

Restraining the costs of the Medicare health insurance program for the elderly will help the White House show a budget that is balanced by 2012.

The program cost about $374 billion last year, about 14% of all federal spending. Without any changes, the Congressional Budget Office estimates it will cost $851 billion by 2017.

The proposals to save the government money on Medicare complement President Bush's plan to change the tax law to make employer-provided health insurance taxable as income and to exclude $15,000 of that income per family to encourage people to choose cheaper health-insurance plans, Mr. Paulson said. Calling the proposal "a big idea," he said it is intended to advance the national conversation about health care and make Americans better consumers of health care and thus restrain cost increases over time.

On Social Security, Mr. Paulson acknowledged that it may be hard to meet the president's goal of fixing the long-term finances of the government's retirement program, given the "significant political differences and policy differences on what steps are to be taken."

In his State of the Union address, Mr. Bush said failure to put Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security on strong financial footing "will one day leave our children with three bad options: huge tax increases, huge deficits, or huge and immediate cuts in benefits."

Mr. Paulson said he has been reaching out to Democrats and Republicans in Congress to start a discussion without any "preconditions." Mr. Bush has pushed the notion of creating private accounts as part of a Social Security fix; Democrats have resisted. Mr. Paulson insisted nothing is off the table, refusing, for instance, to rule out discussion of changes to the payroll tax. "The key thing is to come together without preconditions," he said. "It's only fair that if you're going to have a bipartisan discussion, you can't tell someone we're not going to let you talk about your idea."

In a Fox News interview last week, Vice President Dick Cheney sounded a different tone, saying that the president wants a discussion without "preconditions" but that "we don't believe a tax increase is necessary." Those comments drew fire from Democrats.

Asked about Mr. Cheney's remarks, Mr. Paulson said, "The president has been very clear. He'd like people to come together without preconditions."

'Can't Force Something'

DOJ_NMG_0122543

Mr. Paulson said even creating a path for his successor to solve the Social Security problem would be progress. "We can't force something," he said. "If we get fortunate there will be enough momentum and the leaders in both bodies of Congress will work together and we'll craft a solution. But if we don't, hopefully if I do my job right, if others do the things they're doing, we'll make progress. We'll depoliticize this and it will be easier for someone, sometime in the future to solve."

The secretary, an active environmentalist before coming to Washington, also emphasized the urgency of taking action to reduce the nation's dependence on oil, saying "one of the significant risks to our economy is imported oil" and said the solution lies primarily in reducing the reliance of automobiles on gasoline.

Mr. Bush has called for a 20% cut in gasoline consumption over the next 10 years, and would achieve that through new auto fuel-economy standards and a mandate to use more ethanol and other alternative energy.

"This is aggressive," Mr. Paulson said. "By putting a mandate of that size out there, I believe that is going to spur, and I know the president does, huge technological advances in investment," he said, adding: "If we can have 20% of our transport fuel not come from oil, that will make a big difference."

Growing Support Of Public (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

In new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll1, Americans back Democrats by 35 percentage points on prescription drugs for seniors amid looming showdown with White House over Medicare drug benefit. Since Bush's presidency began, Democrats have turned an eight-point deficit on taxes into an eight-point edge, and narrowed deficit on "moral values" to nine points from 22.

Approaching 2008, Democrats have "a once-in-a-generation opportunity to be...reconsidered" as a national party, says Republican pollster Bill McInturff, who conducts the Journal/NBC survey with Democratic counterpart Peter Hart. In new book, Senate Democrats' campaign chief Schumer of New York recommends a "kitchen-table compact" including unconventional issues like reduced cancer mortality to court centrists like the fictional couple "Joe and Eileen Bailey" he uses to shape strategy.

The Baileys remain "up for grabs," Schumer says, "but they're more open to our message than theirs."

Congress attracts promising initial reviews.

By 53% to 44%, Americans say new House ethics rules will improve lawmakers' "ethics and honesty." A 48% plurality predicts Democratic Congress will "strike the right balance" with Bush; 12 years ago, a 47% plurality of Americans predicted the new Republican Congress would be "too inflexible" with then-President Clinton.

Speaker Pelosi's positive rating rises modestly to 28%, while 24% view her negatively. Three-fourths of Americans now recognize her name; most still don't know Senate Democratic Leader Reid, Senate Republican Leader McConnell or House Republican leader Boehner.

Health care returns to spotlight but still poses political risks.

A 53% majority expresses willingness to pay higher taxes so everyone can have health insurance. But that's down from 66% when Bill and Hillary Clinton pursued universal coverage unsuccessfully in 1993.

Resistance is greatest among those earning more than $75,000. Americans embrace coverage mandates pushed by Romney of Massachusetts and Schwarzenegger of California as good ideas, but by only a bare 48%-42% plurality; those 50 or older, the most-frequent voters, are least supportive.

Obama's backing of universal coverage may draw other African-Americans, who support the goal more than whites or Hispanics.

AS IRAQ COSTS mount, administration leans on private companies to help rebuild Lebanon as part of broader Mideast peace strategy; Intel and Cisco executives attend Paris donors' conference where Rice announces $770 million in U.S. aid. Some 49% of Americans say average U.S. citizen has sacrificed for Iraq war; 48% say no.

NEGOTIATORS STRUGGLE to complete U.S.-South Korea trade pact, which would be the biggest since Nafta. Among sticking points: Korean market access for U.S.-produced beef and autos. Among blue-collar workers, 28% call "jobs going overseas" the economic issue that concerns them most; 29% cite health costs.

SALES JOB: With just 40% approving his handling of the economy, Bush heads to Peoria and New York next week to promote recent signs of strength and rising wages. Treasury Secretary Paulson calls economy "a hell of a lot better than we thought it would be a year ago."

WHAT SLUMP? Majorities in all parts of the country say their home values are still rising. Most bullish are Southerners (65%); least bullish are Midwesterners (52%).

Charities chafe at Bush's foreign-aid priorities.

DOJ_NMG_0122544

Antipoverty groups say U.S. would improve international image by emphasizing efforts against poverty and disease rather than democratization. "America has the opportunity to present a different face abroad," says Samuel Worthington of InterAction, an umbrella group with members including CARE and World Vision.

Though conservatives still strongly approve Bush's foreign policy, evangelicals are now split. Among families containing military veterans or active-duty soldiers, 55% disapprove Bush's handling of Iraq and 54% say the war hasn't been worth the costs.

MINOR MEMOS: Despite election thumping, 40% of Republicans characterize themselves as very happy compared with 26% of Democrats. ... Most likely to say they've taken antidepressants: women, whites, those earning less than $30,000 and liberals.

The President's Risky Health Plan (NYT)

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

The new health care proposals announced by President Bush this week purport to tackle the two toughest problems confronting the American health care system: the rising number of uninsured Americans and the escalating costs of medical care.

But on both counts, they fall miles short of what is needed to fix a system where — scandalously — 47 million Americans go without health insurance.

The financial sinkhole in Iraq and huge tax cuts for wealthy Americans have left the administration with no money to really address the problem. To keep the program "revenue neutral," Mr. Bush would instead use tax subsidies to encourage more people to buy their own health insurance, while imposing additional taxes on people who have what Mr. Bush deems "gold plated" insurance.

It is a formula that would do little to reduce the number of uninsured Americans and would have a high risk of producing pernicious results. Even White House officials acknowledged earlier this week that they expected the number of uninsured to drop by only three million to five million people as a result of Mr. Bush's proposals. They expect the states to take on most of the burden.

One enlightened element is that the plan would provide equal tax treatment to those who bought their insurance policies on the individual market and those who got coverage through group policies at work, thus ending a longstanding inequity that favors employer-based policies. To level the playing field, the administration proposes to grant everyone who gets qualifying health insurance a standard deduction — $15,000 for family coverage or $7,500 for single coverage — off their income subject to taxation. Those with family policies exceeding $15,000 in value would have to pay taxes on the excess amount.

After the proposed starting date in 2009, the administration estimates, about 80 percent of workers with employer-provided policies would pay lower taxes and 20 percent would pay higher taxes, unless they reduced the value of their health coverage to fit within the standard deduction.

The new standard deduction would almost certainly entice some people to buy health insurance who had previously elected not to. But a tax deduction is of little value to people so poor that they pay little or no income tax. And unfortunately, it is those people who account for the vast majority of the nation's uninsured.

Instead of trying to fix that fundamental flaw, the administration has decided instead to buck it to the states. The White House has offered few details. But its idea is to allow states to redirect federal money that now helps to finance hospitals that provide charity care and use it instead to subsidize health insurance for the poor.

In an ideal world, it would make good sense to insure people in advance rather than wait for them to show up in a high-cost emergency room. But this plan could quickly cripple the safety-net hospitals. Fortunately, no governor would have to accept the offer to redirect funds. The scheme is mostly a reflection of how the administration is unwilling to accept true responsibility for the uninsured.

If the administration really wanted to help low-income people, it would have proposed a refundable tax credit that would have the same dollar value for everyone — instead of a tax deduction, which primarily helps people in high tax brackets. Even those who do not pay taxes would get a check for the dollar value of the credit, providing them at least some money to help pay for health insurance. Congress ought to recognize that credits are the better approach for even such a limited plan.

As for the tax increases on those "gold plated" health policies, the White House is hoping to discourage people from using high-priced comprehensive health policies that cover everything from routine office visits to costly diagnostic procedures that are not always necessary.

The administration's goal is to instead encourage people to take out policies that might reduce the use of medical services, like policies with high deductibles or co-payments, or managed care plans. But even "copper plated" policies can exceed

$15,000 in cost if they are issued in areas where medical prices are high or to groups with high numbers of older or chronically ill workers.

The whole approach rests on the premise that comprehensive prepaid health policies are a major factor in driving up costs; the theory is that people will tend to use services if they are covered. There is probably some truth in that.

But the main drivers in rising health costs are the costly services, high-priced drugs and hospitalizations for people who are seriously ill with catastrophic diseases or multiple chronic illnesses. Making their health coverage less generous would simply make it harder for them to get the care they need.

The greatest risk in the president's proposal is that it would seem likely to lead many small- and medium-size employers to stop offering health benefits altogether on the theory that their workers could buy affordable insurance on their own. That would leave many more Americans at the mercy of the dysfunctional individual policy market, where administrative costs are high and insurers strive to avoid covering people who are apt to become sick and need costly care.

For all its fanfare, Mr. Bush's plan would be unlikely to reduce the ranks of the uninsured very much. And if things went badly, it could actually increase their numbers. That's not the answer Americans are waiting for and not what they deserve.

By Michael Mayo

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, January 26, 2007

To see how spectacularly off the mark President Bush's proposal to solve the health insurance crisis is, consider the case of Celestine Pearson.

"We're already capped out on our deductions, because we got five of us living on one part-time salary," Pearson said. "So how is this [$15,000 tax credit] going to benefit us? We won't get any more tax breaks, and health insurance still won't be affordable."

I met her outside Memorial Regional Hospital in Hollywood on Wednesday, where her 10-year-old son was having minor surgery.

She and her husband have been without health insurance for a year, when he lost his job with the state as a toll collector. He now has a part-time job that doesn't include benefits.

They live in Miami Gardens and have four children: 10, 13, 15 and 19.

She said the three youngest have medical coverage through Medicaid and the state. Their oldest, a biology student on scholarship at the University of South Florida in Tampa, has been uninsured since she turned 18.

"The president may have some people's interests at heart, but I don't think it's probably mine," said Pearson, 43.

Pearson said the family hasn't even bothered shopping for new insurance since losing the HMO plan that came with her husband's former job. She ticked off the other things that take priority: rent, food, electric bill, clothes.

Now that she, her husband and oldest daughter are among the 3.6 million Floridians without health insurance, she said they have adopted a new "preventative care" plan.

"Basically we're neglecting ourselves and praying we don't get sick," Pearson said.

"The politicians talk as if they care, but when it comes down to actually providing, they do nothing."

Actually, Bush's plan might be worse than nothing. It would reward high-income workers in low-cost plans, penalize middle-class families who live in high-cost states and might prove utterly irrelevant in reducing the ranks of the 46.5 million uninsured Americans or the overall cost of health care.

The plan would rearrange piles of tax money with no guarantee that the uninsured would use their share (if they even got a share) to buy insurance. And it wouldn't stop the increasing flow of everyone's money into the pockets of the insurance, health care and pharmaceutical industries.

In other words, sounds like another Bush boondoggle.

The plan appears dead on arrival, with no realistic way to get through the new Democratic Congress. But it does give the White House something to talk about for a bit to get everyone distracted from the continuing Iraq mess, sort of like that empty debate about privatizing Social Security a couple of years ago.

"For the average Joe American, making 30 or 40 grand a year, these tax breaks are going to do him bupkis," said Marc Zilbert, 60, of Hollywood, using the Yiddish word for nothing.

When it comes to health care, Zilbert is living proof of how upside-down the system is. A former commodities broker, he said he has been uninsured and unemployed for the last year, but now has all his medical care provided by the South Broward Hospital District's indigent fund.

"I get treated first class," said Zilbert. "No different than if I had Blue Cross/Blue Shield."

DOJ_NMG_0122546

He stood outside with a cigarette, attached to an IV drip. He said he had pneumonia and diabetes. Was it a good idea to be smoking? He used another Yiddish word to describe himself (rhymes with luck) and said he had cut down from four packs to five cigarettes a day.

"I'd much rather be paying my own way," he said.

He said he'd have to pay about $1,200 a month for an individual health-care plan, and it wasn't likely any insurance company would take him because of his health history, including cancer.

"The gap in coverage is what's killing people," he said. "If you have a lot of money or if you have nothing, you're OK, but everyone in between is stuck. ... I don't believe in socialism but there has to be a happy medium. There's got to be a better way."

President's Health Care Plan Deservedly DOA (MERCN)

The San Jose Mercury News, January 26, 2007

President Bush should have taken a page out of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's book if he were serious about national health care reform.

That's exactly what President Bush's weak, warmed-over proposal deserves.

The reaction to the president's health care plan is in sharp contrast to the buzz created by Schwarzenegger's shrewd, far-reaching concept of ``shared responsibility'' to reduce costs and provide insurance to the uninsured.

Schwarzenegger went to extraordinary lengths to try to ensure buy-in to his plan from across the political spectrum. Prior to his State of the State address, he consulted with Democratic leaders and health care experts throughout the state, and he has since welcomed alternative proposals and criticisms, creating a political aura that suggests he is more interested in ``getting it right'' than furthering a political agenda.

Monday, he continued his effort to drum up support for his plan by sitting down with nearly two dozen high-tech executives for a round table discussion at Seagate Technology in Fremont.

President Bush's approach? He didn't even bother to call in House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel, D-New York, or health subcommittee Chairman Pete Stark, D-Fremont, before announcing his plan. Stark found out about it by listening to the president's Saturday morning radio address. This is not reaching across the aisle.

Rather than a push for ``shared responsibility,'' the president continues with his view that everyone, rich and poor, should be pretty much on his own.

The president is offering a tax deduction of $7,500 for individuals and $15,000 for families to try to help purchase health insurance. But as Health Access Executive Director Anthony Wright puts it, ``that's like giving a three-foot rope to people in a 10-foot hole.''

Since it's becoming increasingly clear that the president isn't going to be able to lead a national debate on health care for his remaining years in office, it's time for the 2008 presidential contenders to start offering ideas.

They can begin by talking about their reaction to what innovative states -- including California and Massachusetts -- are doing to provide potential national models for health care reform.

Running On Empty (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

Sorry to repeat myself, but I have the same reaction to this year's energy proposals in the State of the Union that I had to last year's. President Bush had the opportunity to launch America on a transformative new path for clean, efficient power. He had a chance for a "Nixon to China" moment — as the Texas oilman who leads us into a greener future. Instead, he gave us "Nixon to New Mexico" — right direction, but not nearly far enough.

As I read the president's remarks, listened to the tepid public reaction and looked at his latest polls, which show Mr. Bush to be wildly unpopular, it seemed to me that the American people basically fired George Bush in the last election. We're now just watching him clean out his desk. Both his energy proposals and his recent Iraq surge were about the best he could muster, given his pink slip.

The problem is that he is going to be cleaning out his desk for another two years, and Americans deserve better. I would love to see Democrats put that something better on Mr. Bush's desk — regarding both energy and Iraq.

"The stakes on Iraq and on climate change are way too large for us all to be just couch potatoes waiting for the messiah to come in 2009," said Fred Krupp, president of Environmental Defense. "That is not an option. Yes, it would be entertaining, but we need leadership on these issues, and we need it now."

DOJ_NMG_0122547

On energy — no, the president's proposals were not just beanbag. His call to reform CAFE mileage standards for U.S. cars "shifts the debate from whether to compel U.S. automakers to build more fuel-efficient vehicles to how much they should do so," notes a strategy consultant, Peter Schwartz. And his call for a nearly fivefold mandatory increase in the production of ethanol and other alternative fuels for cars and trucks also changes the debate from whether to how much, and which fuels.

But the devil will be in the details. Will liquefied coal be one of those alternatives — which could add to global warming — or only non-fossil-fuel alternatives? On mileage standards, U.S. automakers will lobby the White House very hard for the smallest possible change. Will they get their way? If so, there isn't much here.

The really bold, transformative — and popular — initiative Mr. Bush should have offered would either be a national cap-and-trade system for controlling CO2 emissions by utilities, manufacturers and autos, or a carbon tax. Both would create economic incentives for us to get rid of appliances, buildings and cars that emit a lot of CO2 and to invent and purchase those that don't.

But there is no reason that the Democrats could not right now put a cap-and-trade bill on Mr. Bush's desk themselves by spring, Mr. Krupp said, "and I think Bush would sign it."

It is not enough for Democrats to just hold hearings on climate change. They need to use their new power to change the climate. Not only would the public be with them, but so would big business. A coalition of America's best companies — like General Electric, DuPont, Duke Energy, Alcoa, Caterpillar — and environmentalists just issued a "call to action" for a national cap-and-trade program to limit greenhouse gas emissions.

On Iraq: talking to some of our senior military lately, I've been struck by how concerned they are about the new Bush buildup against Iran. Before we have even won one war in Iraq, the Bush team seems to be courting another with Iran. I am all for brandishing the stick with Iran, but it should be for the purpose of gaining leverage for a diplomatic dialogue with Iran and Syria about Iraq.

"When your house is burning, you don't go looking to start a fire in the next house," said Vali Nasr, author of the "The Shia Revival." Right now, he adds, everything should be subordinated to trying to salvage Iraq.

Let the troop surge be accompanied and reinforced by what the Baker-Hamilton commission proposed: a regional conference that puts Syria, Iran, Jordan and Saudi Arabia around a table with Iraqis to try to stabilize the place. And that requires that America brandish carrots and sticks with all the parties. If a real regional conference doesn't work, then Democrats who want to just set a date to withdraw will have an even stronger case because we will truly have tried everything. But let's try everything: a surge of diplomacy, not just troops.

Let the Democrats put that on the president's desk. Just as the business community would support a real climate initiative, I think the U.S. military would support a real diplomatic conference. Bush gave America's voters the reasons to fire him. Democrats need to give voters the reasons to hire them — for the long haul.

President's Union Speech Pleases Conservative Base (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, January 26, 2007

President Bush's State of the Union speech surprised and pleased much of his conservative base by appealing as much to them as to the new Democratic majority in Congress.

"He did not pander to the Democrats and independents as some thought he would," said New Jersey Rep. Scott Garrett, a conservative Republican who told The Washington Times that his House colleagues expressed a similar assessment.

Conservative Republicans have grown increasingly tough and open in their criticism of Mr. Bush on everything from immigration and the Iraq war to spending and government intrusiveness -- to the point in some cases of open rebellion. But Tuesday night he somehow managed to cap that dyspepsia, at least for the moment, and draw praise from his own right wing.

Pat Toomey, president of the influential Club for Growth, saw the speech as a largely successful attempt to reach out to Democrats and independents without alienating Republicans.

"A good example was health care, which was the central focus of his policy," Mr. Toomey said. "His message will appeal to voters, the middle class, Democrats and Republicans alike, because it eliminates an inequity in the tax code that has prevented the evolution of consumer-based -- as distinct from employer-provided -- health care."

"So we are every happy with his proposal, which will lower costs and provide more choice for consumers," said Mr. Toomey. "Democrats ought to like it, but I very much wonder if they to give the president any kind of victory and I am afraid they would rather have this issue to use against Republicans in the 2008 elections."

Some religious conservatives, however, stopped just short of saying the president pandered to the Democrats in Congress.

"The top issues primarily interested the new majority," said Family Research Council President Tony Perkins. "While some of these issues have merit, the president went silent on key social issues that many Americans care deeply about. The overarching concern is that the administration is yielding its ability to influence the public discussion to the liberal leadership of the new congressional majority."

However, with his presidency now in its final two years, Mr. Bush must fight to maintain his influence.

"Bush is already a lame-duck president, but he is trying his best not to be considered a 'dead duck' president -- with no power or influence at all," said Merrill Matthews, an analyst at the Institute for Policy Innovation. "He was, in essence, saying, 'I am still relevant.' Bill Clinton made that claim verbally after the Republican victory in 1994. Bush is doing that by proposing several ideas -- many of them good and some of them more aligned with moderates or the left."

Because last year's election undermined Mr. Bush's political power to push his agenda, he is moving to "idea power," Mr. Matthews said. "Conservatives have always thought that ideas are the real driving force behind change," he said.

As for what, if anything, the president's sixth State of the Union will accomplish, Tom Kilgannon, president of Oliver North's Freedom Alliance, said, "It won't advance much that conservatives care about."

Senior State Department Official Resigns (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, January 26, 2007

Robert Joseph, the State Department's senior arms control and security official, has resigned.

Joseph submitted his resignation to President Bush amid uncertainty about the future of negotiations to curb nuclear programs in Iran and North Korea. Talks on both fronts have moved slowly, with U.N. penalties against both countries showing limited results. The talks are in recess.

Still, in an interview Thursday, Joseph said, "I think we have a very good record."

He cited Libya's renunciation of weapons of mass destruction and the dissolution of a network headed by A.Q. Khan, a Pakistani scientist who leaked weapons technology to North Korea, Iran and Libya.

Joseph also concentrated on what is now a grouping of more than 80 countries committed to intercepting and inspecting weapons cargo at sea and an initiative to combat nuclear terrorism.

Joseph, who will leave next month, acknowledged trying to stop Iran and North Korea from building nuclear weapons was very hard and he said they posed serious challenges to U.S. security.

While he was not a participant in negotiations with Iran and North Korea, Joseph worked on backup measures, including a financial squeeze on the two governments and putting in place the U.N. penalties.

His departure follows that of several other top diplomatic officials, including Philip Zelikow, a close adviser to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; Deputy Secretary Robert Zoellick; and John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations;

Joseph joined the department in 2005 after working on Bush's national security council staff.

He has taken a strong view on a need to eliminate North Korean and Iranian nuclear programs. He warned last month against terrorist groups and other nations acting against U.S. and commercial satellites.

In a telephone interview, he said he would write, teach and work as a consultant. He has compiled 26 years of government service, teaching intermittently over that span.

Senators Kill Minimum Wage Amendment (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, January 26, 2007

An effort to increase the minimum wage in all states, even those that already have wage floors higher than the federal base, failed Thursday after Democrats labeled it a "poison pill."

Democrats said the Republican proposal was designed to kill underlying minimum wage legislation.

An amendment offered by Sen. Jim DeMint, R-S.C., was an effort to show how raising the federal minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 over 26 months would have no effect in eight states because they already have wage floors of $7.25 or higher. Another two states have scheduled minimum wage increases that also would place them above the proposed federal floor.

Eighteen other states have higher minimum wages than the current federal floor, but not as high as the $7.25 in the proposed legislation.

"This is a mandate on low-cost-of-living states, but not on high-cost-of-living states," DeMint said.

The amendment failed on a 78-16 vote after Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., raised a budget point of order challenging it. Massachusetts is among the states that already have a higher minimum wage and would not be affected by the federal law.

Kennedy called the amendment a ploy "intended to give senators in high minimum wage states an uncomfortable vote today not to raise wages for hardworking Americans."

DOJ_NMG_0122549

States that already have higher minimum wages than the federal floor tend to be clustered in the Northeast and the Pacific Coast. States without their own wage floor are in the Midwest and the South.

How To Make The Poor Poorer (WSJ)

By Gary S. Becker And Richard A. Posner

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

The strong bipartisan support for increasing the federal minimum wage to $7.25 an hour from the current $5.15 -- a 40% increase -- is a sad example of how interest-group politics and the public's ignorance of economics can combine to give us laws that manage to be both inefficient and inegalitarian.

An increase in the minimum wage raises the costs of fast foods and other goods produced with large inputs of unskilled labor. Producers adjust both by substituting capital inputs and/or high-skilled labor for minimum-wage workers and, because the substitutes are more costly (otherwise the substitutions would have been made already), by raising prices. The higher prices reduce the producers' output and thus their demand for labor. The adjustments to the hike in the minimum wage are inefficient because they are motivated not by a higher real cost of low-skilled labor but by a government-mandated increase in the price of that labor. That increase has the same misallocative effect as monopoly pricing.

Although some workers benefit -- those who were paid the old minimum wage but are worth the new, higher one to the employers -- others are pushed into unemployment, the underground economy or crime. The losers are therefore likely to lose more than the gainers gain; they are also likely to be poorer people. And poor families are disproportionately hurt by the rise in the price of fast foods and other goods produced with low-skilled labor because these families spend a relatively large fraction of their incomes on such goods. And many, maybe most, of the gainers from a higher minimum wage are not poor. Most minimum-wage workers are part time, and for the majority their minimum-wage income supplements an income derived from other sources. Examples are retirees living on Social Security or private pensions who want to get out of the house part of the day and earn pin money, stay-at-home spouses who want to supplement their spouse's earnings, and teenagers working after school. An increase in the minimum wage will thus provide a windfall to many workers who are not poor.

Some economists deny that a minimum wage reduces employment, though most disagree. And because most increases in the minimum wage have been slight, their effects are difficult to disentangle from other factors that affect employment. But a 40% increase would be too large to have no employment effect; about a tenth of the work force makes less than $7.25 an hour. Even defenders of minimum-wage laws must believe that beyond some point a higher minimum would cause unemployment. Otherwise why don't they propose $10, or $15, or an even higher figure?

A number of countries, including France, have conducted such experiments; the ratio of the minimum wage to the average wage is much higher in these countries than in the U.S. Economists Guy Laroque and Bernard Salanie find that the high minimum wage in France explains a significant part of the low employment rate of married women. Mr. Salanie has argued that the minimum wage also contributes to the dismal employment prospects of young persons in France, including Muslim youths, an estimated 40% of whom are unemployed.

As a means of raising people from poverty or near poverty, the minimum wage is inferior to the Earned Income Tax Credit, which compensates for low wages without interfering with the labor market or conferring windfalls on the nonpoor. EITC is not completely devoid of effects on efficient resource allocation, because like any other government spending it is defrayed out of taxes, and it has been abused by underreporting of income and overreporting of dependents. But it is a more efficient tax than the minimum wage as well as being more effective in redistributing income to the poor.

So why push to increase the minimum wage rather than the EITC? For one thing, unions strongly favor the minimum wage because it reduces competition from low-wage workers (who, partly because most of them work part time, tend not to be unionized) and thus enhances unions' bargaining power and so their appeal to workers. For another, increasing the EITC would mean an increase in government spending, which might require higher taxes; there is no public support for explicit tax increases and most people don't understand that regulatory laws can have the same effect as taxes.

Moreover, poor people tend not to vote; and the number of nonpoor who'd be directly benefited by an increase in the minimum wage, when combined with the number of nonpoor workers whose incomes would rise because of reduced competition from minimum-wage workers, probably exceeds the number of nonpoor who would lose jobs. Teenagers would be among the hardest hit -- and few of them are voters (if under 18, they're ineligible). While workers who receive a wage increase when the minimum wage is hiked realize they've benefited from the hike, many hurt by the hike don't realize it; teenagers and retirees who have trouble finding a job are unlikely to realize that it's because there are fewer jobs in the economy for minimum-wage workers.

Let's hope that if Congress passes a stiff increase in the federal minimum wage, George Bush will emulate Mayor Richard Daley and veto it. Several months ago the Chicago City Council, by a lopsided but not veto-proof vote, passed an ordinance requiring companies that have more than $1 billion in annual sales, and own stores in Chicago having at least 90,000 square feet of floor space, to pay Chicago employees a minimum wage of $9.25 an hour plus $1.50 an hour in fringe benefits, respectively rising to $10 and $3 by 2010. About 40 stores would have been affected.

The ordinance was surpassingly foolish. The retailers that would have been most affected, such as Wal-Mart, Target and Home Depot, are at best only marginally interested in placing stores in large cities because space for large stores and for the parking they require is much more expensive than in suburbs and smaller towns. Moreover, these companies could offset much of the effect of the ordinance by opening more stores in suburbs within easy reach of Chicago, or by holding their floor space to just below 90,000 square feet. Fewer jobs would be available to low-skilled workers in the city, and families with modest incomes who seek low prices rather than elaborate service would be hurt more than the affluent by the increase in prices and reduced availability of big box outlets.

Who would favor such a bad ordinance? Conventional supermarket chains and clothing stores, of course, and unions -- the latter not only for the usual reasons but also because big box companies oppose unions; the ordinance sent a signal that unions have enough political clout to make life difficult for large nonunion retailers. The absence of opposition to the ordinance from low-income consumers is not surprising because they are not organized to exert political pressure. The aggressive support of the ordinance by most of the council's black members is more difficult to understand, but the explanation may be that they are allied with unions. They may have realized that their constituents would be harmed by the ordinance, but believed that in return for taking this hit they would get the support of unions for measures that would help low-income families.

The failure of the Chicago ordinance and related local measures helps to explain the push to raise the federal minimum wage. The ordinance would have been particularly destructive -- hence Mayor Daley's veto of it -- because the smaller the scope of a minimum-wage increase, the more easily it is evaded, though possibly at great social cost. A federal increase would have a smaller social cost per worker covered, but presumably a larger overall social cost. Chicago's "big box" ordinance is evidence, if any is needed, that politics can override economic sanity. One can only hope that this lesson will not be repeated on the national stage.

Lawmakers Target Rising Credit Penalties (AP)

By Marcy Gordon

AP, January 26, 2007

Democratic lawmakers challenged credit card executives Thursday over rising late fees and other penalties and marketing practices they portrayed as predatory.

The credit card industry and its practices came under scrutiny at a session of the Senate Banking Committee. Several Democratic members of the panel are proposing legislation to require companies to provide more details to consumers on how long it will take them to pay off their debts if they make minimum monthly payments, and to rein in solicitations of college students.

Credit cards have become a ubiquitous and indispensable part of the culture, with an estimated 640 million cards in Americans' wallets and more than $1.8 trillion charged on them in 2005. Many depend on them to pay their bills and buy groceries or gasoline. But consumer groups and other critics say fees are excessive and information provided to consumers is confusing.

The banking industry maintains that credit cards are an essential element of the economy, providing convenience to consumers _ at flexible interest rates according to the risk of the holder. Industry officials have acknowledged that the disclosure material provided to consumers could be improved.

"I would like to put the credit card industry ... on notice," said Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., the committee's chairman. "If you currently engage in any business practice that you would be ashamed to discuss before this committee, I would strongly encourage you to cease and desist that practice."

Banks and other credit card issuers "should take a long, hard look at how you treat your customers," he said.

Dodd, one of several Democrats in the Senate who are seeking the party's presidential nomination in 2008, has put consumer issues on the committee's agenda for this year.

If the industry doesn't improve practices on its own, legislation may be needed, he indicated.

Dodd and other senators questioned a panel of witnesses that included executives of Chase Bank USA, Barclays Bank and Capital One Financial Corp.

The executives defended their practices as fair and responsible. Most customers pay their bills on time, and only a small proportion of them represent a risk of default and are subject to punitive measures, they said.

DOJ_NMG_0122551

Some members of the committee, mostly Republicans, said that while improved disclosure is needed, lawmakers should avoid imposing requirements or sanctions for the credit card industry that would amount to price controls.

"I think we should recognize that the market does work," said Sen. Bob Bennett, R-Utah.

A study by congressional investigators released in October found that fees for paying credit card bills late averaged $34, up from $13 in 1995, while some card issuers impose penalty interest rates of more than 30 percent on consumers who pay late or exceed the credit limit.

Among other practices cited at Thursday's hearing:

_Some credit card issuers use a billing method that charges interest on credit card debt already paid by the consumer.

_The massive solicitations mailed to consumers _ an estimated 6 billion in 2005 _ and targeting of college students and the elderly.

FCC To Feel Unfamiliar Heat From Democrats (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

As congressional Democrats prepare to give the Federal Communications Commission its toughest scrutiny in years, a rivalry between the powerful agency's two most prominent Republicans is raising questions about its readiness to handle barbed questions and stiff challenges.

The Republican-controlled FCC -- which makes far-reaching decisions on telephone, television, radio, Internet and other services that people use daily -- has sparred infrequently with Republican-controlled congresses. But the Democratic-run 110th Congress is about to heat up the grill, starting with a Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee hearing on Thursday.

Senators vow to press the chairman and four commissioners on matters such as media-ownership diversity, Internet access, broadcast decency standards and delays in resolving various issues. The hearing may cover the waterfront, Democratic staff members say, but there's little doubt that the agency will face a tone of questioning unseen in recent years.

"They've effectively emasculated any public-interest standards that existed" for radio and TV stations, said Sen. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.), a committee member who plans sharp questions on decency, media consolidation and other topics. "The entire Congress for years now has been devoid of any kind of oversight," he said, and the new Democratic majority is launching a process that will force the FCC to "beat a path to Capitol Hill to respond."

Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), a senior House Commerce Committee member, said he plans "comprehensive hearings on net neutrality" later this year. The term refers to measures barring telephone and cable service providers from charging Web-based companies for priority access to the Internet. Markey supports such proposals, while the FCC's Republican members generally oppose them.

FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin, a Republican with close ties to the Bush administration, will be the focus of Democrats' criticisms. But some industry analysts think those lawmakers may try to find an ally in Commissioner Robert M. McDowell, another young Republican loyalist with a reputation for intelligence and political ambition. The two have clashed on at least three significant issues in the past several months, creating what some see as a rift that could be ripe for exploitation.

"McDowell has been critical of Kevin Martin on a number of occasions," said industry analyst Blair Levin. Although both men are conservative Republicans, Levin said, their independence is partly explained by their different political bases -- Martin's in the Bush administration, McDowell's in Congress.

In the legal, lobbying and industrial circles that monitor the FCC, opinions vary on the severity of the Martin-McDowell rivalry.

Publicly, the two men have played down their differences and said they have a good working relationship. "The chairman and I have been friends for more than a decade," McDowell, 43, said in an interview. "We have a strong and durable relationship. . . . We will still have some differences, but we work together."

A spokeswoman for Martin, Tamara Lipper, said the two men "have a very good relationship."

The FCC's commissioners -- currently three Republicans and two Democrats -- are appointed by the president, confirmed by the Senate, and allowed to operate largely independently of each other. Intra-agency and intra-party feuds are not uncommon, and many analysts noted that Martin clashed with former chairman and fellow Republican Michael K. Powell.

"When Michael Powell was FCC chairman, Kevin Martin was viewed as the maverick Republican," said Philip J. Weiser, a law professor at the University of Colorado who specializes in telecommunications. "And now he has to deal with his own maverick Republican."

Martin, 40, and McDowell clashed even before McDowell arrived at the FCC in June. McDowell handed Martin a stinging setback by saying the FCC had no authority to require cable companies to carry additional digital broadcast channels, a key industry issue that Martin hoped to bring to a vote.

The two subsequently tangled on other issues, most notably the $85 billion merger between AT&T and BellSouth approved by the FCC last month. Martin needed McDowell's vote to break a deadlock. But McDowell effectively held the process up, insisting that he could not take part in a vote because he previously worked as a lobbyist for an association representing companies that competed against AT&T and BellSouth.

McDowell's sharp criticism of arguments in favor of a full commission vote were widely regarded as a rebuke of Martin. Ultimately, the merger was approved, but only after the companies made concessions sought by the two Democratic commissioners.

Martin, McDowell and their colleagues may need all the camaraderie and cohesion they can muster at next week's hearing. With Democrats now in control of Congress, Dorgan said, "the running room of the FCC is going to be limited."

A No Vote On Senate Raises Just Might Count (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — It is a Washington ritual. Almost every year a lawmaker proposes withholding the automatic annual cost-of-living pay increase from members of Congress in the name of fiscal responsibility and populist reform.

Some members vote for it, but the proposal usually fails. And even the reformers get their raise.

The Senate, at least, may be raising the price of such public displays of self-sacrifice. In the rush to pass a major ethics bill on Jan. 18, the Senate approved a provision that would deny the pay increase to any individual member who voted against it, even if it passed.

Last year, a senator would have lost $3,100 out of a salary of $165,200. (The Senate has delayed taking a pay increase this year until after it finishes debating whether to increase the federal minimum wage for the first time in nearly 10 years.)

The penalty for opposing the raise is the work of Senator James M. Inhofe, Republican of Oklahoma, who called votes against the increase “the greatest single hypocrisy every year.”

“All the press releases hit the home state,” he said in a speech last year introducing the idea. “And then, of course, it is defeated, and they end up taking the increase anyway.”

The idea is a rare attempt to punish lawmakers financially on the basis of how they vote. Could the Senate, for example, cut a member’s pay for a vote to increase the deficit? For one against a new minimum wage?

“It is a precedent that could lead to a slippery slope,” said Kenneth A. Gross, an expert on political law. But, he acknowledged, lawmakers voting against a raise “would have to put their money where their mouth is.”

The Democratic and Republican Senate leaders incorporated the measure into their bipartisan ethics proposal, and the Senate passed it by a vote of 96 to 2 without further discussion.

But in an interview this week a spokesman for the Senate rules committee suggested that a House and Senate conference might revisit the provision before it became law.

Tancredo: Abolish Race-based Caucuses (AP)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, January 26, 2007

White House hopeful Tom Tancredo said Thursday the existence of the Congressional Black Caucus and other race-based groups of lawmakers amount to segregation and should be abolished.

"It is utterly hypocritical for Congress to extol the virtues of a colorblind society while officially sanctioning caucuses that are based solely on race," said the Colorado Republican, who is most widely known as a vocal critic of illegal immigration.

"If we are serious about achieving the goal of a colorblind society, Congress should lead by example and end these divisive, race-based caucuses," said Tancredo, who is scheduled to pitch his long-shot presidential bid this weekend in New Hampshire.

One caucus member dismissed Tancredo's comments as sour grapes from a dethroned Republican _ who also happens to be running for president.

"This story is really about a member of the minority party using intolerance to advance his presidential campaign," said Rep. William Lacy Clay, D-Mo.

Tancredo's request, relayed in a letter to Administration Committee Chairwoman Juanita Millender-McDonald, D-Calif., revived his effort to change House rules to abolish the groups.

DOJ_NMG_0122553

Besides the Congressional Black Caucus, Democrats also have a Hispanic caucus with 21 members, and Republicans have a comparable Hispanic conference with five full members and 11 "associate" members who are not Hispanic.

The request comes in the wake of reports that freshman Rep. Stephen Cohen, D-Tenn., was refused admission to the Congressional Black Caucus because he is white. All 43 members of the caucus are black.

Cohen said in a statement that he told a reporter that he would be honored to join the caucus but did not apply, "nor has the CBC denied membership to me."

However, the group would not have permitted Cohen to join, its new chairwoman told The Associated Press. Rep. Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick, D-Mich., said the caucus decided early on that official membership would be restricted to blacks.

Tancredo is chairman of the Congressional Immigration Reform Caucus, which seeks to toughen border security to stem illegal immigration. He also opposes guest worker programs and immigration proposals by President Bush.

Tancredo: Ban Minority Caucuses (DENP)

By Anne C. Mulkern

Denver Post, January 26, 2007

Washington - Rep. Tom Tancredo called today for abolishment of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, Black Caucus and Asian Pacific American Caucus, saying they equal racial segregation

"It is utterly hypocritical for Congress to extol the virtues of a color-blind society while officially sanctioning caucuses that are based solely on race - and restrict their membership based on race," Tancredo wrote in a letter to Rep. Juanita Millender-McDonald, D-Calif., who oversees the caucuses.

Tancredo, a Littleton Republican who is considering a presidential run, first called in 2003 for a ban on the caucuses that are tied to ethnic groups. He pegged his renewed demand to a report in a Capitol Hill political newspaper that freshman Rep. Stephen Cohen (D-Tennessee) could not join the Congressional Black Caucus because he is white.

A spokesman for Cohen said "He never formally sought membership in the Congressional Black Caucus, nor has the Congressional Black Caucus denied membership to him," said Cohen's spokeswoman, Marilyn Dillihan.

Cohen, Dillihan said "really regrets that this is being used the way it's being used."

Whether Cohen officially asked to join or not is irrelevant, Tancredo spokesman, Carlos Espinosa, said. If he had asked to join, Espinosa said, he would not have been allowed.

"The policy is what's relevant here," Espinosa said.

Rep. John Salazar, D-Manassa, belongs to the Congressional Hispanic Caucus.

When Tancredo previously said the caucuses should be eliminated, a member of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus called that statement "more race-baiting" by Tancredo. The black, Hispanic and Asian-American caucuses exist because few members of Congress come from those racial groups and they need a unified voice, said Rep. Raul M. Grijalva, D-Ariz.

FEDERAL DIARY: Head Of TSP Moving On (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, January 26, 2007

His mission accomplished, the executive director at the Thrift Savings Plan has resigned to join a union-owned financial services holding company.

Gary A. Amelio, who developed a new retirement savings option to help federal employees diversify their investment portfolios, is joining ULLICO as president of retirement services. He will probably leave the agency early next month, a TSP spokesman said.

Amelio expanded TSP investment options in 2005 by adding life-cycle funds as a way to help federal employees who are too busy to monitor their savings or do not feel comfortable making investment decisions. The L Funds, as they are called, permit TSP participants to select an investment mix linked to the time they expect to draw down their savings. The funds rely on asset allocation models that professional managers have determined can produce the maximum returns for the minimum risk.

During his 3 1/2 -year stint with the TSP, Amelio resolved problems that had delayed a new computer system that keeps track of accounts on a daily basis and introduced a toll-free telephone service. The TSP is one of the world's largest retirement plans, with about $206 billion in assets.

In accepting the resignation, Andrew M. Saul, the chairman of the Federal Retirement Thrift Investment Board, praised Amelio for upgrading TSP operations. A recent survey of TSP participants showed that 85 percent are satisfied with the retirement plan, a sign that Amelio's changes have been well received, Saul said.

Mark E. Singleton, the president and chief executive at ULLICO, said the union-owned company manages about $4.6 billion in pension assets and will look to Amelio to expand retirement services to meet the needs of union members, especially baby boomers who will be leaving the workforce in the next few years. ULLICO dates back to 1927, when it began offering life insurance to construction workers.Settlement at Social Security

A settlement has been reached in a case brought by the Social Security Administration's inspector general against four employees in the agency's Des Moines office, the National Treasury Employees Union has announced.

Colleen M. Kelley, the union president, said the inspector general had withdrawn charges against the employees and agreed not to undertake any other action against them.

The union recently filed a grievance on behalf of the employees, contending they had followed the orders of an administrative law judge in preparing decisions in 700 cases that granted Social Security disability benefits to claimants.

The inspector general's office had questioned the reproduction of evidence from one disability case for use in 700 cases handled by the Des Moines office in recent years, apparently to speed up claims processing. The inspector general was pursuing civil penalties against the employees, and a $215,000 fine had been proposed for one worker. The judge in charge of the cases died in 2003.

The employees, as part of the settlement, will cooperate in a review of "this misguided attempt to streamline the appeals process," Jonathan L. Lasher, a deputy chief counsel for the inspector general, said in a statement. Interviews with the employees will be the first step in a new audit focused on disability adjudication policies and practices, he said.

Kelley said the settlement showed that "these employees did nothing wrong. It is outrageous that the inspector general used his considerable authority to put these employees in fear of losing, not only their jobs, but their life savings, when all they were doing was carrying out the job duties as directed by their supervisor."Talk Shows

Beth Moten, director of the American Federation of Government Employees Legislative and Political Affairs Department, outlines the union's goals in Congress on "Inside Government" at 10 a.m. today on http://Federalnewsradio.com and WFED (1050 AM).

R. Allen Pittman, assistant secretary for human resources and administration and the chief human capital officer at the Veterans Affairs Department, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. tomorrow on WJFK (106.7 FM).

Ginsburg 'Lonely' Without O'Connor (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON — It's been a year since Sandra Day O'Connor retired from the Supreme Court after a quarter-century tenure and left Ruth Bader Ginsburg as the lone woman on the nine-member court. Although it's unclear how O'Connor's departure will affect the law, this much is certain: Ginsburg misses her friend, and worries about the message court visitors get when they see only one woman on the bench.

"The word I would use to describe my position on the bench is lonely," Ginsburg, 73, said in an interview with USA TODAY.

ONE-WOMAN COURT: Composition in contrast to gains elsewhere

"This is how it was for Sandra's first 12 years," she said, citing the time from O'Connor's appointment in 1981 to Ginsburg's arrival in 1993. "Neither of us ever thought this would happen again. I didn't realize how much I would miss her until she was gone."

A year after Ginsburg joined the court, O'Connor recalled welcoming the new justice "with enormous pleasure," in part because O'Connor no longer would be the court's only symbolic representative for American women. They confided in each other, and when Ginsburg had surgery for colorectal cancer in 1999, O'Connor, a breast cancer survivor, was the first person to call her in the hospital.

O'Connor, a Reagan appointee, was at the ideological center of the divided court, a key backer of abortion rights and affirmative action in education. President Bush tried to replace her with a woman, then-White House counsel Harriet Miers, but the nomination died amid questions about her qualifications. Bush turned to Samuel Alito, whose record suggests he could tilt the court to the right.

The justices are weighing cases on abortion and school integration. Ginsburg, a Clinton appointee on the court's liberal wing, won't discuss how O'Connor's exit will change the court, saying only, "This term may be very revealing."

For now, O'Connor's absence is more symbolic. In court, the sight of Ginsburg — a slight figure in a tall, black leather chair, flanked by eight men — contrasts with the rising prominence of women in Congress. The number of female judges also is rising: Of the 875 federal judges, 201 are women.

Ginsburg is encouraged by such numbers, but disconcerted by the look of her own court. She said with O'Connor, the message was: "Here are two women. They don't look alike. They don't always vote alike. But here are two women." The former women's rights lawyer fears the message now is that a woman justice is a "one-at-a-time curiosity, not the normal thing."

High Court Just A 1-woman Show (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON — When Louisiana teacher Stephanie Goodrich began a session with her eighth-grade honors class on the Supreme Court this month, she showed them a picture of the nine justices.

"They said, 'Could there be only one lady on the court?' " recalled Goodrich, who is in her 15th year teaching in the Alexandria, La., school district. Goodrich said her students are used to seeing women in key government positions. Louisiana has a female governor, Kathleen Blanco; one of its two U.S. senators is Mary Landrieu.

The makeup of the nation's highest court contrasts sharply with that of Congress and the rest of the U.S. judiciary, where women have made historical gains. After she was elected as the first female speaker of the House, California Democrat Nancy Pelosi declared that women had "broken the marble ceiling" in Congress.

Meanwhile, the number of women serving as federal judges across the nation has soared since 1977. Before Jimmy Carter became president, eight women had been appointed to federal judgeships in U.S. history. There now are 201 women on the 875-member federal bench.

Back at the Supreme Court, however, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, 73, is acknowledging her discontent with being the lone woman on the court. Since Sandra Day O'Connor was replaced by Samuel Alito a year ago, Ginsburg has worried about the symbolism of having just one woman on the court.

The message of the court's current makeup, Ginsburg says, is that a female jurist is "aberrational," when "if you look at courts generally, women are well represented."

"Having only one of nine judges with a woman's experience definitely seems out of date," said Celinda Lake, a Democratic strategist and pollster. "People don't want a woman just for a woman's sake, but they do respond to the argument that women bring a certain experience."

President Bush tried replacing O'Connor with a woman, nominating then-White House counsel Harriet Miers for the seat. However, Miers withdrew under criticism about her qualifications and conservatism, and the post went to Alito.

Alito's comments in court have suggested he might help move the bench toward the right on matters such as abortion rights and affirmative action in education. O'Connor was a key vote in supporting both.

Ginsburg, a member of the court's liberal wing, also supports abortion rights and affirmative action. However, her concern about the court's makeup is rooted more in a desire for jurists who have experienced American life as women than for those who would agree with her on the law. Ginsburg and O'Connor — who regularly voted with the court's conservative wing — often did not agree on cases.

Beyond the legal issues, analysts disagree about the significance of having just one woman on the Supreme Court.

Lee Arbetman, director of U.S. programs for Street Law, a non-profit organization that works with high school social studies teachers, said diversity in positions of power offers all students role models and builds confidence in the institution.

"There aren't men's outcomes and women's outcomes in (court) cases," he said. "But there is value in the different experiences men and women bring to the court. Women experience some aspects of the world differently, just as people of color experience some aspects of the world differently."

The court has only one member of a racial minority, Clarence Thomas. He was the second black justice appointed to the court, after the late Thurgood Marshall, who served from 1967 to 1991.

In the fall of 2005, when Bush nominated Alito to succeed O'Connor, few Americans seemed to care that a man would replace the first female justice. A USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll just before the nomination indicated that 15% of the respondents said it was "essential" to nominate a woman; 33% said it was a "good idea; not essential," and 49% said it "doesn't matter."

The conservative American Enterprise Institute's Karlyn Bowman, who specializes in opinion polls, said that "men and women thought it would be nice, but that it should not be determinative." Bowman said that when it comes to establishing role models for young people, gender diversity is not as important as it was in earlier decades. "We are past that for young women, because women have risen to leadership positions" in many fields.

Sheila Krumholz, executive director of the Center for Responsive Politics, said she believes it still matters to girls. And for women in important jobs, "having other woman around is liberating. It's no longer all eyes on you."

In Louisiana, Goodrich said her students have indicated they believe the most qualified people should be on the high court, irrespective of their sex.

Goodrich said the girls in her class sympathize with Ginsburg. They "said they felt sorry for Justice Ginsburg, being the only one," Goodrich said. "One girl said, 'She kind of carries the weight of all the ladies. At least when there were two ladies on the court, she had backup.' "

DOJ_NMG_0122556

When Ginsburg was told of the girl's comment, she said, "That is very insightful."

Inside The Beltway (WT)

The Washington Times, January 26, 2007

'The War'

There was barely a dry eye in the house when Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson played host this week to a special screening by acclaimed filmmakers Ken Burns and Lynn Novick.

Mr. Burns and his longtime collaborator, best known for their documentaries "The Civil War," "Baseball" and "Jazz," have just completed "The War," a 14-hour documentary on World War II slated to air on PBS in September.

Mr. Nicholson's invited guests for the 45-minute sneak preview of "The War" included 25 veterans of the "Greatest Generation," who told Inside the Beltway that they were "thrilled" and "moved to tears" that the filmmakers had chosen World War II as the topic for their latest documentary.

Personal sermon

"Oh yes, things are quieting down," a somewhat relieved the Rev. Art Smith, pastor of St. Thomas Aquinas Catholic Church in Buffalo, N.Y., told Inside the Beltway by telephone yesterday, after New York Rep. Brian Higgins and his family abruptly walked out of Mass there on Sunday.

The Democrat received what was described as a public tongue-lashing from the pulpit by deacon Tom McDonnell because of his support for embryonic stem-cell research.

"Everybody has their own version to the story," Father Smith told us yesterday, assuring us that he was not trying to downplay the "emotion of the situation."

The pastor, who more than a decade ago worked in television for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops in Washington, has been sharply critical of the deacon's sermon. Indeed, Father Smith took to the pulpit and apologized to the congregation.

In addition, Buffalo Bishop Edward U. Kmiec has issued a statement critical of Mr. McDonnell's personal attack, saying no member of the congregation, congressman or otherwise, should be confronted from the holy altar.

Mr. Higgins gave Inside the Beltway the following statement yesterday: "On the incident itself — I never apologized for leaving the church service last Sunday. ... Under the circumstances, leaving was the appropriate thing to do."

Ouch!

As House Republicans continue to draft a new battle plan at their annual legislative retreat on Maryland's Eastern Shore, they might keep in the back of their minds an observation from Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, who commented this week about the November elections and the subsequent shift of power on Capitol Hill: "The Republicans never knew what hit them."

Spilling to Sidey

First lady Laura Bush today will host the debut of the Hugh S. Sidey Scholarship for Print Journalism at the White House. The legendary Time magazine correspondent was a favorite of the entire Bush family, and nobody could get the family members to reveal their true, inner feelings better than he.

Take the time shortly before his untimely death in November 2005, when Mr. Sidey, who covered the White House for decades, was invited into the Houston living room of former President George Bush and Mrs. Bush to chat about the second presidential term of their son, George W. Bush.

Mr. Bush: "Kitty Kelley. Did you see where somebody handed her her hat the other night, the Washingtonian? [The notorious Washington author's name was dropped from the magazine's masthead.] I loved that."

Mrs. Bush: "Remember when Ann Richards said George Bush was born with a silver foot in his mouth? And then when George beat her in his first run for governor — I must say I felt a certain sense of joy that he finally had kind of taken her down. I could go around saying, 'We showed her what she could do with that silver foot, where she could stick that now.' "

Mr. Bush: "Michael Moore's got to be the worst for me. I mean, he's such a slimeball and so atrocious. But I love the fact now that the Democrats are not embracing him as theirs anymore."

Mrs. Bush: "[President Bush] knows we're the only two people in America who are awake at 6 in the morning. He calls from the Oval Office to talk to George, and we put him on speakerphone."

Mr. Bush: "The thing that was perhaps the most hurtful to me was the theme that the president doesn't know what he's doing, that he's dumb, that he's some know-nothing cowboy from Texas. And when I sat with him, as I did out at Camp David, at Crawford, and heard him with the intelligence people, talking about the world and asking the appropriate questions — what's the development in this country or that — I was surprised at how broad the vision and grasp are. But he gets no credit for that."

Stealthy Maneuver: The CIA Captures An A-12 Blackbird (WSJ)

By Jonathan Karp

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

The Central Intelligence Agency is closing in on a high-value landscaping target: a 1960s spy plane called the A-12 Blackbird.

The CIA plans to mount the once-secret, 102-foot-long supersonic plane on a pole at its Langley, Va., headquarters in time for the agency's 60th anniversary in September. The jet chosen for the mission is a particularly well-preserved specimen that has been at the Minnesota Air Guard Museum, next to the Minneapolis-St. Paul airport, since 1991.

Even though a moving crew began the 10-day process of dismantling the spy plane this week, volunteers who painstakingly restored it at their own expense are continuing to oppose what they consider a hijacking. Their pleas for mercy, backed by the governor and entire Minnesota congressional delegation, have fallen on deaf ears.

"Possession is nine-tenths of the law, so until they drag it away with me screaming, we have a chance," said James Goodall, an aviation buff and retired Minnesota National Guardsman who salvaged the plane and led efforts to preserve it.

The A-12 Blackbird, retired in 1968, was the forerunner to the better-known SR-71 Blackbird. The stealthy A-12 is one of the fastest aircraft ever made, capable of flying at more than three times the speed of sound and at the edge of space. The plane originated as part of a CIA program code-named "Oxcart." Of the 15 A-12s built by Lockheed Martin Corp.'s famed Skunk Works advanced projects unit, nine remain. One is on display at an Air Force base, and the others are at museums around the country.

Mr. Goodall and his supporters don't question the right of the Air Force, which controls these decommissioned warplanes, to reclaim an A-12 and lend it to the CIA as an oversize lawn ornament inside the agency compound. Instead, their two-month dogfight has been aimed at getting the Air Force to justify removing the Minnesota museum's crown jewel while three A-12s sit in Alabama, including one that has been neglected since suffering hurricane damage. Another is parked on the USS Intrepid aircraft carrier, a floating Manhattan museum that will be closed until late next year because of renovation work across the Hudson River.

The CIA, whose headquarters isn't open to the public, had no role in selecting which plane it would receive. The Air Force says the Minnesota Air National Guard doesn't have a historical connection to the A-12, and though the Minnesotans have taken good care of their A-12, the volunteer-run museum doesn't meet the Air Force's current legal requirements for its museums. For one thing, it doesn't have a salaried director. After reviewing all nine A-12s, "The only one that didn't have a legitimate rationale for its location was Minnesota's," said Terry Aitken, senior curator at the National Museum of the U.S. Air Force.

That logic outrages Mr. Goodall, 61 years old, who spent 20 years in the Minnesota Air National Guard and his entire adult life smitten with the A-12. He says he became an "airplane nut" at age 5 when he saw a squadron of B-36 bombers flying over San Francisco Bay. He first glimpsed a Blackbird as an 18-year-old Air Force recruit at Edwards Air Force Base in California. It was March 10, 1964, and "it affected me forever," he says.

Over the years, Mr. Goodall became an expert, writing five books on the supersonic plane. He built a rapport with Ben Rich, who developed the Blackbird for Lockheed and eventually ran Skunk Works. Mr. Goodall says he got a tip from Mr. Rich in 1989 that the Blackbird program would be canceled. "If anyone can scrounge one, you can," he says the late Mr. Rich told him.

At the time, Mr. Goodall was the staff historian for the 133rd Airlift Wing of the Minnesota Air National Guard. He hatched a scheme to rescue an A-12 from the scrapheap in Palmdale, Calif. In 1990, Minnesota's congressional delegation backed the Air Guard museum's request, citing the fact that companies in Minnesota supplied key Blackbird components and that some Blackbird pilots hailed from the state.

The Air Force was happy to unload the A-12 to avoid a costly process of destroying the asbestos-packed plane. Once the Air Force museum agreed to the loan, Mr. Goodall arranged for two massive cargo planes from the New York Air National Guard to haul the Blackbird in pieces from California. He persuaded a local hotel to put up the flight and moving crews free of charge for 10 days. "The Air Force estimated the move would cost $500,000. I got it done for $27,000. That makes me the deal-of-the-century guy," Mr. Goodall says.

Back in St. Paul, he marshaled volunteers and corporate donations for restoration work. He then spent years -- and thousands of his own dollars, he says -- scrounging for cockpit instruments, at one point swapping a prized ejection seat from his private collection to get a supersonic speedometer known as a Mach meter.

All was well until last November, when the museum got a letter from Mr. Aitken, the Air Force museum curator, invoking a provision of the loan agreement that allows the Air Force to reclaim its plane by giving 60 days' notice. The only reason Mr. Aitken cited for the decision was the need to "satisfy current exhibit requirements."

Distressed local Air Guard commanders appealed to save the A-12, calling it a "labor of love." Mr. Aitken replied that the plane didn't conform to the air park's primary mission, which is to commemorate the state guard wing's history, and said it would be better suited at the CIA. Mr. Goodall, who is now retired in Seattle but returns to the Twin Cities occasionally to visit his beloved Blackbird, energized the opposition movement by urging guardsmen and the museum's civilian nonprofit foundation to enlist Minnesota and national politicians. He also mobilized support from former A-12 pilots.

Mr. Goodall's plea: If the Air Force wants a plane to commemorate the CIA's pioneering past, it should take one that actually flew in combat. Minnesota's plane never saw action. The A-12 in Birmingham, Ala., on the other hand, photographed North Vietnamese surface-to-air missile sites in 1967, later sustained flak damage, and flew over North Korea on a spy mission in 1968 after the North Koreans captured the USS Pueblo, claiming the Navy ship had strayed into its territorial waters.

Some Minnesotans are upset that the Air Force gave short notice and didn't offer to discuss its A-12 plans. "This is a museum, a community, not a war game," said Mark Ness, vice chairman of the museum foundation and a retired Air National Guard brigadier general. Mr. Goodall knew the odds were long. The Air Force has plucked other planes despite local resistance, including a B-36 bomber taken from Fort Worth, Texas, and the celebrated World War II B-17, the Memphis Belle, from its namesake city in Tennessee.

Even as another joint appeal from Minnesota's congressional delegation was delivered to the Air Force secretary Friday, the Air Force museum told guardsmen in Minneapolis-St. Paul to prepare for the movers.

The Minnesota museum's supporters have retained a former state supreme court justice as their lawyer, but as the moving crew continued to unbolt the A-12's wings yesterday, they had yet to decide whether to seek a court injunction against the move. Mr. Goodall, who refers to the plane as "my A-12," has made his own unilateral sortie. He has removed some cockpit instruments he had donated. "No one will see them anyway if the plane is on a pole," he says. "I'll be damned if the CIA...will get their hands on these."

On Being Partisan (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

American politics is ugly these days, and many people wish things were different. For example, Barack Obama recently lamented the fact that “politics has become so bitter and partisan” — which it certainly has.

But he then went on to say that partisanship is why “we can’t tackle the big problems that demand solutions. And that’s what we have to change first.” Um, no. If history is any guide, what we need are political leaders willing to tackle the big problems despite bitter partisan opposition. If all goes well, we’ll eventually have a new era of bipartisanship — but that will be the end of the story, not the beginning.

Or to put it another way: what we need now is another F.D.R., not another Dwight Eisenhower.

You see, the nastiness of modern American politics isn’t the result of a random outbreak of bad manners. It’s a symptom of deeper factors — mainly the growing polarization of our economy. And history says that we’ll see a return to bipartisanship only if and when that economic polarization is reversed.

After all, American politics has been nasty in the past. Before the New Deal, America was a nation with a vast gap between the rich and everyone else, and this gap was reflected in a sharp political divide. The Republican Party, in effect, represented the interests of the economic elite, and the Democratic Party, in an often confused way, represented the populist alternative.

In that divided political system, the Democrats probably came much closer to representing the interests of the typical American. But the G.O.P.’s advantage in money, and the superior organization that money bought, usually allowed it to dominate national politics. “I am not a member of any organized party,” Will Rogers said. “I am a Democrat.”

Then came the New Deal. I urge Mr. Obama — and everyone else who thinks that good will alone is enough to change the tone of our politics — to read the speeches of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, the quintessential example of a president who tackled big problems that demanded solutions.

For the fact is that F.D.R. faced fierce opposition as he created the institutions — Social Security, unemployment insurance, more progressive taxation and beyond — that helped alleviate inequality. And he didn’t shy away from confrontation.

“We had to struggle,” he declared in 1936, “with the old enemies of peace — business and financial monopoly, speculation, reckless banking, class antagonism, sectionalism, war profiteering. ... Never before in all our history have these forces been so united against one candidate as they stand today. They are unanimous in their hate for me — and I welcome their hatred.”

It was only after F.D.R. had created a more equal society, and the old class warriors of the G.O.P. were replaced by “modern Republicans” who accepted the New Deal, that bipartisanship began to prevail.

The history of the last few decades has basically been the story of the New Deal in reverse. Income inequality has returned to levels not seen since the pre-New Deal era, and so have political divisions in Congress as the Republicans have moved right, once again becoming the party of the economic elite. The signature domestic policy initiatives of the Bush administration have been attempts to undo F.D.R.'s legacy, from slashing taxes on the rich to privatizing Social Security. And a bitter partisan gap has opened up between the G.O.P. and Democrats, who have tried to defend that legacy.

What about the smear campaigns, like Karl Rove's 2005 declaration that after 9/11 liberals wanted to "offer therapy and understanding for our attackers"? Well, they're reminiscent of the vicious anti-Catholic propaganda used to defeat Al Smith in 1928: smear tactics are what a well-organized, well-financed party with a fundamentally unpopular domestic agenda uses to change the subject.

So am I calling for partisanship for its own sake? Certainly not. By all means pass legislation, if you can, with plenty of votes from the other party: the Social Security Act of 1935 received 77 Republican votes in the House, about the same as the number of Republicans who recently voted for a minimum wage increase.

But politicians who try to push forward the elements of a new New Deal, especially universal health care, are sure to face the hatred of a large bloc on the right — and they should welcome that hatred, not fear it.

Home Sales Slipped In December (LAT)

By Jesus Sanchez

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2007

Nationwide sales of existing homes sagged in December, contributing to the steepest drop in annual sales in nearly 20 years, according to a real estate report today.

Total existing-home sales — including detached houses and condominiums — in December slipped 0.8% from the previous month to a seasonally adjusted, annual rate of 6.22 million units, according to the National Assn. of Realtors.

For the year, existing home sales totaled 6.48 million properties — the third best year for home sales. However, last year's results represented an 8.4% decline from record high sales in 2005. It was the biggest annual drop since 1989, when sales declined 14.8%, according to the Associated Press.

Despite the sales slide, NAR chief economist David Lereah said a decline in the number of homes available for sale at the end of last year and other data suggested that the housing market might be bottoming out after a lengthy slow down.

"It looks like we're moving beyond the low for the housing cycle last fall, and buyers are responding to historically low interest rates and competitive pricing by home sellers," said Lereah said in a statement. "In addition, a tightening inventory of homes on the market is supporting prices."

Prices, after surging up in recent years, also remained relatively flat at the end of last year. In December, the national median sales price remained unchanged from the same month in 2005 at $222,000 (The median is a typical market price where half of the homes sold for more and half sold for less). For all of 2006, the median price was also $222,000, up 1.1 percent from a median of $219,600 in 2005.

In California, sales of existing homes (excluding condominiums) fell 15.3% in December on a year-over-year basis to a seasonally adjusted, annual pace of 450,550 properties, according to the California Assn. of Realtors. The median sales price, meanwhile, rose 3.7% during the same period to $547,400.

The median number of days it took to sell a single-family home was 73 days in December 2006, compared with a revised 43 days in December 2005.

"The market continues to level out as buyers and sellers search for common ground in today's more balanced environment," said Colleen Badagliacco, president of the state association, in a statement. "The number of homes for sale peaked in June and July and has since edged downward. Although time on the market remains higher than it was a year ago, competitively priced homes continue to sell well."

Existing-Home Sales Plunge, But Pace Is Expected To Ease (WSJ)

By Michael Corkery

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

Homes sales in 2006 tumbled at the fastest pace in 17 years, although economists believe the worst of the housing correction may have passed and sales could start to rebound later this year.

The National Association of Realtors said sales of existing, or previously owned, homes fell 0.8% in December from the previous month to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.22 million units. For all of 2006, sales of existing homes totaled 6.48 million. That was down 8.4% from 2005 and was the largest annual decline since 1989, when rising interest rates and relatively high unemployment fueled a housing recession.

Even after last year's sharp drop, 2006 was the third-strongest year for home sales since the NAR began tracking sales in 1968. And prices managed to move slightly higher in 2006; the existing-home median price was up 1.1% to $222,000.

"We have to remember how strong and some might say overheated the housing market was in 2005 in terms of sales and investor demand," said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist of PNC Financial Services Group in Pittsburgh. Last year showed a big drop as a whole "but to a level that frankly is still reasonably active with over six million home sales."

Sales of condominiums and cooperatives led the decline for the year, falling 10.4% to 803,000 units. Sales of single-family homes were off 8.1% to 5.68 million. However, data for the month of December suggested that the condominium market may be starting to recover, and at a faster pace than the market for single-family homes. Condominium sales rose 2.1% in December compared with the previous month as sales of single-family homes declined 1.3%.

Although sales were down across the nation in December, the biggest year-over-year declines occurred in the West, where sales plunged 15.5%. December sales were down 7.1% in the South from a year earlier, 5.5% in the Northeast and 5.8% in the Midwest.

For 2007, many economists predict that sales will continue to fall, but at a more modest pace and with most of the decline occurring in the first half of the year. "The biggest drop is probably behind us," said Fannie Mae's chief economist, David Berson. "But it's still too soon to say this is unambiguously the bottom."

Forecasts for 2007 vary widely. David Lereah, NAR's chief economist, foresees a modest sales decline of 1.2% this year. Mr. Berson expects existing-home sales to drop 7% to 8%.

Steven Wieting, an economist at Citigroup, said that while the housing market is showing some signs of stabilizing, a significant slowdown in housing-related industries like furniture and appliances may yet come. "Everything in a housing cycle doesn't turn at once," he said. "Lagging indicators will weaken as much as the leading indicators already did."

Separately, the Labor Department reported that new claims for unemployment insurance jumped 36,000 to 325,000 in the week ended Jan. 20. Claims had been below the 300,000 level -- which economists consider a benchmark for very tight labor markets -- the previous two weeks. The Jan. 13 reading was revised to 289,000 from a previously reported level of 290,000.

Sales Of Existing Homes In ’06 Had Biggest Drop In 17 Years (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 (AP) — Sales of existing homes fell last month, closing out a year when demand for homes slumped by the largest amount in 17 years.

The National Association of Realtors reported that sales of existing homes were down 0.8 percent in December, a bigger decline than had been expected. For the year, sales fell by 8.4 percent, the biggest annual decline since 1989, when sales of existing homes fell by 14.8 percent.

Even with the sharp decline in sales last year, the median price of an existing home sold in 2006 managed to rise 1.1 percent. But that was far below the double-digit gains during the boom years. The median home price rose by 12.4 percent in 2005.

Economists said they believed that the low point for housing had been reached, and they were forecasting a slow rebound in 2007. Because of that optimism, analysts say they do not believe the slump in housing will drag the overall economy into a recession.

The 0.8 percent drop in sales in December came after two straight months of improving sales, the first back-to-back sales gains since the spring of 2005.

David Lereah, chief economist for the Realtors, said that he believes that sales of existing homes have hit bottom and will start to gradually improve.

He said that in 2005, 40 percent of the market represented purchases of second homes and investors buying homes looking to resell them for quick profits.

He said speculators had now left the market and that should leave sales at a more sustainable level.

In other economics news, the number of Americans filing applications for unemployment benefits shot up last week by the largest amount in 16 months, reversing two weeks of big declines.

DOJ_NMG_0122561

The Labor Department reported that 325,000 newly laid-off workers filed claims for jobless benefits last week, an increase of 36,000 from the previous week. That was the biggest one-week rise since a surge of 96,000 claims the week of Sept. 10, 2005, when devastated Gulf Coast businesses laid off workers after Hurricane Katrina.

Home Sales Down 8.4%, Could Be At Bottom (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, January 26, 2007

Sales of existing homes slid 8.4% last year, the steepest fall in 17 years, but the market probably hit bottom in September and is entering a slow recovery that will last until June, the National Association of Realtors said Thursday.

One sign the market could revive this year is that the median home price, which had fallen for four months, was unchanged at $222,000 in December and was up 1.1% for all of 2006. And though it's still a buyer's market in most of the USA, the 7.3-month glut of homes for sale in November shrank to 6.8 months.

"It looks like we are on the bottom, and we will be scraping bottom as we move along," said David Lereah, the NAR's chief economist. "The worst is over for existing-home sales, but I'm still troubled about new homes."

The Commerce Department will release new-home sales today. Those sales are expected to be down 17% for 2006 and to fall a further 9.7% this year, Lereah says.

Not everyone is ready to herald the end of the correction for existing homes. From November to December, they note, sales fell 0.8%, ending a two-month upward trend. December sales were off 7.9% from December 2005. "It's very premature at this point to jump to the conclusion that we've turned the corner," says Brian Bethune of Global Insight.

Buyers are also facing rising interest rates, which make mortgages harder for some to afford. The average rate on a 30-year fixed-rate loan crept up to 6.25% last week, the highest since early November, Freddie Mac said. Each quarter-point increase makes homes unaffordable for about 50,000 more people, Lereah said.

Still, most economists say the bottom has probably been reached.

"Is the worst behind us? Most likely," says Joel Naroff, chief economist of Naroff Economic Advisors. "Are better times here? Doubtful."

During the last housing correction, in 1989, sales tumbled nearly 15%. This time, an overall healthy economy is cushioning the blow.

In areas that never overheated during the boom, such as parts of Texas and North Carolina, home sales are still setting modest records. The housing markets that were the hottest — especially Florida and California — are where the cooling-off will take the longest.

In Florida, sales in December plummeted 28% from the year before, and prices dropped in five metro areas. In California, sales skidded 15%; prices were down in 13 metro areas of the state.

Sales last year in California, where the median-priced home costs a gasp-inducing $567,690, were the lowest in a decade. They are projected to fall a further 7% this year. Robert Kleinhenz, an economist for the California Association of Realtors, said, "I'm hopeful we'll see the bottom soon."

Annual Existing-Home Sales Fall Most In 17 Years (WP)

By Dina Elboghdady

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

Sales of previously owned homes fell slightly in December after two consecutive months of modest gains but took their steepest annual drop since 1989, the National Association of Realtors reported yesterday.

But home prices rose 1.1 percent for the year, and the supply of existing single-family houses, townhouses, condominiums and co-ops for sale shrank from November to December -- offering some hope that the housing market may be on the mend, economists said.

However, stock and bond markets fell on concern that these numbers indicated that housing problems may not be over.

"During the summer, the housing market was like a trauma patient being wheeled in with multiple wounds," said Michael Larson, a real estate analyst for Weiss Research. "There's some momentum back in the market, but I don't think the patient will get off the gurney and walk out the door any time soon."

In 2006, 6.48 million existing homes were sold, down 8.4 percent from 2005, which was the busiest year on record. The drop was the steepest since 1989, when sales fell 14.8 percent from the year before.

In December, existing homes sold at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.22 million, down 0.8 percent from November and down 7.9 percent from December 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0122562

Todd Vencil, a real estate analyst at BB&T Capital Markets, said he is relieved to see the rate of sales stabilizing in the 6.2 million to 6.3 million range in recent months after peaking at 7.27 million in June 2005.

"We look for up trends, down trends and sideways trends," Vencil said. "We seem to be in a sideways trend now, which is fine because it indicates there's stabilization, and stabilization today will allow for recovery later in the year."

David Lereah, the National Association of Realtors' chief economist, said he saw good news in the numbers, most notably in home prices.

The median price of a home in December was $222,000, unchanged from December 2005. The median price for all of 2006 was up 1.1 from the previous year, also to $222,000, meaning that half of buyers in 2006 paid more and half paid less.

"All the doomsayers were saying the bubble was going to burst, and it never did in 2006," Lereah said. "We had price increases."

But there's a more muddled picture when it comes to the supply of homes on the market.

The inventory fell 7.9 percent in December from November. If no more homes are added to the mix, there's a 6.8-month supply of existing homes for sale.

That shrinkage is typical in the slow winter months, when sellers tend to pull their homes off the market before re-listing them in the spring, many analysts said.

Instead, some analysts pointed to the year-over-year increase in supply. Inventory climbed 23.3 percent from December 2005 to December 2006. Until that supply dwindles substantially, home prices will drop well into the future, said Nishu Sood, an analyst at Deutsche Bank Securities. "Demand remains fairly weak, and we're likely to see home prices decrease more significantly during the spring selling season," Sood said.

Sood dismisses the price increase for 2006 as insignificant because it factors in numbers from the beginning of the year, when prices were still doing well.

In December, existing-home sales, which account for most home sales, fell 15.5 percent in the West, 7.1 percent in the South, 5.8 percent in the Midwest and 5.5 percent in the Northeast. The South includes the Washington area.

The report released yesterday did not include the sales of newly built homes; the government is scheduled to announce that statistic today. But sales of new homes also appear weak based on the recent earnings reports from builders.

Yesterday, NVR, the parent company of Ryan Homes, reported that profit fell 39 percent in the fourth quarter compared with a year earlier. The Reston company posted revenue of $1.6 billion, down 2 percent.

Fed's View: Steady But Set To Boost (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Surprisingly solid economic growth hasn't only persuaded investors that the Fed won't cut interest rates, it also has prompted some to predict that an overheating economy will trigger rate increases before long.

Fed officials don't appear to share that view -- at least not yet. They believe the housing downturn has yet to show its full impact on the economy. As it does, they expect growth to remain slow and unemployment to rise, hastening the recent downtrend in inflation, which is now running roughly from 2.2% to 2.6%, excluding food and energy. Indeed, officials are more comfortable about inflation than they were two months ago.

In spite of that, the Fed, at the end of its policy meeting Wednesday, is likely to reaffirm its "bias" toward raising rates rather than lowering them, citing inflation concerns. It is almost certain to leave its target for short-term interest rates unchanged at 5.25%. The Fed has maintained that target and its "tightening bias" since June.

There are several reasons the Fed is likely to signal inflation concerns for at least one more meeting. Some officials believe that even if underlying inflation is coming down, it is still unacceptably high. Because they are uncertain how much further it will fall, they believe the Fed, to keep the public from expecting higher inflation, should be biased toward raising rates.

The second, and potentially more important reason, is that the job market, unlike the rest of the economy, is stronger than expected. The longer unemployment stays low, the greater the likelihood that fear of accelerating wages and prices will prompt officials to contemplate an interest-rate increase.

Janet Yellen, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco, said in a speech this week that there is "an emerging puzzle in the data: Why is the labor market apparently going gangbusters, while growth ... has turned in only a middling performance on average in recent quarters?" Her puzzlement is shared by some of her colleagues.

When the economy grows at its long-term "potential" rate, which is thought to be a little under 3%, it creates just enough jobs to employ new entrants to the labor market, and the unemployment rate is steady. But last year, as growth fell below 3% in the spring, the unemployment rate declined steadily, from 4.7% in the first quarter to 4.5% in the fourth.

Ms. Yellen said one worrisome explanation may be that either the economy's potential growth rate is notably slower than 3%, or that growth is stronger than the official data now show. In either case, the economy could face tighter capacity constraints than first thought, stoking inflation pressure.

Ms. Yellen said a likelier explanation is that the job market has simply lagged behind the overall economy, and unemployment will soon move higher. Other officials agree, noting in particular that construction employment seems bound to decline more.

In early December, economists thought the economy would grow at an annual rate of 2% in the fourth quarter, according to a survey by forecasting company Macroeconomic Advisers LLC, following growth rates of 2% in the third quarter and 2.6% in the second. Many analysts said the Fed could shift to a "neutral" bias -- that is, saying rates were equally likely to go up or down -- at next week's meeting. Futures markets expected three to four quarter-percentage-point rate cuts this year.

Since December, however, trade, housing starts, employment and manufacturing activity all have proved stronger than expected, and growth is now thought to have hit 3% in the fourth quarter. While the consensus forecast is for first-quarter growth of around 2.5%, that, too, is rising; Morgan Stanley expects 3.5%. Housing remains a drag on the economy, but trade and consumer spending, fueled by job growth and lower oil prices, have compensated. Some economists predict that presages more rate increases.

Michael Feroli, economist at J.P. Morgan Chase, says sub-3% growth in mid-2006 shows "the Fed nailed the soft landing." But the point of the soft landing "is to get some increase in unemployment ... and that didn't happen. The clock is ticking to see if it happens at all." His firm expects the Fed to start raising rates again in October.

Fed officials don't appear ready to go with that forecast yet. They still think the economy is slowing. They believe further declines in construction are necessary just to bring supply in line with current home sales. Moreover, flat or falling home prices are expected to make consumers feel less wealthy, damping their spending later this year.

Inflation is also ebbing. Excluding food, energy and shelter, it was just 0.5%, at an annual rate, in the past six months. Shelter is heavily influenced by rents, which face downward pressure as owners of unsold homes put them up for rent.

But just in case, a continued bias toward raising rates would keep the Fed, and the markets, prepared in case they are wrong.

Blue Chips Post Biggest Loss In 2 Months In Heavy Trading (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

A day after hitting its 26th record close in four months, the Dow Jones Industrial Average plunged 119.21 points, its heaviest decline in two months.

The decline left the blue chips at 12502.56, down 0.9% in a day of heavy trading. The average is up just 0.3% in 2007.

More broadly, with the DJIA up more than 17% since July 14, many investors were asking how much higher it can go without a pullback. Some are beginning to sell to lock in profits.

The day's news wasn't awful -- just troubling enough to spark selling.

Investors learned that sales of previously occupied homes fell in December. Home builder Beazer Homes USA reported a quarterly loss and said it hasn't seen "any meaningful evidence of a sustainable recovery in the housing market."

Bristol-Myers pulled down drug stocks with its own quarterly loss, due to competition from generics.

Some energy-related companies had bad news. Peabody Energy warned of soft quarterly profits to come. BJ Services posted a disappointing quarterly profit. Occidental Petroleum said fourth-quarter profit fell.

Some stock investors are worried now about bond yields. The yield of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note, which influences a variety of other market rates including some mortgage rates, was below 4.5% last month. Yesterday, it rose to 4.865% amid fears the Federal Reserve won't cut interest rates this year.

"You are seeing interest rates run up a little here and that is causing some concern in the market," said portfolio manager Richard Nash at Cleveland investment-management firm McCormack Advisors International. Higher rates raise costs for consumers and businesses.

Investors looked past upbeat profit news from companies including eBay and Nokia. A $1.14 decline in crude-oil prices to $54.23 a barrel served mainly to worsen concerns about energy-company profits.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 1.1%, or 16.23 points, to 1423.90, up 0.4% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index slid 1.3%, or 32.04 points, to 2434.24, up 0.8% in 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0122564

In news that could affect trading today, Microsoft reported a stronger-than-expected per-share quarterly profit and announced a share buyback. Its stock rose 2% in after-hours trading.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks retreated1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 3.09 billion shares; 788 stocks rose and 2,575 fell.

Bond prices declined2. The 10-year Treasury note fell 14/32, or $4.38 for each $1,000 invested. The 30-year bond was down 24/32, pushing the yield up to 4.961%.

The dollar strengthened3. Late in New York, it traded at 121.15 yen, up from 121.11, while the euro weakened against the dollar to $1.2939 from $1.2960.

Strong Global Economy Clobbers Stocks (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, January 26, 2007

Stocks endured their worst sell-off in two months Thursday after investors bristled over news regarding China's economy, home sales and interest rates.

Investors pushed the Dow Jones industrials down 119.21 points, or 0.9%, to 12,502.56, a harsh sell-off coming one day after the Dow set a new high. It was the Dow's worst day since it fell 158.46 points on Nov. 27, 2006. Still, the blue-chip barometer is up 0.3% this year.

Tech stocks, measured by the Nasdaq composite index, took it even harder, falling 32.04 points, or 1.3%, to 2434.24. The Nasdaq is up 0.8% this year, making it the best performer year-to-date among the major market indexes.

Hit by declines in stocks in the paper and packaging, investment banking and brokerage and home entertainment software industries, the Standard & Poor's 500 lost 16.23 points to 1423.90. The S&P 500 is up 0.4% this year.

News of a red-hot Chinese economy was one thing that hit stocks, says Todd Clark of Nollenberger Capital. China reported blistering economic growth of 10.7%, igniting fears of inflation.

Next, investors were served up news indicating sales of existing homes fell 0.8% in December (story, 1B). That weak number made them worry if they've overestimated how healthy consumer spending is. "It wasn't a recipe for higher (stock) prices today," Clark says.

And then stock investors contended with a surge in the yield of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note to a three-month high of 4.88%.

Not only does the higher yield tempt investors away from stocks, but it signals some investors may think the economy is healthy enough for the Federal Reserve to boost rates, says Gary Tapp at SunTrust Robinson Humphrey. "It looks like the U.S. economy is strengthening," he says.

But it could be simply the market needed to cool off after a strong 2006, he says. "The market had been going straight up for a long time," Tapp says.

Highlights:

Varian Medical, a medical-supply company, fell $4.37 to $45.77. On Wednesday, it issued a forecast for its fiscal second quarter that was 4% lower than expected.

·Plexus, an electronics manufacturing company, lost $3.04 to $18.18. The company said Wednesday it expected to earn up to 19 cents a share in its second quarter, 46% lower than forecasts.

10-year-old Filmmaker Sues For Creative Control (LAT)

By Josh Friedman, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2007

He seeks creative control of his movie, alleging his financier wants 'final cut and everything.'

Most 10-year-olds are happy with an allowance and some video games.

Budding filmmaker Dominic Scott Kay wants creative control, along with a shot at the Sundance Film Festival. And, as often happens in the entertainment business, to get what he wants he's headed to court with one of Hollywood's top litigators in tow.

The child actor, whose credits include Steven Spielberg's "Minority Report" and voicing Wilbur the pig in Paramount Pictures' recent "Charlotte's Web," is in a creative battle with Conroy Kanter, the financier of the short film Kay directed. The two met when Kay played with Kanter's son on a soccer team.

"She wanted to make all the decisions and stuff," Kay said. "She wanted final cut and everything."

DOJ_NMG_0122565

Kay alleges in a lawsuit filed Thursday in Los Angeles County Superior Court that Kanter, his Malibu neighbor, is trying to wrestle away control of "Saving Angelo," starring actor Kevin Bacon, which she helped bankroll with $11,000.

Kanter's attorney, Michael Stoller, alleged that Kay's mother was behind the lawsuit and was seeking financial gain, adding that his client considered financing the film a "charitable contribution" to animal rights. "This is another example that no good deed goes unpunished," he said.

Kanter was seeking to use Kay to become a Hollywood "player," said Dylan Ruga, who is representing Kay along with prominent Hollywood lawyer Stanton L. (Larry) Stein.

Kay alleged that he had shelved the film because Kanter had threatened to sue him since September 2005 if he completed the editing or screened the finished product without her consent. The lawsuit said profit would go toward animal rescue charities.

The movie was invited to the Los Angeles International Short Film Festival, and it could have been entered in the 2006 and 2007 editions of the Sundance Film Festival, Kay alleges.

"One of the most frustrating things was that Ms. Kanter stopped me from showing the film at Sundance for two years in a row," Kay said. "I don't think that's fair."

Democrats' New Leader Embraces Faith (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON

Harold Ford Jr. is back in national politics. The young former congressman from Tennessee, who came close last fall to becoming the first African- American elected to the Senate from the South since Reconstruction, was named chair of the Democratic Leadership Council (DLC) Thursday.

The Washington-based DLC has been an ideological home base for a generation of successful Democratic politicians trying to carve out a centrist policy approach – including former President Clinton and his wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, now also running for president.

Speaking at a Monitor breakfast Thursday, Mr. Ford laid out the policy terrain he will be focusing on and how he hopes to help the Democratic Party build on its recent successes.

"This new majority in the Congress ... gives the nation a chance to not only see a new leadership but to experience and embark on a new direction on a lot of policy fronts – be it international terror; global competitiveness or globalization, whatever you choose to call it; be it ways to help lower the cost of healthcare," said Ford. "This congress has its work cut out for it."

Unlike most past DLC chairs, Ford does not currently hold elective office, and so he will travel extensively around the country, helping the group develop policy positions. Ford has also accepted a teaching position at Vanderbilt University in Nashville.

Two of the top three Democratic contenders, according to early polls, are active in the DLC – Senator Clinton and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina – but the group will not issue any endorsements. Part of the DLC's goal is to help expand the Democrats' appeal in parts of the country where it has struggled in recent years, including the South. Already, the Democrats have made gains in the Mountain West, after a period of decline.

Ford made clear that he intends to run for office again someday. When asked what went wrong in his race for the Senate, which he lost by three percentage points, he said: "It's over with, we didn't win."

"A lot of things happened right there at the end of the race.... I haven't sat down and looked at the numbers," he said. "I know I want to do it again one day. In my state, it takes a few times to run sometimes, one or two times to run before you win."

During the campaign, Ford, who is single, took some heat for his attendance at a Playboy party at last year's Super Bowl. This year, he won't be at the Super Bowl. But, he quipped, "I make clear [that] I love Jesus, I love girls, and I absolutely love football. That's not a DLC comment."

"I would hope that any candidate not be timid about sharing their faith," Ford said.

DOJ_NMG_0122566

For him, some of the central issues of the day – healthcare, poverty, global warming – go right to the heart of his religious tradition.

"Anybody that really preaches about their faith, how could they not be concerned about those three issues," he said. "The New Testament's essentially dedicated to what people with money should do for people who don't have a lot of it. So ... if your religion actually informs your faith and not politics informing your faith, you should actually care about those things."

Harold Ford Jr. Will Lead Democratic Leadership Council (MCA)

Memphis Commercial Appeal, January 26, 2007

January 25, 2007 WASHINGTON -- Former Memphis congressman Harold Ford Jr. today accepted the high-profile post of chairman of the Democratic Leadership Council, the moderate policy group that launched a little-known Arkansas governor named Bill Clinton to national stardom and the presidency.

The announcement was made this morning at a Washington hotel breakfast sponsored by the Christian Science Monitor, but had been anticipated for days.

Advertisement

Ford accepted the post, calling it "one of the most important organizations on the think-tank landscape. "

"I'm excited about the post for a couple of reasons," he said. "I think that the new majority in Congress presents not only our party with a great opportunity to give the nation a chance to see a new leadership but to embarking in a new direction on a lot of policy fronts."

DLC founder Al From and DLC president Bruce Reed made the announcement at the monthly breakfast for print journalists. Ford told the group that the job is temporary in the sense that he plans to seek elective office in Tennessee in the future.

He fielded questions for more than an hour on policy positions he's taken in the past, and on the role his faith played in the recent U.S. Senate race he lost to former Chattanooga mayor Bob Corker.

Later, asked if he'd be going to the Super Bowl this year, Ford said: "I love Jesus, I love girls and I love football."

And although the DLC won't endorse a Democrat in the presidential primaries, Ford did endorse Al Gore to get an Oscar for his film "An Inconvenient Truth."

Before the announcement, many said the post is the best available platform for a moderate-to-conservative Democrat as he waits for elective offices, like Lamar Alexander's Senate seat in 2008 or the Tennessee governorship in 2010, to contest.

New Dem Leader Challenges GOP Over Religion (POL)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, January 26, 2007

The new head of the leading group of centrist Democrats lashed out Wednesday at what he called the "hypocrisy" of Republicans who overdo their talk about religion.

Harold Ford Jr., the charismatic Tennessee congressman who lost a nasty Senate race last year, on Thursday was named chairman of the Democratic Leadership Council, the party's most influential centrist group.

Ford made his debut at the Christian Science Monitor breakfast, a Washington institution for reporters. Once called the Sperling Breakfast, after founder Godfrey Sperling, the breakfasts -- which started in 1966 -- are a chance for politicians to float ideas and field questions in a relaxed atmosphere.

But business gets done: Everything is on the record. And Ford did not disappoint the sleepy-headed journalists, offering a passionate response when asked about the role of faith in politics. During the question-and-answer period, Ford said candidates should not hesitate to discuss the role religion plays in shaping their positions. But he added that faith "is often used by some to beat up on or whip up on others, and the Bible that I read doesn't suggest that you do that."

"God works in mysterious ways," Ford said. "Some of the nomenclature and jargon that's used by those who invoke faith regularly - compared with some of their actions and behavior and conduct - I think has raised concerns on the part of many that maybe those who preach it the most aren't practicing the most. I pray for all of them, and would hope that they'd be able to find some healing and wholeness in their lives, but that they would also see that maybe they should reflect a little before they go lashing out and attacking others. I think voters get it, too. The hypocrisy on the part of some was so interesting in this last election."

In November, Ford, age 36, lost by 51 percent to 48 percent to Republican Bob Corker, but told the breakfast several times that he plans to run again. "Between political jobs?" he joked when DLC founder Al From noted that an earlier chairman was Charles S. Robb after he was Virginia governor and before he was a U.S. senator.

Ford succeeds Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who's heading off to run for president. His other predecessors include former President Bill Clinton, Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana and Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut.

Ford was presented at the breakfast by From as a rising star who will help the group develop a new generation of leaders to pursue the group's pro-growth, pro-defense policies. "We will be aggressive. The agenda will be ambitious," Ford said. "We certainly anticipate the conversation attracting the leading minds in our party, the leading candidates in our party."

During the question period, Ford recalled Steven Thomma, chief political correspondent for McClatchy Newspapers, from a catfish restaurant on the Tennessee campaign trail toward the end of the campaign, and joked that the reporter almost couldn't ask his question because he was eating coleslaw. "When I left that, I thought you were going to win," the reporter said.

"So did I," Ford said, to big laughter.

"What happened?" Thomma asked.

Ford didn't seem interested in a detailed autopsy. "It's over with - we didn't win," he said. "We ran a hard campaign. A lot of things happened right there at the end of the race. I don't mean to be flippant about your question. I've sat down at looked at the numbers, and I know I want to do it again one day. In my state, it takes a few times to run - sometimes one or two times to run before you win."

Then he spoke about the oft-discussed phenomenon of black candidates, including former Virginia Gov. L. Douglas Wilder, who do better in polls than they do at the ballot box, apparently because white respondents say they're going to vote for an African American and then don't. "One thing that was very interesting in the last week were the polls that came out showing us down double digits, which we never were, and I think that probably played a little bit of role in sapping a little bit of the momentum," Ford said. "People kept calling it a 'Wilder tax.' … I assume it means if you're a black guy, you've got to be way ahead because you're going to lose votes on Election Day. Well, the opposite happened here, according to the polls. We actually gained, and came within 49,000 votes of winning. … We'll run again, one day."

Ford made it clear that he still resents some tactics of Republicans. Asked what he had learned about race in the contest, and what advice he would have for Sen. Barack Obama in his presidential race, Ford replied: "Run hard and be honest and put it in the voters' hands. That's all you can do." He also said: "This stuff on race, you'd probably need to ask my opponent."

Hagel Ponders White House Run As War Criticism Raises His Profile (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

Washington Post, January 26, 2007

His Republican colleagues regard him warily. The White House barely speaks to him. He is reviled by his party's conservative base.

Looks as though Sen. Chuck Hagel is on a roll.

Both parties have their Iraq war contrarians. For the Democrats, it is Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, whose steadfast support for President Bush nearly cost him his seat last year and forced him to run as an independent. The Republican version is Hagel, a career maverick from Nebraska and the only GOP senator to call for an end to the war.

Hagel's sharp criticism of the war has placed him squarely in the mainstream of public opinion on Iraq and revived long-dormant speculation about his presidential ambitions. Hagel has been eclipsed by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a leading contender for his party's presidential nomination who has vigorously endorsed the president's war policies.

But with McCain appearing increasingly isolated on the issue as public opinion has turned overwhelmingly against the war, Hagel is acting like a politician who believes his stock is climbing. In other words, he is considering a White House run.

Hagel said in a wide-ranging interview this week that he is discussing his options with his family and other confidants and will make a decision in the next six weeks.

He said one possibility is forming a presidential exploratory committee and -- despite his outcast position within his party -- seeking the Republican nomination. Or he may seek a third Senate term. Then again, he might take a more creative path.

Hagel clearly admires Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and calls him "a star," but he doubts the two could ever team up given the vast difference in their parties' principles. "I don't know if it gets to that point, but there is a shift going on out there, and there's nothing like a war that does that," Hagel said.

His GOP critics fume that Hagel and his Democratic allies who sponsor resolutions opposing a troop buildup are undermining Bush at a critical moment. "I really don't understand Senator Hagel," said Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah.). "But playing around with resolutions when we all know we've got to stay and get the job done -- that doesn't make any sense. Most Republicans want us to win over there."

Hagel attracted the support of only 1 percent of registered Republicans in recent polls, compared with 25 to 30 percent for McCain. And his standing among conservative party faithful who will determine the outcome of the Republican presidential nomination remains strikingly low because of the intensity of his attacks on Bush. But Hagel has gained a particular following within the antiwar community. An Internet "draft Hagel" movement has formed, and even die-hard liberals admit they find him appealing.

"Chuck Hagel for president! If it ever narrows down to a choice between him and some Democratic hack who hasn't the guts to fundamentally challenge the president on Iraq, then the conservative Republican from Nebraska will have my vote," said an Internet article last week by Robert Scheer, co-author of the book "The Five Biggest Lies Bush Told Us About Iraq."

Like McCain, his close friend and potential 2008 GOP rival, Hagel is a decorated Vietnam War veteran, but his assessment of the Iraq conflict is radically different. McCain has asserted that despite serious mistakes by the Bush administration, victory remains possible. Hagel believes that U.S. troops are being thrown into a civil war that cannot be won and calls the conflict "the most divisive issue in this country since Vietnam."

Earlier in their careers, McCain, 70, and Hagel, 60, were viewed as rising Republican stars, two plain-spoken outsiders with gritty military rÃ©sumÃ©s. After losing to Bush in the 2000 GOP nomination battle, McCain greatly enhanced his stature inside the party by embracing Bush's Iraq policy. Meanwhile, Hagel, an early and persistent critic of the invasion, grew more estranged.

"He's held his view for a long time and I've held mine for a long time, so it's not as if we suddenly find ourselves on the opposite side of the issue," McCain said of Hagel. "I respect his views. I maintain my strong affection and respect for him."

Hagel warned against military action long before the Iraq invasion, but despite his trepidations, he supported a Senate resolution authorizing the war. He has since renounced his vote and has been trying to atone for it ever since. When Bush announced a plan earlier this month to deploy additional troops, Hagel co-sponsored, with two prominent Democrats, a new Senate resolution opposing the plan. Though nonbinding, the measure has triggered the first significant confrontation between the White House and Congress over Iraq since the war began.

Hagel vainly implored his Republican colleagues to join him in supporting the resolution, which was approved 12 to 9 during a session of the Foreign Relations Committee on Wednesday. "If you wanted a safe job, go sell shoes," he said. "This is a tough business."

One of Hagel's sparring partners is Lieberman, who has infuriated Democrats with his outspoken war advocacy. Two weeks ago, the Nebraska senator was introduced to the Internet video site YouTube when his son, an eighth-grader, showed him a clip from "Meet the Press" that was drawing heavy traffic. It was a showdown between Hagel and Lieberman over Iraq.

If critics of Bush's troop increase have their way, Lieberman asserted, the consequences "for my children and grandchildren, I fear, will be disastrous."

"That's ridiculous," Hagel shot back, "and I am offended that any responsible member of Congress or anyone else would even suggest such a thing. Senator Lieberman talks about his children and grandchildren. We all have children and grandchildren; he doesn't have a market on that."

Hagel is a loner in the Senate, a serious and somewhat distant colleague who eschews consultants and other trappings of political ambition -- although he is a regular on political talk shows. He travels the country extensively and particularly enjoys talking to students. Last month, he spoke at Nebraska Wesleyan University and the University of Nebraska at Lincoln, and he is to receive an honorary degree from the College of William and Mary next month. Ambassadors and foreign officials visit his office regularly.

He often speaks of the current period as a "transformational time" that could bring a political earthquake, as early as the 2008 election. He sees parallels to 1960 and 1980, which resulted in the pivotal presidencies of John F. Kennedy and Ronald Reagan.

"Politics and politicians must become relevant to the times . . . or they become irrelevant," Hagel said. "And when you become irrelevant, something is going to fill that void."

TIME Poll: Hillary Vs. McCain? (TIME)

By Tony Karon

Time, January 26, 2007

Hillary Clinton is the clear front-runner to win the Democratic Party's nomination for President in 2008, but the Republican race will be a close contest between Senator John McCain and former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani — with McCain edging Giuliani by a three- to four-point margin. And a presidential face-off between Clinton and McCain, right now, would be close to a dead heat. Those are some of the key findings of a new TIME poll earlier this week that canvassed a random sample of 1,064 registered voters by phone.

Despite the buzz generated by Senator Barack Obama entering the race, the survey found that Senator Clinton would beat him for the Democratic nomination by a margin of 40% to 21%. Senator John Edwards is a distant third with 11%. Obama clearly suffers a disadvantage in profile among likely voters, with only 51% indicating that they knew enough about him to form an opinion, compared with 94% saying the same of Hillary Clinton. In Obama's favor, however, is his far lower negative ratings. While 58% of voters familiar with Hillary Clinton have a positive view of her, 41% give her negative marks, for a net favorability score of +17. By contrast, Obama's net favorability score is +47. On the Republican side, Giuliani has a net favorability rating of +68, with only 14% having a negative view of him. McCain's net favorability score is +45.

McCain, however, holds a narrow lead of 30% to 26% over Giuliani for the G.O.P. nomination. A race between McCain and Clinton would be a virtual tie (47%-47%), according to the poll, while McCain would beat either Obama or Senator John Edwards by a 7-point margin.

Clinton's popularity within her party does not translate as easily across party lines as Obama's does, or indeed as Giuliani's and McCain's. Only 58% of the total sample of respondents had a very or somewhat favorable impression of her, compared with 82% for Giuliani (including 7 out of 10 Democratic voters), and 70% each for Obama and McCain — both of whom showed strongly among independents. These figures must be read against the fact that 94% of respondents said they knew "a great deal" or "some" about Clinton, while 73% said the same of Giuliani and 66% of John McCain. Only 51% knew "a great deal" or "some" about Obama.

If the election were held now, Rudy Giuliani appears to have the support of the greatest number of respondents of both parties, with 56% indicating they would "definitely" or "probably" support him — followed by Hillary Clinton (51%) John McCain (50%) and Barack Obama (50%). But Clinton has a strong edge when the question is which presidential candidate people would most like to have over to their homes for dinner. The former First Lady led the dinner-invitation field with 26%, while Obama and McCain tied for second place at 15%. But with the New Hampshire primaries a year away, the the four leading contenders all have some work to do: Obama in making himself better known, Clinton in making herself better liked, McCain in matching Giuliani's appeal to Democratic voters, and Giuliani in landing more invitations to dinner.

IRAQ

HOW THE WAR SCRAMBLES PARTY LINES

The Iraq war has actedÂ like bleach on this year's primary colors: political stripes have faded and dissolved as candidates scramble to explain how they would get America out of Iraq without igniting the Middle East. The most conservative candidate for the G.O.P., Sam Brownback, is closer on Iraq to Democrat Joseph Biden than he is to John McCain. Democrats John Edwards and Hillary Clinton, meanwhile, are worlds apart.

The Republican Party has perhaps the deepest identity crisis over the way forward in Iraq. G.O.P. voters are down on Bush but still largely behind the war, and three leading Republicans--John McCain, Mitt Romney and Rudy Giuliani--would like to change policy but refuse to abandon the mission. All three back Bush's troop increase. McCain has, however, attacked the Administration's handling of the war. Brownback--like fellow Republican and potential candidate Chuck Hagel--supports scaling back the U.S. military mission and appears to be betting that by next winter Republican voters will be looking for an exit strategy.

Most Democratic voters oppose the war and want it ended. But too dovish a position by candidates now could look weak to independents and centrists in the general election. Hillary Clinton backed the war and the mission through last November's election but has since called for capping troop levels. Biden, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, calls for cautious withdrawal and scores points for his proposed political solutions, including direct talks with Iran and Syria. Always antiwar, Barack Obama has taken the party position of cautious withdrawal: a troop drawdown starting in four to six months. John Edwards has come out hard and early to declare his vote authorizing the war was a mistake and to issue the strongest antisurge message among the major Democratic candidates.

No position on either side is particularly safe; they are all gambles on a certain outcome in Iraq. If the situation on the ground stabilizes, the leading Republicans and Clinton will appear steady hands; if it deteriorates, Biden, Brownback and Edwards will look wiser.

MONEY

THE FIRST TEST: WHO CAN RAISE THE MOST CASH

After Barack Obama posted an online video to announce he was running for President and promised a new kind of politics for his campaign, he went straight old-school. He spent much of the rest of his day dialing for dollars, asking wealthy Democrats to support him in his quest to compete with Hillary Clinton's deep pockets. When Clinton got into the race a few days later, the New York Senator made clear she would avoid public financing for her campaign--forgoing a system that matches the first $250 of every individual campaign donation--because she believes she can raise much more than the $50 million limit imposed on candidates who accept matching funds in the primary.

The 2008 presidential campaign may show that race, religion and gender don't matter, but money still talks, and more loudly than ever before. In 2003, John Edwards surprised everyone by raking in $7 million in campaign donations in the first three months of the year. That amount will be like Monopoly money after 2008. Strategists say the two eventual party nominees could well spend up to $500 million each before the general election.

Whether they get their money by calling, blogging or throwing lavish fund raisers, would-be contenders had better start quickly. Raising even $50 million for the primary this year means coming up with $137,000 a day.

RELIGION

CHASING VOTERS INTO THE PEW

This time around, candidates from both parties are looking for the right tone on religion. On the Republican side, the usual scramble is under way to win over the large Evangelical base, which is still without a top-tier candidate. Many conservative Christian activists admire Sam Brownback for his opposition to embryonic stem-cell research, abortion and gay marriage, even though he is a long shot. Three G.O.P. front runners aren't exactly dream candidates for social conservatives: Mitt Romney faces a challenge in explaining his Mormonism to conservative Christians suspicious of it. Rudy Giuliani supports abortion rights. And in 2000 John McCain called conservative Christian activists like Jerry Falwell "agents of intolerance."

Democratic candidates for 2008 are determined to build credibility with religious swing voters. Barack Obama devoted a chapter to his religion in his newest book and is far more likely to talk about his "personal relationship with Jesus Christ" than McCain, who keeps religious matters largely to himself. In December Obama publicly joined Brownback at an AIDS-awareness convention at Saddleback, the Rev. Rick Warren's evangelical megachurch in Orange County, Calif. On its website the Clinton campaign, in a bio of the New York Senator, describes at length that "faith was central to her family. Her mother taught Sunday school, and Hillary was a regular in her church youth group."

But Democratic activists may have little appetite for overt religiosity, particularly if it impinges on socially liberal issues. Former vice-presidential nominee John Edwards, though he is tacking left in his second White House run, nonetheless had to disappoint a questioner at a New Hampshire town hall who wanted him to support gay marriage. "I am just not there yet," Edwards says.

FIRST, WRITE A BEST SELLER

This election cycleÂ may boast the most ever candidates with best sellers: John McCain with Faith of My Fathers, Barack Obama, riding high on the hardcover and paperback lists (The Audacity of Hope and Dreams from My Father) and Hillary Clinton, whose Living History sold more than 1.2 million hardbacks. The most memorable title belongs to former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee, who wrote Quit Digging Your Grave with a Knife and Fork after losing 100 lbs. If he's not elected President, he could at least make it into Oprah's Book Club.

LAST-MINUTE CAMPAIGNS

THE WAIT-AND-SEE PRIMARY

Despite the rash of newÂ candidates announcing their bid this month, some heavyweights are holding out, either for tactical reasons or out of indecision, and could shake things up with a late entry into the race. The biggest could-be contenders are former Vice President Al Gore and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich. Gore denies that he plans to run, but his hit film, An Inconvenient Truth, and his strong stands on climate change and the war in Iraq have rehabilitated him with Democratic activists.

Gingrich has energized some on the right with his calls for a conservative revival in the Republican Party. If Mitt Romney's attempt to woo the party base fails, Gingrich, who's already polling in third place, could capitalize. Some dream of a run by George W. Bush's brother, former Florida Governor Jeb Bush, or Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, although the President's low approval ratings and the lack of progress in Iraq could dim their prospects. But with 21 months before the election for the announced candidates to pummel one another, voters may tire of the whole bunch, leaving the door open for a fresh bid by a familiar face.

OPERATIVES

RECRUITING THE NEW GURUS

The hunt is onÂ for theÂ next Karl Rove, the political consultant with the strategic acumen and message magic to steer a candidate all the way from Iowa to the Oval Office.

The biggest names in the race, Clinton and McCain, have the early talent advantage. The former boasts Hillaryland--a cadre of loyal, long-serving pros--with the addition of a few carefully selected people from her husband's operation. McCain retains his inner circle from 2000 and has scooped up a slew of Bush veterans, even though some aided in the trashing of McCain in the infamous South Carolina 2000 primary. "We're in the business of making friends now," explains one of the Arizona Senator's old hands.

Hillary Clinton, of course, has the top political consultant who is not on the payroll: her husband. And then there's Rove. Bush's political guru coyly refuses to say whether he plans to advise a Republican in the 2008 race. If he does and his man wins, the next Karl Rove could be ... Karl Rove.

THE BLOGOSPHERE

WINNING OVER THE ONLINE ACTIVISTS

While the past fewÂ elections have seen candidates try out newfangled blogging technology with all the comfort and skill of a granddad on a skateboard, the 2008 candidates are doing everyone a favor by not trying to be bloggers.

"Bloggers put much more of a premium on understanding the medium rather than joining in," says Kevin Madden, a spokesman for Mitt Romney. Romney's strategy is to participate in podcasts and talk regularly with top conservative bloggers, an approach that has made him the top vote getter in Republican blogger straw polls, though he lags in national telephone ones.

Hillary Clinton, a real-world front runner, dwells in the low one figures in blogger surveys, but she has hired former Kerry hand Peter Daou to burnish her Web image. Daou says bloggers need to be wooed like any other reporters--or voters, for that matter. "It's very old school," he says. "I just reach out to them one by one." Employing bloggers instead of just courting them is a tricky next step, though. McCain was chastised last year when a blogger posted attacks on Romney without disclosing up front that he was on McCain's payroll.

NEW FACES

Only a few candidates are famous. The rest are known mostly in their universes--the Senate or Arkansas, say--or as perennial protest candidates. Here's a primer on the faces you might not recognize in the crowd.

SAM BROWNBACK

MIKE HUCKABEE

DUNCAN HUNTER

TOM TANCREDO

The Colorado Rep's big issue, border control, inspires base G.O.P. voters. He has sponsored legislation punishing Sudan for its war in Darfur

TOMMY THOMPSON

The former Wisconsin G.O.P. Governor made a name in welfare reform in the '90s. He's pushing a plan to split Iraq into three separate states

DENNIS KUCINICH

Yes, it still rhymes with "spinach." His antiwar stance, looking better now than in '04, has drawn backers among House colleagues in both parties

CHRISTOPHER DODD

The affable Democrat is popular in the Senate. Fluent in Spanish, he's an expert on Latin America and is strong on children's issues

TOM VILSACK

Inexperienced in foreign affairs, he's a likable self-made man. His hopes ride on his record as Iowa's Governor and a champion of ethanol fuel

McCain's Health And Age Present Campaign Challenge (POL)

The Politico, January 26, 2007

"I am older than dirt and have more scars than Frankenstein," John McCain likes to say.

It always gets a laugh, though I don't suppose his mother, who is 94, and her twin sister, appreciate it very much. If he is older than dirt, what does that make them? Older than lava?

If McCain, 70, runs and wins, he would be the oldest person ever inaugurated as president. As is evident from the scar on the left side of his face, he has had malignant melanoma, the most invasive and dangerous form of skin cancer. (One in every 60 Americans is at risk for developing invasive melanoma in their lifetimes.)

I talked to McCain recently and asked him about his health. He said it was good. "I hiked the Grand Canyon rim-to-rim last August with my son, Jack," he said.

I tried to imagine that. The last time I saw it, the Grand Canyon was seriously deep.

How on earth do you hike a thing like that rim-to-rim? I asked.

"Down and up!" he said. "It takes three days."

John Kennedy, who at 43 became the youngest person ever elected president, and who was always associated with "vig-ah," in fact had serious diseases that were kept from the public.

As was revealed in 2002, Kennedy was sick from age 13 through the rest of his life, was on chronic-pain medication throughout his presidency and had Addison's disease, an endocrine disorder that until 1940 was a terminal illness. Kennedy survived it through cortisone injections, which at the time only rich people could afford.

Dr. Jeffrey Kelman, who examined Kennedy's medical records in 2002, said, "He was never healthy. I mean, the image you get of vigor and progressive health wasn't true."

The point being: Electing a young person to the presidency is no guarantee that he or she will be healthy or stay healthy.

The media often demands the release of medical records these days, and the candidates sometimes comply. There were so many false rumors circulating about McCain's health when he ran for president in 2000, that he released 1,500 pages of medical and psychiatric records. They showed him to be in good health and not nuts. (And how many presidential candidates can say that?)

"We'll probably have to do that again," McCain told me of the record release.

Do you think all candidates should release their medical and psychiatric records? I asked.

I thought he would jump on that and say yes, just to put pressure on the other presidential campaigns, but he did not.

"I don't know," he said. "I think probably in my case it was a little more unique because of my POW status and the war injuries and the fact that people were spreading rumors that I was crazy and disabled both. So we'll probably have to do that again."

You think the rumors will start again? I asked.

"They already have!" he said.

But I don't think that is going to be McCain's problem. It isn't his health but rather his demeanor that worries some people.

The Iraq war, which he strongly supports, has disturbed and dismayed him. He told The Washington Post it was a "train wreck." He told me it was a "witch's brew." He visits wounded soldiers and Marines when they come back home for treatment and if any civilian feels the pain of the military, it is McCain.

And it is showing.

Last April, I wrote of a campaign swing McCain made through New Hampshire and Iowa, "Though McCain said he enjoyed himself, he was not the rollicking campaigner of six years ago. At a number of stops, he was largely subdued and sometimes almost somber."

Last Sunday, on "Meet the Press with Tim Russert," McCain seemed to have moved from almost somber to almost gloomy.

In my recent interview, I suggested to him that the laughing, joking John McCain of his last presidential campaign seemed to be AWOL.

"It's hard to make jokes; we are a nation at war," he said. "There are great national security challenges that we face. But I also believe, as Ronald Reagan did, that America's greatest days are ahead of us. It's going to be an upbeat campaign and an optimistic one."

And will you still come to the back of the bus and goof off with the press like before? I asked.

"If I changed that," McCain said with a smile of old, "I would probably get death threats."

I'm very excited about Politico, but I sure hope that your level of commentary rises above what we see here. McCain's health is a vital issue in the upcoming race. Anyone looking at him can see he's not well. I hope you examine this issue with a degree of vigor and candor the mainstream press shies away from. To reprint McCain's quips and leave it at there is useless.

I don't want this to sound mean spirited. I am not a fan of McCain for several reasons. But the point of this comment is that John McCain was a prisoner of war. I have read his story and his books, and the fact that he survived being a POW for 5 years, in my mind does not make him a war hero. Neither does getting shot down. I know that he is a patriot. Most Americans are. When I think of a war hero, I think of my oldest brother who was killed in action in Korea, and awarded the Medal of Honor. That is a war hero, and there are thousands of others just like him. It has always troubled me that we call McCain a war hero, based largely on his own account. Patriot, sure, good man, absolutely, war hero, i just don't know.

by AnnaCatherine on 01.25.2007 at 04:12 PM

McCain might want to get out while he still has his dignity. His military record protects him from being bashed like the others. I'm not sure that's fair. He was obviously asleep at the State of the Union Address. It was overlooked or just 'off limits'. While I understand the reluctance to criticize him others are scrutinized and criticized all the time. It's part of the deal.Maybe it's time for a reality check. No malice intended. Thanks, ANNA

I know McCain. Have met him several times. He's honest about Iraq. It's what he thinks that he tells you. He really does believe that it will be very tough for us if we pull out suddenly and the country collapses, and he does think that it is a chance if we send some more troops. I don't think he is enthusiastic about it. On the other hand, he knows that such a position will cost him votes next year. He doesn't care about that. If he loses because of it, those are the lumps you take. That's how McCain thinks. Yep, any way you look at it, he's a patriot. He may be wrong, but it's his view, like it or not. What if we do something else? Webb's idea of getting our troops out of the cities? At this point, McC doesn't think much of that. It's his opinion. I have found that you might not agree with him, but you do get his views when you ask. Would he have invaded if he were president, or would he have run the war the way Bush has? I doubt he would have invaded, regardless of how he voted (see Kerry and Hillary), I know he would have run it differently.

The days of American adventurism is over. Gun boat diplomacy no longer "persuades" the natives. Someone needs to emphatically tell McCain (and Bush).

Time and again McCain strikes me as someone keen to attack Iran, expanding the current mayhem exponentially. The bloodshed will result in regional and global costs. He also strikes me as somone relatively unfamiliar with the regional realities, IAEA reports and international law.

No, he'll not have my support. We've already seen the consequences of one fellow attacking a country that did not pose a threat to us (or anyone else). And we attacked and occupied them based on fraud and cooked intelligence. We don't need more (much more) of the same from this so called "maverick".

This is fighting terrorism? I think not!

Giuliani A Tough Conservative Sell (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, January 26, 2007

Rudy Giuliani's star has hardly dimmed in the five years since terrorists attacked his city on Sept. 11, 2001, and he became a national hero _ the face of U.S. resolve at a time of tragedy.

The Republican dubbed "America's Mayor" hopes to ride that celebrity and his record at City Hall to the White House by emphasizing his leadership skills and embracing the strong-on-security, limited-government tenets of the GOP.

"If he can handle the scrutiny, and if events break his way, sure, he can win," said Fred Siegel, who wrote a Giuliani biography, "The Prince of the City."

Giuliani's quest to capture his party's presidential nomination won't be easy.

He's a moderate Republican from New York City, on the wrong side of social issues in the eyes of hard-core conservatives who are a crucial voting bloc in the primaries. His mayoral tenure was marked by criticism of an overzealous police force. He's linked to the city's scandal-plagued ex-police chief Bernard Kerik. His thicket of business interests could pose conflicts. He's been divorced twice.

"I sure have strengths and weaknesses," Giuliani said recently. "I think that sort of puts me in the same category as just about everybody else that's running. Are my strengths greater or my weaknesses worse? I don't know. You have to sort of examine that. That won't be the issue."

His challenge will be to remind voters of his take-charge attitude on Sept. 11 and his two-term mayoral reign, at the same time his main rivals _ Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney _ no doubt will try to exploit his background and record. For now, both are trying to gauge how much of a threat he may be.

Giuliani, who formed a presidential exploratory committee last year, is betting that the Republican rank-and-file will look past his liabilities. His aides dismiss skeptics who say he has too many flaws to win over primary voters a year from now.

"I believe they'll look at the picture as a whole," said Tony Carbonetti, Giuliani's longtime political adviser. "This (New York) was an unmanageable city, and I think what people want today is a manager, someone to lead in difficult times and to lead in not-difficult times.

"We're going to continue to tell that story," he said.

Before Sept. 11, Giuliani was known as the hard-charging prosecutor-turned-politician who cleaned up Times Square, led the city out of fiscal despair and brought Republican rule back to the liberal mecca.

Giuliani, of course, made enemies in the process, but on Sept. 11 even his chronic critics were muted when he took charge amid the rubble of the World Trade Center's twin towers. To many, he became a picture of strength, a reminder of the resilience of the American spirit.

"He has a connection to that. He is unique. On the other hand you look at the politics and you say this is a problem," said Alex Vogel, a Republican strategist in Washington who is not affiliated with any presidential candidate.

"The question is: Can you win a Republican primary a different way? History keeps saying no. But history has never presented us with someone whose favorability numbers are as high as Rudy's."

Indeed, national polls have consistently shown him leading for the GOP nomination, and early surveys in key states show him ahead or competitive. He travels to one important state, New Hampshire, this weekend where he will give the keynote address at the state GOP's annual meeting.

For all the hype since 2001, Giuliani didn't start preparing for a presidential run in earnest until after November's elections. Thus, he has lagged behind McCain and Romney in courting fundraisers, setting up a national organization and hiring ground operatives in key states, although he has made progress on all fronts recently.

Giuliani's aides insist they're making strides toward filling out his campaign. They say he can raise the $80 million to $100 million necessary this year for a serious run. Name recognition, obviously, isn't an issue.

Neither, his supporters argue, is likability. They say he appeals to people across the political spectrum and in every region of the country, meaning he could expand the general election playing field. That, his backers say, makes him the Republican most likely to beat the presumptive Democratic front-runner, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

Perhaps.

But first he has to capture the GOP nomination _ and the big question is whether he can win over enough Republicans in states like Iowa and South Carolina, among the first nominating contests where voters are solid conservatives and could be turned off by his stance on social issues.

"Giuliani is going to have to convince people that he's more conservative than his record otherwise would suggest," said Peverill Squire, who teaches politics at the University of Iowa.

The former mayor's support for abortion rights, gay rights and gun control conflict with the hard-line positions of the GOP's right. His supporters say he's not as liberal on those issues as he's made out to be. Still, he's from New York _ and that alone rankles the party's conservative wing.

Despite that, Giuliani's backers contend _ and some Republican strategists agree _ that he could get support from fiscal conservatives because of his record of cutting taxes, curbing spending and promoting small government, particularly now when the base is smarting over the soaring federal deficit under Republicans.

And, with the country still at war, his link to Sept. 11 _ the brand of a strong leader _ could trump the base's concerns about his background and stand on social issues.

"Giuliani's national security credentials will allow him to span ideological divides in the Republican Party and win conservative votes," said Greg Strimple, a GOP strategist in New York who is neutral in the race.

Unknown is whether Giuliani can woo enough of those base Republican voters to win the nomination and, if not, whether he can make up the difference by attracting independents and Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0122575

"His opening could come if people really think that somebody like Hillary is running away with it, and if there's a perception that only Giuliani can beat her," said John Truscott, an unaffiliated Republican strategist in Michigan.

Another factor that could help Giuliani is how the primary calendar shakes out.

New Hampshire and Michigan hold early contests, and New Jersey, California, Illinois, Florida and other states viewed as more hospitable to a moderate may schedule their votes earlier in the year, perhaps lessening the importance of a strong showing for Giuliani in Iowa and South Carolina.

For all the obstacles, even folks with ties to Giuliani's opponents can't deny that the New Yorker has a shot.

Said Ken Khachigian of California, who served as a strategist for President Reagan and was with McCain in 2000: "I would never sell Giuliani short."

Hunter Makes Presidential Bid Official (AP)

By Jim Davenport

AP, January 26, 2007

Republican Rep. Duncan Hunter, best known for his advocacy on behalf of the military, launched a longshot bid for the presidency Thursday in this early voting state.

Frequently citing Ronald Reagan, Hunter told supporters he wants to pick up on the former president's legacy.

"I want to lead that policy of peace through strength," said Hunter, a strong supporter of the Iraq war.

The 14-term conservative from California, who has made no secret of his White House aspirations, set up a presidential exploratory committee earlier this month.

He initially announced his intentions in October, becoming the first GOP candidate to declare, and then began making stops in early primary and caucus states, including Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

He joins an increasingly crowded GOP field of declared and likely candidates, including Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Sam Brownback of Kansas, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

Hunter has been a familiar face on Capitol Hill and at the Pentagon. Until Democrats took control of Congress this month, he was chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, the powerful panel that oversees military policy.

However, Hunter is little known outside of Congress and his San Diego district. He is a strong opponent of illegal immigration who wants fences extended along the U.S.-Mexico border and supports the prosecution of smugglers bringing illegal immigrants across the border.

Last week, Hunter filed a bill calling for a congressional pardon of two U.S. Border Patrol agents who are both serving more than a decade in prison for shooting a Mexican drug dealer as he fled, then covering up the crime.

"Nobody wins the presidency without winning South Carolina," Hunter said.

Hunter already has some deep-pocket allies in the state, including textile magnate Roger Milliken, who supports Hunter's promise to protect U.S. manufacturers threatened by cheap, overseas labor.

"I'm thrilled that he's running," said Milliken, who hasn't yet endorsed a presidential candidate. "This point of view he represents must be heard."

Hunter, 58, was born in Riverside, Calif., and was an Army Ranger in Vietnam. He worked his way through law school with farming and construction jobs.

Hunter won his U.S. House seat in 1980 and has been an ardent military supporter. His son has spent a pair of seven-month tours in Iraq.

Hunter Touts Experience, Conservatism In Bid For Presidency (CQ)

By Rachel Kapochunas

Congressional Quarterly, January 26, 2007

Republican Rep. Duncan Hunter of California made his presidential candidacy official Thursday morning, announcing his entry into the GOP field at a breakfast meeting in the South Carolina city of Spartanburg.

The 14-term lawmaker is touting more than a quarter-century of congressional experience; his focus on national security issues that has made him the current ranking Republican (and former chairman) of the House Armed Services Committee; and a record as a staunch conservative that he says will appeal to many voters in the Republican Party's base.

Yet Hunter is making his first campaign venture outside his congressional constituency in the San Diego area, in the southwestern corner of the continental United States. And the 58-year-old representative of California's 52nd District enters the presidential race trailing far behind nationally recognized hopefuls, such as Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, in name recogintion and fundraising potential.

DOJ_NMG_0122576

He is also fighting history. The last successful candidate to make the direct leap from the House to the White House was Ohio Republican James Garfield in 1880.

And though he maintains he is "the most conservative" candidate in the 2008 race, he faces strong competition on the Republican right from Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, who announced his candidacy Jan. 20.

Other potential competitors for the GOP conservative vote include former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, Colorado Rep. Tom Tancredo, former Virginia Gov. James S. Gilmore III and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

Hunter picked Spartanburg, in northwestern South Carolina, as the launching point in his campaign in part because voters in the strongly Republican region might be particularly receptive to his conservative views. Hunter also hopes that South Carolina, which has several military installations and a pro-defense slant, will also take a shine to his national security policy credentials.

Hunter already has a network of allies in the state, including Roger Milliken, head of textile and chemical manufacturer Milliken & Company, based in Spartanburg. Last year, Milliken contributed both to Hunter's House campaign committee — from which he can legally transfer funds to his presidential campaign — and the congressman's Peace Through Strength political action committee (PAC).

The two share a strong skepticism of free trade agreements that they believe cost American jobs. Milliken told the Associated Press that he supports Hunter's committment to protecting U.S. manufacturing, though adding that he has not made any official endorsement for the 2008 presidential race.

The Peace Through Strength committee ran ads featuring Hunter last month, including one in which he called for "fair trade."

Hunter said China is "cheating" U.S. businesses by devaluing its currency — which has the effect of making its exports cheaper and U.S. imports to China more expensive — and subsidizing its businesses.

Hunter's conservatism extends to social issues. He is an outspoken opponent of illegal immigration, an issue on which President Bush and some of the Republican candidates have taken more moderate stances.

2nd Republican Enters Race For Presidency (NYT)

By Sarah Abruzzese

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — Representative Duncan Hunter, Republican of California, announced his bid for the presidency on Thursday in Spartanburg, S.C., then boarded a motor home to tour the state, where he hopes to gain support from a conservative electorate.

Mr. Hunter, 58, said his candidacy would emphasize his support for the war in Iraq, his opposition to abortion and his belief in free trade.

Serving his 14th term as a congressman, Mr. Hunter, of San Diego, is a Vietnam veteran and a lawyer. He was the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee until this year and is now the ranking Republican on the panel.

In a release earlier this month, he paved the way for his candidacy, saying, "America needs a way ahead in the ongoing war against terrorists and a policy of economic opportunity, with a reaffirmation of faith in the principles of our founding."

He said yesterday that he would also emphasize the need to restore the balance of trade with China.

"This is not free trade, this is not fair trade," Mr. Hunter said according to the text of his speech. "It is cheating."

Mr. Hunter, who has a 92 percent lifetime conservative rating from the American Conservative Union, repeated his opposition to abortion this week, telling thousands of anti-abortion demonstrators here that, if elected, he would not nominate judges who supported abortion.

Mr. Hunter also opposes embryonic stem cell research and supports tighter controls on illegal immigration. Mr. Hunter is the second Republican to announce his intention to run for the presidency. Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas did last week. Senator John McCain of Arizona and Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former mayor of New York, are also expected to seek the nomination.

By Jason Spencer

Spartanburg (SC) Herald Journal Hunter, January 26, 2007

Espousing hard-line views on immigration, trade, America's role in spreading democracy and the need to protect the life of an unborn child, California Congressman Duncan Hunter today officially announced his longshot bid to become this country's next president.

DOJ_NMG_0122577

"God still loves our nation. We are still a people of character, and strength, and kindness," Hunter told a packed room at the Marriott at Renaissance Park (Watch video from the announcement).

"My fellow Americans, with the support of our families, with faith in God, and with confidence in the goodness of the American people, let's begin this race for the American presidency, and let's win."

The announcement is a first for Spartanburg, but not surprising considering the strong ally Hunter has in textile magnate Roger Milliken.

"Judging from the reaction I've just had, talking to a few people, they can get his message," Milliken said afterward. "The problem is, how does the word get through? His message is the right one for America. And you can see that he's dedicated."

Hunter's announcement received national media attention, with Fox News, CNN and C-SPAN among the many cameras rolling in the back of the Marriott's Azalea Ballroom.

The 250-or-so supporters in the room included the local GOP faithful, but they also came from across the state — not to mention San Diego (where Hunter lives), Yuma, Ariz., and Washington, D.C.

While some pundits have debated whether in 2008 Americans will be electing a "wartime president," Hunter made it very clear they would be. He and his supporters almost referred to him more as this country's "next commander in chief" rather than "next president."

"We live in a world that's on fire, and our next commander in chief has to be someone who in that critical moment, to help protect the lives of American people, that can make the right decision. And with his background and experience, he's the right man for the job," said Van Hipp, a former chairman of the S.C. Republican Party and current head of Washington, D.C.-based American Defense International.

Hunter, a Vietnam veteran, has served in Congress since 1980, and spent the last four years as the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. He co-wrote the legislation to build a 700-mile fence along the U.S.-Mexican border.

And like many other conservatives seeking the GOP nomination in 2008, he's trying to latch onto the legacy of Ronald Reagan — Hipp even introduced him as "the next best thing" to Reagan.

Today's announcement begins a statewide tour of South Carolina for Hunter and his family. Sunday, they'll fly to New Hampshire.

A CNN poll last week cast Hunter with only 1 percent of the vote among likely Republican voters — trailing even other lesser-known conservatives like Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, former Virginia Gov. Jim Gilmore and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

Those three have visited Spartanburg, too. But only Hunter chose this city to make his official announcement.

"This represents the heart of what I call the arsenal of democracy. This is a place that's known for textile manufacturing. You've got steel manufacturing right up the way … and I thought this was the heart of the base that is left in America, and I think the heart of the base that can help my campaign come to a successful conclusion," Hunter said.

"You know what that is? That's the great Americans who won't move their companies off-shore, who won't take their manufacturing to China. … There's a certain ethic of patriotism here that is not found in many boardrooms of multinational corporations. I like that."

Obama Calls For Universal Health Care (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, January 26, 2007

Every American should have health care coverage within six years, Democratic Sen. Barack Obama said Thursday as he set an ambitious goal soon after jumping into the 2008 presidential race.

"I am absolutely determined that by the end of the first term of the next president, we should have universal health care in this country," Obama told a conference of Families USA, a health care advocacy group.

Obama was previewing what is shaping up to be a theme of the 2008 Democratic primary. His chief rivals, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and John Edwards, also are strong proponents of universal health care and have promised to offer their plans.

Obama said while plans are offered in every campaign season with "much fanfare and promise," they collapse under the weight of Washington politics, leaving citizens to struggle with the skyrocketing costs.

He said it's wrong that 46 million in this country are uninsured when the country spends more than any one else on health care. He said Americans pay $15 billion in taxes to help care for the uninsured.

"We can't afford another disappointing charade in 2008, 2009 and 2010," Obama said. "It's not only tiresome, it's wrong."

DOJ_NMG_0122578

Obama's call was an echo of a speech he made last April when he said Democrats "need to cling to the core values that make us Democrats, the belief in universal health care, the belief in universal education, and then we should be agnostic in terms of how to achieve those values."

His argument Thursday not only will be considered through the prism of the presidential campaign, but weighed against rival Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's ill-fated plan to overhaul the health care insurance system when she was first lady.

Even after leading that calamitous attempt in 1993, Clinton remains in favor of universal health care and has made it a central theme of her presidential bid.

"One of the goals that I will be presenting ... is health insurance for every child and universal health care for every American," she said at a community health clinic in New York Sunday, the day after entering the 2008 Democratic field. "That's a very major part of my campaign and I want to hear people's ideas about how we can achieve that goal."

On Thursday, she criticized Bush's proposal to make health care more affordable through tax breaks, arguing that it would lead to less funding for hospitals.

Addressing the U.S. Conference of Mayors, Clinton was self-deprecating in describing her own experience in the health care debate and joked that Bush would need some heavy-duty protection as he wades into the fight.

"I welcome his participation in the health care debate. I'm going to send him a suit of armor because I know anybody who puts a foot in the health care debate is gonna need that. I've got the scars and experience to show for it," said the New York senator.

Another candidate, Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich, also backs universal health care.

Obama Adopts Universal Health Care As Policy Theme (CQ)

By Marie Horrigan

Congressional Quarterly, January 26, 2007

Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who is mulling a bid for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008, Thursday called on policymakers to overcome the “failure of leadership” and create a universal health care system.

“In the 2008 campaign, affordable, universal health care for every single American must not be a question of whether, it must be a question of how,” he said in a speech at a Washington, D.C., conference on health care issues staged by the nonprofit advocacy organization Families USA.

“We have the ideas, we have the resources, and we must find the will to pass a plan by the end of the next president’s first term,” continued Obama, who railed against what he called the “smallness of our politics — the idea that there isn’t much we can agree on or do about the major challenges facing our country.”

“We can’t afford another disappointing charade in 2008,” he said in prepared remarks. “It’s not only tiresome, it’s wrong.”

Obama has a new platform to discuss these issues, having taken a seat on the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee. But the position he pronounced Thursday is not original to him.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, who chairs that committee, cited universal health care as a top agenda item for the 110th Congress at the panel’s first hearing earlier this month. “We need to find a solution in this Congress, so that every American has guaranteed access to quality care by the end of the decade,” Kennedy said.

His suggestion that such a system could be modeled on a program recently instituted in Massachusetts added a bit of a bipartisan ring to the discussion, as the plan was championed by now-retired Republican Gov. Mitt Romney — himself a prospective candidate for president in 2008.

While Obama’s speech was one of his first major policy statements since he launched his presidential campaign exploratory committee last week, Families USA Executive Director Ron Pollack said his appearance should not be construed as an endorsement by the organization. Families USA, which has a stated goal of getting high-quality affordable health coverage for everyone, has not endorsed a political candidate in its 24-year history.

And Obama is not the only senator addressing the conference. Kennedy is scheduled to speak Friday morning, as is newly elected Sen. Sherrod Brown of Ohio, though neither of them is in the 2008 presidential running.

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton — who has formed her own exploratory committee and is considered a front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination — has her own deep ties to the organization. She addressed Families USA conferences in 2001 and 2005, and the organization strongly supported her efforts in to develop a universal health care system in the 1990s during the presidency of her husband, Bill Clinton.

Families USA, according to Pollack, worked closely with Clinton in her role as first lady and backed her sweeping proposals, which ultimately failed in the face of massive Republican opposition and divisions within Democratic ranks.

Clinton also has seniority over Obama on the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, having joined when she first came to Congress in 2001.

But Obama's ability to garner major media attention lent cogency to his speech Thursday. The first-term senator called for an online medical records system to cut administrative costs, something that he said everyone from Kennedy to Republican former House Speaker Newt Gingrich "believes we should do." He said such a policy would save the nation $600 million a year.

He also called for an examination of the "record-breaking profits" earned by the pharmaceutical and health care industries, and questioned whether the employer-based insurance system was a good fit in today's economy, in which few workers stay with one company throughout their careers.

"This crisis isn't just morally offensive, it's economically untenable," he said.

Obama said he had experts working on his own plan for universal health care, but referenced plans by Oregon Democratic Sen. Ron Wyden and comprehensive state-based plans emerging from places such as Maine, Illinois and California.

· On Kucinich's Turf. Obama has been a media magnet since he caught the public's imagination with his dynamic keynote address to the 2004 Democratic convention and his election to the Senate later that year. At the other end of the attention scale is a longshot Democratic presidential hopeful, Ohio Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich — who happens to have made universal health care a central cause for years.

Kucinich, who unsuccessfully sought the 2004 Democratic nomination, is co-author with Michigan Democratic Rep. John Conyers Jr. of HR 676, the Universal Health Care Insurance Act, which they introduced Wednesday.

Kucinich described the bill as the only plan to address the issues of quality, accessibility and cost. It "stands alone in an increasingly crowded field of efforts to provide health care coverage to all," Kucinich said in a statement.

Last week, Kucinich was named chairman of the new Domestic Subcommittee of the House Oversight Committee, which has jurisdiction over the Department of Health and Human Services and through which the congressman has vowed to address health care issues.

· Rebutting the Madrassa Rumor. Yet if Kucinich is regularly overshadowed in the presidential derby by Obama's star power, he at least has not yet been subjected to personal attacks of the sort Obama already is seeing.

Earlier this week, Obama became the center of a media frenzy as he rebuffed a published report that he had attended a madrassa, or radical Islamist school, while living in Indonesia as a child with his American mother and Indonesian stepfather.

The conservative-oriented Insight Magazine, associated with the Washington Times newspaper, ran a story last week that cited unnamed sources who said Obama spent at least four years at a madrassa. The magazine attributed the allegation — which were subsequently cited on Fox News Channel — to sources within Clinton's presidential campaign exploratory committee, in what one Clinton staffer told CNN was "an obvious right-wing hit job."

CNN, though, sent a reporting team to Indonesia, the nation with the world's largest Muslim population, and debunked the madrassa charge. The network cited numerous sources who said the school Obama attended as a child, though Muslim-run, had a diverse student body and did not engaged in radical politics.

Obama's team fired back Wednesday. "These malicious, irresponsible charges are precisely the kind of politics the American people have grown tired of, and that Senator Obama is trying to change," spokesman Robert Gibbs wrote in a memo distributed

Universal Health Care Pushed By Democrats (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning

Chicago Tribune, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Leading Democratic presidential candidates are showing a passion for ambitious plans to provide health care coverage to all Americans that the party has not shown since the Clinton administration's health plan turned into a political debacle in 1994.

The Republican takeover of Congress that year was credited in part to political opposition to the Clinton health care plan. Since then, Democrats have concentrated on more modest, incremental efforts to expand health coverage, such as subsidized insurance for low-income children and prescription drug coverage for the elderly.

But this year, the three most prominent Democratic presidential candidates all have declared their intention to move the country toward universal health care coverage

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) committed on Thursday to providing health care coverage for every American within six years.

"I am absolutely determined that by the end of the first term of the next president, we should have universal health care in this country. There's no reason we shouldn't have that," Obama said in a speech to Families USA, a liberal health advocacy group.

Former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina declared in announcing his presidential campaign in December that he would back universal health care, even if it required expanding the federal budget deficit.

DOJ_NMG_0122580

And Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who as first lady spearheaded the Clinton administration's ill-fated plan, also has made health care coverage for all a central theme—highlighting her commitment by appearing at a community health care center last weekend, the day after entering the Democratic presidential field.

"One of the goals that I will be presenting…is health insurance for every child and universal health care for every American," Clinton said on Sunday. "That's a very major part of my campaign."

An adviser to one of the Democratic candidates said that health care is among the top concerns of the public, particularly likely Democratic primary voters, and that campaign strategists expect health coverage will be a paramount issue in the struggle for the nomination.

"We expect that it's going to play a bigger role than it ever did," said the Democratic adviser, who declined to be otherwise identified.

Several Republican governors also have recently embraced the goal of health care coverage for all.

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, now a GOP presidential candidate, signed legislation requiring all state residents to get health insurance by July 1 or face a tax penalty, with the state subsidizing insurance for lower-income residents. California Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger kicked off his second term this month with a call to assure health care for all state residents.

In Illinois, Democratic Gov. Rod Blagojevich's All Kids program was the first in the nation to offer state-subsidized health insurance to all children. During his re-election campaign last year and since, Blagojevich has spoken of his interest in moving the state toward a broad universal health care program.

In his speech Thursday, Obama argued that the political climate has shifted since 1994, opening an opportunity for universal health care.

He noted that more employers have dropped private health care coverage since then. Employees with coverage are paying higher premiums and co-payments. And, he said, American companies face greater competitive pressure from foreign businesses that are not burdened with health care costs because their governments provide coverage.

"We are not in 1992. We are not in 1993. We are not in 1994. We don't have to be intimidated," the senator said.

Obama said he would offer a plan for universal health coverage within "several months" and said the goal would be "a top priority" for him.

He otherwise provided few details, though he called for a greater focus on preventive health care to reduce doctors' visits and argued that the country could save on administrative costs by requiring greater use of electronic insurance claims. He said the country should examine "how much of our spending is going toward the record-breaking profits earned by the drug and health care industry."

Obama hinted that he might re-examine the building block of the current health insurance system, in which most workers received group health insurance provided through their employers.

"At a time when businesses are facing increased competition and workers rarely stay with one company throughout their lives, we also have to ask if the employer-based system of health care itself is still the best for providing insurance for all Americans," Obama said.

Asked to clarify the comment afterward by reporters, he said, "I don't think we immediately replace the employer-based system."

He added that he would be looking at such options as broadening employer-based group plans into larger insurance pools and improving the portability of health insurance coverage as employees move in and out of jobs.

Edwards and Clinton also have yet to offer detailed plans on health coverage, but spokesmen for both candidates said they would release proposals in the coming months.

Economist Henry Aaron of the Brookings Institution, a think tank with a liberal leaning, and health-care expert Stuart Butler of the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank, both said establishing universal health care coverage would be enormously difficult.

Butler, who has studied America's health-care system for 30 years, said he supports universal coverage, but that the current system would require drastic overhaul and that the "costs would be staggering." An estimated 47 million Americans have no health insurance.

Aaron, who has been working on reform of America's health-care system for more than 25 years, said the climate for universal coverage has improved, but probably not enough to get very complex legislation passed in the next several years.

To adopt a universal plan is "technically enormously difficult," Aaron said, and would have to take into account that the U.S. has a highly diverse population and a highly diverse health-care system. It would require passage of several pieces of legislation that could take years to get through Congress, he said.

"I am not sure that even a new president and a new Congress can work through those devilish details" in the next presidential term and pass a universal plan, he said. Still, he said, if the supporters of a national plan avoid the mistakes of the Clinton administration, "they've got a shot."

Obama Certain Of His Appeal To Black Voters (CHIT)

By Christi Parsons

Chicago Tribune, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Barack Obama said Thursday that he's not worried about how he will fare with fellow African Americans should he launch a bid for the presidency, as he is expected to do in February.

"If you look at my black vote in my U.S. Senate race or my approval ratings back in Illinois," Obama (D-Ill.) said, "I feel pretty confident that, once folks know who I am, we'll do just fine."

The remarks came as some detractors have been quietly asking whether Obama, a biracial Harvard-educated lawyer, will prove "black enough" to black voters in a national election. The son of a white American mother and a black Kenyan father, Obama represented a mostly black district in the Illinois state Senate and won with a healthy African American vote when he ran for the U.S. Senate in 2004.

The remarks came after a meeting with Rev. Al Sharpton, the African American activist and one-time presidential candidate from New York, in which the two talked about civil rights concerns and other issues they'd like to see debated in the 2008 campaign.

Demonstrating his flair for drawing a media crowd, Sharpton circulated a schedule of Democratic presidential hopefuls he planned to visit on Capitol Hill early in the day, with the guaranteed media draw, Obama, last on the list.

"We talked about issues and policy, about 21st Century civil rights concerns that we both share," Sharpton said after meeting with Obama. "We're trying to get the process beyond just the surface stuff."

Sharpton hasn't announced his own intentions for 2008 and, after the meeting, said he hasn't chosen a candidate among Democrats now seeking the office.

"I'm not making any endorsements today," Sharpton said.

Standing with Sharpton after their meeting, Obama gestured to a portrait of Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall on the wall of his office, saying he and Sharpton are both beneficiaries of Marshall's legacy.

"Rev. Sharpton emphasized his hope that any presidential candidate is speaking to the issues of the dispossessed, and that his number one priority is making sure that we get those on the agenda," Obama said.

"I think he's right to do that and I assured him that I not only want to hear his views, … but that publicly any of us who step into this fight for the nomination have to be held accountable and speak to these issues. "

Sharpton Sizes Up 2008 Contenders (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, January 26, 2007

Democrat Al Sharpton said Thursday he's waiting to see how the 2008 presidential field shapes up before deciding whether to declare himself a candidate.

The civil rights activist spent the day on Capitol Hill, meeting with the four Democratic senators who are pursuing the presidency _ Chris Dodd of Connecticut, Joe Biden of Delaware, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois. Each met privately with Sharpton in their office.

"I'm not making any endorsements today," Sharpton, who ran in 2004, told reporters at the end of his meeting with Obama.

Obama said the two talked about their shared agenda of fighting for the dispossessed. "I assured him that I not only want to hear his views and thoughts and policy recommendations, but publicly any of us who step into this fight for the nomination have to be held accountable and speak to these issues," he said.

Sharpton said they talked about economics, health care and education issues. "We are going to keep talking and he knows I'm talking to everybody," he said.

The normally loquacious Sharpton was unusually curt and cut off further questioning by saying he was behind schedule. But he told reporters who followed him that he would decide about his own candidacy "once I see what these guys do or don't do."

Former Rep. Harold Ford Jr., has some advice for his friend Sen. Barack Obama: Don't be afraid to take your presidential campaign anywhere in this country, no matter what the racial politics.

Ford lost a close bid last fall to become the first black senator from a Southern state since Reconstruction. Some blamed the loss in Tennessee on racial politics, but Ford said Thursday other factors, including a rival who spent his own money, contributed to his defeat.

He said Obama, son of a white mother and an African father, can't control how his race will affect his candidacy.

"As long as he works hard, is honest ... and is not afraid to take his message anywhere in the country, he'll do fine," Ford said. "He can't try to predict what other people may think or may do. All he can do is run the campaign that he's capable of running.

"Do I think the fact that he's black will be a factor in his campaign? Probably," Ford said. "It would be a factor if two white guys were running. People talk about race regardless, so race is an issue that we deal with in America. I don't think that will be a central part of his campaign at all."

Ford spoke to reporters over lunch on his first day as chairman of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council. Ford is replacing former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who stepped down to run for president.

Ford said he plans to remain neutral in the 2008 race because of his new position, but he is particularly close to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Obama.

WASHINGTON (AP) _ Hollywood moguls Steven Spielberg, Jeffrey Katzenberg and David Geffen are throwing a fundraiser for Sen. Barack Obama's presidential campaign next month.

Some 700 invitations to the $2,300-per-head event at the Beverly Hilton Hotel went out this week, Andy Spahn, political adviser to Katzenberg and Spielberg, said Thursday. Katzenberg, Spielberg and Geffen are the founders of the DreamWorks movie studio.

Katzenberg has endorsed Obama, but Spielberg, a longtime supporter of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, hasn't made up his mind. Geffen also has not publicly endorsed a candidate.

"There are many people in this community who will support multiple candidates, but this certainly is evidence off the serious credibility and strength of Obama's candidacy," said Spahn, rejecting the suggestion the fundraiser was a slight to Clinton.

The Feb. 20 event will be followed by a private dinner at Geffen's house for donors who have committed to raising $46,000.

As president, Bill Clinton had a famously affectionate relationship with Hollywood, and the goodwill _ and deep pockets _ transferred to Sen. Clinton. Celebrities such as Barbra Streisand, Jennifer Lopez and Chris Rock donated to her Senate races in 2000 and 2006.

Clinton spokesman Phil Singer said Spielberg and other major Los Angeles donors, including producer Steve Bing, media mogul Haim Saban, supermarket magnate Ron Burkle and investment banker Sim Farar, will be co-hosting a fundraiser for the New York senator in the spring.

Sharpton Goes To Washington To Talk To Party's '08 Hopefuls (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — The Rev. Al Sharpton, a man who says he knows a well-tailored suit from a fake, went to the United States Senate on Thursday to do some comparison shopping, meeting separately with four Democrats who are seeking the 2008 presidential nomination to discuss civil rights.

One purpose of the visit, two New York advisers and confidants of Mr. Sharpton said, was to send a signal to Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois and a fellow African-American, that he should not take for granted the political support of Mr. Sharpton, a power broker in New York politics and a presidential candidate in 2004.

Indeed, Mr. Sharpton sounded far from sold on Mr. Obama on Thursday night after their meeting in the senator's office, where Mr. Obama had them pose for a picture beneath a portrait of Justice Thurgood Marshall of the Supreme Court.

"I left the meeting a little curious, feeling that he was noticing our civil rights agenda, but I didn't understand what his civil rights agenda is," Mr. Sharpton said.

Mr. Obama and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, with whom Mr. Sharpton also met, are expected to compete fiercely for black votes.

"I'm not endorsing anyone at this point," Mr. Sharpton said, "but she has more of a civil rights program laid out. And I always know where I stand with her. She is always accessible and welcoming."

DOJ_NMG_0122583

No candidate's schedule was too important for them to miss the meeting: Mrs. Clinton was waiting to speak at a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing on Iraq when the time for her appointment with Mr. Sharpton came and went. So one of her aides escorted Mr. Sharpton to an office near the hearing room, and Mrs. Clinton left the discussion about troop levels in Baghdad to meet him.

Mr. Sharpton and Mrs. Clinton met behind closed doors for 15 minutes, then emerged with big smiles. Mrs. Clinton seemed surprised to see a dozen reporters waiting; Mr. Sharpton had sent out two news releases, one at 2 a.m. on Thursday, with his itinerary.

"I'm delighted that Reverend Sharpton is here today to talk about issues that are important to our country," Mrs. Clinton said as they stood in a Senate hallway. "His commitment to the 21st-century civil rights agenda is one that I share."

Mr. Sharpton said, "I'm very happy my hometown senator is in the race."

Mrs. Clinton declined to take questions and zipped back to the hearing, while Mr. Sharpton hung back with reporters for a few minutes.

Asked who he favored among the Democratic candidates, he said, "We're talking." He said the conversations dealt with criminal justice issues and Hurricane Katrina, among other things.

Mr. Sharpton also met with Senators Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, and plans to meet soon with former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina and Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico, all of whom are seeking the presidency.

Mr. Sharpton also said he would decide this spring whether to run for president again in 2008.

Sharpton: Step Up Or I'll Run In '08 (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, January 26, 2007

The Rev. Al Sharpton yesterday threatened to again seek the Democratic presidential nomination unless current contenders, including four senators he visited on Capitol Hill, commit to focusing attention on civil rights issues.

Mr. Sharpton, a New York-based activist and perennial candidate for various posts, said strong attention must be placed on affordable housing, access to wealth, retirement security, health care and education.

"If somebody picks up a strong agenda, I won't. But if not, maybe, and we'll see or we should see by late spring or the summer if someone does," Mr. Sharpton said.

Mr. Sharpton's comments came as he visited Democratic Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, Barack Obama of Illinois and Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, the four senators seeking the party's nomination.

Mrs. Clinton after speaking with Mr. Sharpton said she is in lock step to deal with "21st-century civil rights issues" such as those Mr. Sharpton is backing.

"These are issues important to our country and ... an agenda that I support," she said.

Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama are the front-runners in recent polls and considered the two strongest candidates by most political pundits. Many pundits think that the pair will need to court Mr. Sharpton's endorsement and his help on the campaign trail to secure votes from black voters.

Standing next to the New York minister in front of a painting of renowned Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall, Mr. Obama said the two men have benefited from the movement Mr. Marshall energized when, as a lawyer for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, he won the 1954 Brown v. Board of Education case that barred segregation in schools.

"Hopefully the work that we do will benefit generations to come; he wants the candidates to speak to the issues of the dispossessed. And I think he is right to do that," Mr. Obama said.

Mr. Sharpton entered the 2004 presidential race to put issues of police brutality and racial profiling, poverty, limited access to education and health care at the forefront and to denounce the war in Iraq. He said far too many Democrats were "acting like elephants in donkey jackets," referring to the overwhelming support by the party's members of Congress to authorize the war.

While most pundits wrote off his campaign, he placed third in the polls in South Carolina and second in the District's nonbinding primary. He also gave what was regarded as one of the best speeches at the 2004 Democratic National Convention.

But after the election, Mr. Sharpton began a new campaign working with evangelical ministers to expand their activism with Republicans against abortion and homosexual "marriage" to also address such issues as poverty, equal opportunity and rebuilding New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina.

"It was shocking, beyond shocking, that the president did not mention New Orleans or Katrina in the State of the Union address, because they are members of the Union still suffering daily with issues of poverty and despair," he said.

Mr. Sharpton said that this campaign is the reason why his first stop in Washington yesterday was at the office of Mr. Dodd, chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs.

He said Mr. Dodd "is in the best position to work on" the minister's concerns about such issues as access to capital, diversity among heads of pension funds and the practice of redlining -- where minority neighborhoods pay more for goods and services, particularly bank interest on loans.

"Those issues are ones that he as the committee chairman can affect now, and also out on the campaign trail as a presidential candidate, so that was a very important meeting," Mr. Sharpton said.

Sharp Decline In Union Membership In '06 (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

Union membership dropped sharply last year in the United States, as the percentage of manufacturing workers in unions fell below the percentage of all American workers in unions for the first time in modern history.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported Thursday that union membership fell by 326,000 in 2006, to 15.4 million workers, bringing the percentage of employees in unions to 12 percent, down from 12.5 percent in 2005. Those figures are down from 20 percent in 1983 and from 35 percent in the 1950s.

Work force experts said the decline in union membership was caused by large-scale layoffs and buyouts in the auto industry and other manufacturing industries, together with the labor movement's difficulties in organizing nonunion workers fast enough to offset those losses.

In manufacturing, which had long been the heart of organized labor, the percentage of workers in unions sank to 11.7 percent, from 13 percent. Perhaps the brightest spot for labor was the extent of government workers in unions, 36.2 percent, although that, too, was down, from 36.5 percent in 2005.

Union leaders have long said that for organized labor to turn around, it must reverse the decline in membership in the private sector. But the percentage of private sector workers in unions continued to fall last year, slipping to 7.4 percent — the lowest percentage since the early 1900s. In 2005, the private sector percentage was 7.8 percent.

At a news conference on Wednesday, the A.F.L.-C.I.O. pointed to polling results showing that 53 percent of nonunion workers said they would vote to join a union tomorrow if they could.

"Sixty million Americans say they would join a union tomorrow if they could — that's far more than the 15.4 million now in unions," said Stewart Acuff, the A.F.L.-C.I.O.'s organizing director. "What's stopping them is employer resistance."

With the Democrats in control of Congress, labor unions hope they can reverse their decline by persuading Congress to enact the Employee Free Choice Act, which would give workers the right to unionize through an easier, less antagonistic method — signing pro-union cards.

But many business groups favor the current system in which employers can insist on using secret-ballot elections to determine whether a majority of workers want to join a union.

Business groups assert that elections are fairer, while labor unions assert that elections often involve employer intimidation of workers and the firing of union supporters.

Billions Pledged For Lebanon Government (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 26, 2007

World powers pledged $7.6 billion in loans, donations and other help Thursday for a fragile Western-backed government in Lebanon that faces ruinous debt and paralyzing sectarian street violence.

Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Saniora took a risk by leaving his fortified compound in Beirut to attend a one-day conference on developing ways to help Lebanon recover from last summer's war between Israel and Hezbollah and address its $40 billion in debt.

As the donors met in Paris, government and opposition supporters clashed at a university campus back in Beirut in new violence spilling over from Lebanon's political crisis. The army, struggling to restore order, imposed a nighttime curfew. At least three people were killed and dozens injured.

Saniora told the Paris conference his nation was on the verge of a deep recession.

"Your support will be essential in seeing Lebanon through," Saniora told the conference. "The cost of failure is too great to contemplate."

DOJ_NMG_0122585

Saniora stands between the West and Iranian-backed Hezbollah militants trying to bring down his government. Thursday's conference had an urgent tone, with some diplomats and leaders hoping to give Saniora tangible bargaining power in his power struggle with Hezbollah.

"I think this goes beyond the wildest dreams of everyone for the success of the conference," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said of the pledge total. "I think when people really started thinking about what was at stake here ... they decided that this statement had to be made," she said in an interview with The Associated Press.

Rice announced $770 million in new U.S. aid, more than three times the Bush administration's previous commitment.

The United States regards Hezbollah as a terrorist organization. U.S. law forbids funding for terror groups, restrictions that led to a cutoff of direct U.S. aid for the Palestinian government following the election victory of the Hamas militants exactly a year ago.

The Bush administration has since found ways to segregate money for the Western-backed Palestinian President, Mahmoud Abbas, but it is not clear what the administration would do if the Saniora government falls in Lebanon.

Rice would not give a direct answer when asked if an elected Hezbollah-led government could still collect the U.S. pledge.

"We are dealing with the duly elected government of Lebanon, of Prime Minister Saniora," Rice said at a press conference. "I don't have any desire to get into hypotheticals about Lebanon's future."

Saniora is fighting for his political life against Hezbollah, a military and political organization that has organized deadly street protests.

The Hezbollah-led opposition demands a share of power in the Cabinet and effective veto on key decisions, or it wants the government ousted and new elections held. Saniora has refused to quit or cede power. The opposition's six ministers in the 24-member Cabinet quit in November.

The opposition has been camped out in front of the prime minister's office in downtown Beirut and staged several protests to press its demands since Dec. 1.

Uncertainty over Lebanon's political future did not appear to hold down pledges, estimated before the conference at about $5 billion. Much of the money is tied to promised financial reforms in Saniora's government.

The host, French President Jacques Chirac, played auctioneer, pressuring participants to give. He gently chided Japan for not giving more than $11 million.

"Be brief, be good and be generous," he said at one point, as the more than 40 nations and financial institutions took turns in announcing their aid.

Saudi Arabia said it would commit $1 billion in development funding and an additional $100 million as a direct grant to the Lebanese government. France, a former colonial power in Lebanon, put forward $650 million, much of it in loans. The European Union committed $522 million in loans or aid.

British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said the conference sent a signal of political as well as economic support for Saniora's government and his proposals to reduce public debt.

"This government does have a credible reform program," she told reporters.

Saniora's critics said donors would worsen Lebanon's debt and be pouring good money after bad.

Lebanon's $40 billion in state debt is equivalent to about 185 percent of its annual economic output, making it one of the world's most indebted nations.

Tiny Lebanon had experienced promising economic growth in the past decade, as the scars faded from a 15-year civil war. But much of the progress was undone by the summer war with Israel, which wasted towns in southern Lebanon, and by weeks of political deadlock that have closed shops and businesses.

Lebanon's economy is nearly at a standstill, with jobs, capital and trained workers leaving for better prospects overseas. This was the third in a series of Paris donor conferences since 1998. A separate session in Stockholm, Sweden, in August netted pledged of about $1 billion for postwar reconstruction.

Lebanon _ a country of 4 million people, 17 religious sects, an educated class and a free-market economy _ has historically been a Middle East battleground.

Iran and the United States had a proxy conflict in Lebanon in the 1980s when a series of kidnappings and suicide bombings in Beirut, blamed on pro-Iranian militants, killed more than 270 Americans. The United States pulled its Marines from the city.

Beirut Riots Cast Shadow Over Aid Pledges (FT)

An international donor conference in Paris at which $7.6bn was committed to support Lebanon was overshadowed on Thursday by renewed political violence in the increasingly divided country.

The clashes in Beirut were sparked by a fight between pro-government and opposition supporters at the city's Arab University, and then spread to the institution's environs in a predominantly Sunni neighbourhood. Four people were shot dead in the clashes.

The Lebanese army clamped a night curfew on the capital, seeking to quell Sunni-Shia tensions in a country still recovering from a 1975-90 civil war.

It was the second outbreak of violence in Beirut this week and came against the backdrop of political instability in Lebanon following last summer's conflict between Israel and the Islamist Hizbollah movement. Since a United Nations-backed ceasefire came into force in August, the government of prime minister Fouad Siniora has been under pressure to cede more power to Hizbollah and its Christian allies, which are seeking early elections.

The opposition has been running a protest campaign since December aimed at bringing down the Sunni-led pro-western government, which has a parliamentary majority.

Thursday's fighting pitted Sunni against Shia. There were reports that snipers fired from rooftops. Violence on Tuesday, which was triggered by a Hizbollah-enforced general strike and left three dead, was mainly between rival Christian groups.

It was not clear if the clashes, which involved groups of young men brandishing clubs, were triggered by provocation designed to coincide with the donor conference or whether they erupted spontaneously as a result of increasing sectarian tensions, which have led to fears that the country could slide back into civil war.

Both Sunni and Shia blamed each other for the violence and Sayyed Hassan Nasrallah, Hizbollah leader, later told supporters to leave the streets and co-operate with the army.

Jacques Chirac, French president, who organised and chaired the Paris conference, on Thursday openly backed Mr Siniora, stressing the legitimacy of his government, "put in place by democratic elections".

The donor conference was intended to aid the country's reconstruction after last summer's war, as well as address its crippling debt of $40.5bn (€31.2bn, £26.7bn), equivalent to 180 per cent of gross domestic product. Both Mr Siniora and the French president emphasised that the international support was for "all the Lebanese".

But given the increasing political divisions in the country, it is difficult to know how much of the money raised at the conference will be delivered or how the government will be able to implement the economic reforms much of the funding is predicated on.

Big new commitments of support came from the International Monetary Fund and the European Investment Bank (EIB) as well as the US, Europe, Saudi Arabia and other Arab countries.

A Lebanese official said $800m of the $7.6bn was expected to be in the form of grants and almost $2bn was scheduled to be disbursed during 2007.

Mr Chirac praised the economic reform programme that Mr Siniora presented to the conference, elements of which have been criticised by Hizbollah and other opposition groups.

The French president and others linked long-term international aid to implementation of the reforms.

Saudi Arabia pledged $1bn, on top of substantial earlier commitments, while the IMF and the EIB pledged more than $2bn. On Wednesday the European Union committed an extra €400m ($520m, £265m) and France announced €500m in soft loans. Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, confirmed a US pledge announced a day earlier of $770m in new aid.

Other Arab countries, including Kuwait, Qatar and other Gulf states, pitched in with hundreds of millions of dollars each.

Aid Conference Raises $7.6 Billion For Lebanon (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

PARIS, Jan. 25 — Led by Saudi Arabia and the United States, international donors from more than 30 countries on Thursday pledged $7.6 billion in aid for Lebanon, in a bold effort to try to prop up the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora.

But even as Mr. Siniora was shaking hands and thanking world leaders in Paris for exceeding the conference's goal of $5 billion, there was chaos back in Lebanon. Four people were shot dead and 150 wounded in clashes between groups supporting the government and protesters aligned with the Hezbollah-led opposition. Both sides appealed for calm.

The clashes in Lebanon this week, which came just as Mr. Siniora sought to present his country as ripe for investment, were another embarrassment to the prime minister, who has been fighting to keep his government afloat. The political faction led by Hezbollah and backed by Iran and Syria has been calling for his resignation for more than two months.

Lebanon is a battlefield in a larger proxy war. The United States, its Sunni Arab allies and Europe, all represented at the conference, are on one side. Iran and Syria are on the other, backing Hezbollah as it seeks to increase its power. They have been giving an estimated $40 million a month to Hezbollah and other groups in Lebanon, analysts say. The money available to rebuild towns and communities damaged in Hezbollah's war with Israel last summer is seen as pivotal to winning the support of the Lebanese people.

Saudi Arabia, which is seeking to counter the rising influence of Iran in the Muslim world, led the pledges for the government on Thursday with a promise of $1.1 billion in loans and grants. The United States pledged $770 million in loans and grants, bringing to $1 billion the amount it has pledged to the government of Mr. Siniora since September.

The donors in Paris took pains to deflect criticism that their aid pledges were solely meant to prop up Mr. Siniora. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, when asked whether the United States pledge was contingent on Mr. Siniora remaining in power, deflected the question.

Mr. Siniora, seated beside Ms. Rice during an early morning news briefing, quickly interjected, "No conditions, no conditions." Ms. Rice replied that the money was for the Lebanese people.

"Clearly this is a package that is for Lebanon, and that is extremely important to understand," she said. "Lebanon is a democracy. That said, Lebanon is also undertaking some important economic reforms that are critical to making any of this work, and it's not at all unusual that donors expect that those reforms are going to continue, in fact, as the donor community responds to the needs."

When pressed later on whether the American funds would be cut off if Hezbollah gained control of the Lebanese government, she said she did not want to discuss "hypotheticals."

"As you know, Hezbollah is considered a terrorist organization by the U.S.," she said.

The European Union offered $522 million in loans and other aid, while France separately promised $650 million in loans.

The conference, in the Kleber Conference Center near the Arc de Triomphe, had a somewhat surreal air. One after another, foreign dignitaries at a conference table announced, in French, Arabic and English, how much money they were willing to put forward.

"Be brief, be good and be generous," President Jacques Chirac of France, the host, exhorted the group before the event.

The World Bank offered $1 billion in loans, grants and other aid. The European Investment Bank offered $1.2 billion, and the Islamic Development Bank followed with $250 million.

Lebanon is hobbled from the economic and political impact of the Israel-Hezbollah war, and reconstruction efforts have been burdened by the country's $41 billion public debt.

On Tuesday, groups opposing Mr. Siniora's government essentially shut down the country, staging protests in Beirut, blocking roads with burning tires and setting off clashes that killed three people and left more than 130 wounded. Thursday's clashes added to the burdens of Mr. Siniora, whose survival thus far, Lebanon analysts say, is attributed not only to his support from about half of the country, but also to his strong international support.

Even with the $7.6 billion in donations and pledges, Mr. Siniora will still return to Lebanon with a battle on his hands as he tries to establish an international tribunal that could eventually implicate Syria in the assassination of Rafik Hariri, a former Lebanese prime minister who was an outspoken critic of Syria.

Syria occupied Lebanon for 30 years but was forced to withdraw its troops after Mr. Hariri's death. The United States has accused Syria and Iran of trying to bring down the Siniora government to wreck plans for the creation of an international tribunal to try suspects in the case.

$7.6 Billion In Assistance Pledged To Lebanon (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

PARIS, Jan. 25 -- The embattled Lebanese government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora won more than $7.6 billion in pledges of financial assistance Thursday from international donors eager to help rebuild the war-ravaged country, stabilize its economy and improve the security situation.

The package -- including pledges of grants and loans totaling $1.1 billion from Saudi Arabia and $770 million from the United States -- is a major boon for Siniora, whose government has been buffeted since early December by a Hezbollah campaign to topple it.

The power struggle intensified Tuesday when Hezbollah and its allies enforced a nationwide strike that paralyzed the country and sparked sectarian clashes, leaving three people dead and more than 100 injured. Four people were killed in renewed clashes Thursday at Beirut Arab University and other locales, officials said.

Against that backdrop, leaders from 36 countries and 14 international agencies gathered here to express their support for Siniora's democratically elected government and its attempts to implement economic reforms, ease a $41 billion debt burden and rebuild vast areas of Lebanon that were demolished last summer during Israel's 33-day war with Hezbollah. Lebanese officials estimate war damage at $3.6 billion.

"I'm going back really pleased with the level of financial support shown today," Siniora said. "This is for all Lebanon and all the Lebanese."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "The conference today was a very important expression of the international community's intention to stand by Lebanon and the Lebanese people in these difficult times."

Rice would not say whether U.S. money would be delivered if Hezbollah -- an Iranian- and Syrian-backed Shiite Muslim group that the United States has labeled a terrorist organization -- succeeded in overthrowing Siniora's government and came to power, calling it "speculation."

C. David Welch, assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, told reporters in Paris on Wednesday, "We are not going to support people who launch wars and try to bring down governments with the benefit of outside assistance. . . . That's just not going to happen."

French President Jacques Chirac, who hosted the conference and pledged $650 million in low-interest loans to Lebanon, said international support depended on a Lebanese "national consensus on economic and social reforms imperative for the future of the country, and on the implementation of those reforms as soon as possible."

At least $464 million of the funds pledged by the United States would be directed to military aid or security measures, according to a State Department official, quoted by news services, who briefed reporters traveling with Rice.

That included $220 million in military aid to the Lebanese government for the purchase of small arms, ammunition, spare parts and other hardware; $184 million for U.N. peacekeeping forces in southern Lebanon; and $40 million for internal Lebanese security services.

About $250 million in a cash reserve would be released to the Lebanese government as it met targets for reforms that Siniora has pledged to implement to help restore fiscal stability and stimulate the economy. Lebanon's $41 billion debt is equivalent to about 180 percent of its gross domestic product, and about half of the country's annual budget is spent servicing it.

Among the measures the government has promised are to raise the value-added tax from 10 to 12 percent, reduce state subsidies for fuel and privatize the electricity and telecommunications industries.

The U.S. funds, which are subject to approval by Congress, are in addition to $230 million that Washington pledged at an August conference in Stockholm and represent a significant increase in U.S. financial assistance to Lebanon, which in years past was as low as $2 million a year.

Beirut University Dispute Escalates Into Rioting, Killing 4 (NYT)

By Nada Bakri And Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Jan. 25 — Violence erupted in Beirut on Thursday for the second time in three days, as an altercation in a university cafeteria escalated into rioting and gunfire.

The army declared a rare night curfew throughout the city amid fears that Lebanon’s two-month political crisis had entered a violent phase.

At least four people were shot dead — two supporters of the government and two of the opposition — and 150 were wounded in street fighting that began with a scuffle in the student cafeteria at Beirut Arab University in Tariq Jadidah, a Sunni neighborhood. It spilled into the street, and men arrived and started shooting as each side apparently summoned reinforcements.

Vanloads of antigovernment protesters arrived. They smashed cars parked in the university lot and on adjacent streets, setting them on fire and burning tires.

Arriving Lebanese soldiers fired into the air and used tear gas and stun grenades to try to disperse the crowds, but with little success. In some instances, soldiers stood on sidewalks or took cover in their armored personnel carriers, watching the violence.

Members of the March 14 movement, supporting the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, accused the soldiers of giving the Shiite protesters, most of them backers of Hezbollah, free rein to go on a rampage.

“They allowed them into the neighborhood, they are scared of them,” a pro-government protester said.

Others accused Saad Hariri, the leader of the Future Movement a Sunni party that supports the government, of abandoning the residents of the area by not arming them.

DOJ_NMG_0122589

"Animals, they are animals," said Abdallah Tassi, in tears, as his car burst into flames. He directed his anger at Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, the Hezbollah leader. "Nasrallah is a liar," he said. "He pretends to be the enemy of Israel, but really he is the enemy of the Sunnis."

The air filled with thick smoke as tires burned and young men hurled stones and shouted epithets.

"The blood of the Shiites is boiling, boiling!" shouted one opposition member, as he watched the fighting.

Television stations run by each side of the political divide blamed the other side for the violence, while leaders on each side urged calm.

Hezbollah supporters were seen firing M-16 rifles, while members of the Future Movement were observed firing pistols. Hezbollah men carrying the group's trademark walkie-talkies mingled among the rioters and managed the crowds.

"Let them get their anger out," said one Hezbollah member, his radio held close to his mouth.

Some witnesses reported seeing shots fired from roofs. Government supporters said opposition snipers had fired at them from buildings.

Sheik Nasrallah, in a prerecorded message released Thursday night, contended that his group had uncovered information that snipers were brought into the country in recent days by "pro-government militias." Hezbollah's marksmen have long been a point of pride for the group, which used them to great advantage against advancing Israeli soldiers in the summer war with Israel.

Government loyalists also hurled incendiary devices at an office of a pro-Syrian party nearby, setting the building on fire, witnesses said.

But by nightfall, all Lebanese leaders appealed for calm.

Sheik Nasrallah issued a fatwa, or edict, telling his followers to leave the streets and restore calm. The Future Movement urged its supporters to show self-restraint and calm.

Mr. Siniora, at an aid conference in Paris, called on all the parties "to return to the voice of reason."

Nabih Berri, leader of the Shiite Amal party and speaker of Lebanon's Parliament, said, "What everyone should do now is halt the strife." He added, "We must all remain united or we will find our country in the graveyard of history."

Tensions remained high Thursday night, even as the fighting ebbed.

Sheik Nasrallah "wants us to wait until they kill us; he does not want to give us weapons!" an opposition member shouted. "Where is he, why isn't he giving us weapons?"

Rival Groups Clash In Beirut Streets (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

BEIRUT, Jan. 25 -- The Lebanese army imposed a curfew on the capital Thursday after hundreds of government supporters and foes wielded rocks, molotov cocktails and sometimes guns in street battles that dragged on past nightfall. Four people were killed and 150 wounded, officials said, many of them soldiers who at times stood helplessly between the two sides.

The clashes, which began in a university cafeteria and spread to the surrounding neighborhood of Tariq Jedideh, offered a bitter contrast to the optimism of an international conference in Paris, where more than $7.6 billion was pledged to help Lebanon's economy recover from last summer's war between Israel and the Shiite Muslim movement Hezbollah.

As the grants and loans were announced in Paris, bursts of gunfire echoed along the airport road here and columns of black smoke rose from burning cars. The clashes were some of the worst since Lebanon's 15-year civil war ended in 1990 and followed violence Tuesday that left three people dead.

Hundreds of Hezbollah followers, in red and blue helmets, poured into Tariq Jedideh, a Sunni neighborhood, many of them carrying sticks and chains. At one point, their opponents burned a Hezbollah banner, an act that spoke to the jarring rise in tension between Sunni Muslims, largely aligned with the government, and Hezbollah supporters since the crisis began two months ago.

The army and security officers deployed in force after the clashes erupted, but often fired into the air or simply gave way. For hours, crowds surged at each other, then retreated, usually separated by soldiers crouched behind armored personnel carriers. More clashes ensued elsewhere, as Sunni crowds firebombed the headquarters of a party allied with Hezbollah and Shiite youths rampaged along a downtown street lined with bank headquarters.

The images reverberated across Beirut, uneasy since Dec. 1, when Hezbollah and its allies began their campaign to topple the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora with a mass protest in the downtown area. The overburdened cellphone network was paralyzed. In the streets, there were grim reminders of the civil war: Swaggering young men asked residents whether they were Sunni or Shiite; cars were attacked because of their owner's sect; and both sides questioned whether the army could protect them.

"It's going to get worse. Look at all this," said Salah al-Sheikh, a 40-year-old Sunni resident, waving his hand toward a block of incinerated or smashed vehicles, the street littered with rocks, sticks and shattered glass. "A few days ago, they were in the same schools and the same universities. Look what's happening now. Why? That's all I want to ask. Why?"

Behind him, another Sunni resident shouted, "Give us weapons! Give us weapons!"

Across the street, Shiite crowds set fire to cars and released the emergency brakes of buses, letting them slam into concrete walls. Traffic signals were broken; street signs and an iron gate were torn down.

"Let them blow off steam," said an older, bearded man, dressed in the traditional black of Hezbollah's security force.

The fighting was an episode, writ small, of an increasingly precarious Middle East, riven by growing sectarian tension, simmering civil conflict here and in the Palestinian territories, and a deepening war in Iraq that followed the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. Leaders across the political divide called on their supporters to exercise restraint. Lebanese officials said the army insisted that all sides agree to a curfew before it declared its start at 8:30 p.m.

"I call on everyone to return to the voice of reason," Siniora said from Paris, where he attended the aid conference.

Hasan Nasrallah, Hezbollah's leader, issued a religious edict to his followers to withdraw. "This is an order on everyone," he said.

Nabih Berri, the speaker of parliament, whose Amal movement is allied with Hezbollah, warned that events were spiraling out of control: "We must all be united or we have to look for our country in the graveyard of history."

Almost from the beginning of the current crisis, many in Lebanon have predicted that only bloodshed would force a break in the deadlock between the government, supported by the United States and France, and an opposition led by Hezbollah, supported by Iran and Syria. Since then, the struggle -- effectively splitting the country into two camps divided by sect, ideology, perspective and loyalty to leaders -- has escalated. On Tuesday, Hezbollah, Amal and their Christian allies, who are led by Michel Aoun, enforced a nationwide strike by blocking thousands of roads with tires, uprooted trees and barricades of dirt and dumpsters.

As Thursday's battles raged, the country's politicians frantically called one another. Lebanese officials said Berri and Walid Jumblatt, a Druze leader allied with the government, spoke for the first time since the crisis began. All agreed to try to quiet the streets, although no initiative emerged. After the curfew took effect, the army said the streets were largely calm.

The battles began around noon with an argument between Shiite and Sunni students in the cafeteria of the Beirut Arab University. Each side accused the other of provocation, but within 15 minutes, university security officers separated the two groups. Sunni students said one of their own was then attacked on campus. Shiite students said the army tried to evacuate female students. As they left, Sunni students hit them and ripped off their veils, Shiite students said.

The fighting spilled into the tense Sunni neighborhood of Tariq Jedideh. Shiite students said that residents threw rocks and that at least three people fired on them from balconies. Mohammed Abdel Satir, a 21-year-old engineering student, said he and others then called Hezbollah officials, who dispatched men in trucks and vans.

"We don't trust the Lebanese army, and we saw this today with our own eyes," he said as he stood near knots of female students, some of them crying. "It's Hezbollah's duty to protect us. The government is not protecting us anymore."

The arrival of hundreds of Shiite residents inflamed tensions. Battles spread through the surrounding streets, with the airport road serving as a front line. Troops fired tear gas; at other times, they stood idly next to rock-throwing protesters.

"The blood of Shiites is boiling!" young men shouted.

Sunni residents urged the army to push back the Shiite crowds.

"Attack them!" one man yelled at the soldiers, his face contorted in anger.

Along the street, gunfire crackled into the night. Some Sunni residents tossed molotov cocktails into a parking lot, where young Shiite men had wrecked dozens of cars. Others threw rocks, some of them hitting soldiers.

"They came to our turf," said Mohammed Kraim, 23. "We want to face them with guns," he added. "This isn't fair."

Security Council Sees Hope For Mideast (AP)

By Sarah Dilorenzo

AP, January 26, 2007

Security Council members are optimistic that a key meeting next month on the Israel-Palestinian conflict will help revive the stalled peace process, Russia's U.N. ambassador said Thursday.

The so-called quartet of Middle East peace brokers _ the U.S., the European Union, Russia and the U.N. _ will meet in Washington on Feb. 2 to explore ways of reinvigorating peacemaking.

Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said there was hope that the meeting would lead to a wider international conference to end the conflict.

DOJ_NMG_0122591

"There was a strong feeling that there were some signs of hope, which should be fully taken advantage of by the international community," Churkin told reporters after a Security Council meeting on the situation in the Middle East.

"Maybe not in such a long run, this process could culminate in an international conference, which needs to be well prepared, but which would bring about a long-awaited settlement of the situation in the Middle East," he said.

A "road map" for peace launched by the quartet in 2003 never got off the ground because each side failed to meet its initial obligations. The plan outlined stages for creating a Palestinian state alongside Israel.

However, there has been flurry of diplomatic activity in recent weeks to revive the peace process, including a meeting Thursday between Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and Palestinian Mahmoud Abbas in Davos, Switzerland.

Churkin said key to next month's meeting will be helping the Palestinians form a unity government.

Abbas, of the more moderate Fatah party, has been locked in a power struggle with the Islamic militant Hamas, which won control of the Palestinian parliament in elections last year. Dozens of people have been killed in fighting between the rival factions.

Abbas has been pushing for a unity government partly as a bid to end Western sanctions imposed on the Hamas-led government for its refusal to renounce violence and recognize Israel's right to exist.

Ibrahim Gambari, undersecretary-general for political affairs, told the Security Council that despite the sanctions, aid to the territories rose nearly 10 percent in 2006 over the previous year.

Gambari said more than half of the aid had come from Arab countries. Some Western countries have continued to fund humanitarian programs for the Palestinians, but the aid bypasses the government in keeping with the embargo.

Despite the increase in aid, Gambari said the territories' GDP per capita fell by at least 8 percent in 2006 and poverty rose by 30 percent.

Without a revived peace process, Gambari said, "the most that aid can do is contain for a limited time the spread of grievances and the spread of instability."

Time Has Come For Mideast Peace : Abbas (AFP)

AFP, January 26, 2007

Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas and Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni shared hopes for a revived Middle East peace process, with Abbas calling for talks to begin straight away.

"The time has come for us .. to make peace a reality," Abbas told an audience at the annual meeting of business and political leaders in Davos.

"We are ready, as of now, to start serious negotiations with our Israeli neighbours," he said during a discussion in which he and Livni shared a stage with Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres.

"The map (to peace) is there, we have all agreed to it. I am convinced we can reach a quick solution," Abbas added.

The United States is due to host a meeting on February 2 of the diplomatic Quartet, whose 2003 "roadmap" for achieving Palestinian statehood and peace with Israel has languished since its inception.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said during a week-long trip to the Middle East and Europe earlier this month that she planned to "accelerate" implementation of the roadmap put forward by the United States, European Union, United Nations and Russia.

Abbas is expected to meet Rice and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert next month.

Speaking after the Palestinian president, Livni was more circumspect about the timetable for a possible resumption of the road map, even as she stressed the need for both sides to stick to the vision of two states living side by side.

"The Palestinian state is not an illusion, its feasible, it's there, it's achievable," Livni said. "The establishment of a Palestinian state and homeland for the Palestinians is the answer, the national answer to the Palestinians wherever they are."

At the same time, Livni stressed that Israel would never "allow" a Palestinian state that was "ruled by a terrorist organisation."

Abbas and his secular Fatah party are locked in a power struggle with the radical Islamic movement Hamas, which controls the Palestinian government and has refused to recognize Israel.

At WEF, A Pledge For Mideast Peace (AP)

By Paul Haven

AP, January 26, 2007

Israel's foreign minister reached out to the Palestinian president in an emotional speech Thursday as she sat next to him at the World Economic Forum, saying lasting peace is the dream of her government and her people, and promising that a future Palestinian state is "not an illusion. It's there, it's achievable."

DOJ_NMG_0122592

Tzipi Livni made clear, however, that her government would not compromise on its need for security and urged Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas not to compromise with extremists, a reference to the militant Hamas government's refusal to disavow its call for the destruction of Israel.

But Livni also made a personal and impassioned plea for dialogue to begin, turning to face Abbas.

"I would like to negotiate, to speak, to meet, to talk," she said. On finding peace, she said: "There is nothing I want more ... this is part of our dream, this is part of our goal."

Abbas, for his part, said he was confident the peace process could be put back on track. "We are ready as of now to start serious negotiations," he said during the public session. Afterward, the two warmly shook hands. They are to meet one-on-one at a hotel on Friday.

"We are creating this momentum ...to put the train on the track and push it after that," Abbas told The Associated Press.

Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert are scheduled to hold three-way talks next month with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, although a date and place have not been set.

The renewed efforts to jumpstart peace talks have come amid widespread worry in recent weeks that unless progress is made, the Mideast in general will continue to deteriorate.

The pledges by Livni and Abbas followed pleas from Israeli and Palestinian youth, speaking via satellite from Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and the West Bank city of Ramallah, that their leaders end the long conflict.

Many in the crowd of some of the world's most powerful business and political leaders seemed deeply moved by their words.

The tone was a sharp departure from the somber mood that took hold of Davos a year ago, when Israeli and Palestinian delegates were stunned by news of the Hamas electoral victory in Palestinian elections. At the time, many predicted 12 months of pain lay ahead for the region, and they were right.

The year brought violent Palestinian infighting and crippling Western sanctions targeted at Hamas that have hit ordinary Palestinians hard. Progress in talks between Israel and the Palestinians ground to a halt in the months after Hamas's victory.

Livni made clear that Hamas was still an obstacle.

"Compromising with extremists will not promote anything, but it can lead to further stagnation," she said, addressing Abbas.

Abbas said he was hopeful that talks with Hamas could result in a unity Palestinian government, despite violence between Hamas militants and his Fatah supporters. He reiterated that he would call early elections if the talks failed but gave no specifics.

"We will fight for this (unity) government. Otherwise, if we totally fail, we will go to early elections," he told the AP.

Abbas met earlier in the day with German Chancellor Angela Merkel, who told reporters that she wished Abbas success in his efforts to form a unity government, but added that "Europe should not overestimate its role" in restarting any broader talks on peace.

Abbas and Olmert met last month to discuss confidence-building measures that would allow the sides to return to the negotiating table, abandoned more than six years ago.

While the Israeli-Palestinian issue provided the day's most dramatic moment, the forum was also an occasion for interesting, quirky and sometimes high-level meetings. In one small corridor early Thursday, UNICEF executive director Ann Veneman _ a former secretary of agriculture in the Bush administration _ had a brief, warm reunion with former Iranian President Mohammad Khatami. Veneman said the two had met previously at a forum on promoting interfaith understanding.

At another forum, a Saudi princess, a Jewish Orthodox rabbi and Khatami talked about Muslim-Christian misunderstandings and the Israeli-Palestinian crisis.

Rice's Strategic Reset (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

What's America's strategy in the Middle East? Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice this week sketched a new framework based on what she calls the "realignment" of states that want to contain Iran and its radical Muslim proxies.

In an interview Tuesday, Rice summarized the new strategy that has been coming together over the past several months. Although many of its elements have been previewed in recent weeks by commentators such as Columbia University scholar Gary Sick, Rice's comments were an unusually detailed public explanation of the new American effort to create a de facto alliance between Israel and moderate Arab states against Iranian extremism.

Rice said the new approach reflects growing Arab concern about Iran's attempt to project power through its proxies: "After the war in Lebanon, the Middle East really did begin to clarify into an extremist element allied with Iran, including Syria, Hezbollah and Hamas. On the other side were the targets of this extremism -- the Lebanese, the Iraqis, the Palestinians -- and those who want to resist, such as the Saudis, Egypt and Jordan."

DOJ_NMG_0122593

America's recent show of force against Iran -- seizing Iranian operatives in Iraq and sending additional warships to the Persian Gulf -- was part of this broader effort to reassure the Saudis and others that, despite its troubles in Iraq, America remains a reliable ally against a rising Iran. "The U.S. has to demonstrate that it is present in the Gulf, and going to be present in the Gulf," Rice told me.

Realignment is linked with a new U.S. effort to forge peace between Israel and the Palestinians. Rice is encouraging both sides to explore "final-status issues" -- such as borders, the status of Jerusalem and the right of Palestinian refugees to return to a homeland -- rather than remain deadlocked over the so-called road map.

The effort to contain Iranian-backed pressure took on new urgency this week, as Hezbollah's campaign against the government of Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora spawned a spasm of violence that left at least four dead. America, France and Saudi Arabia quickly organized a $7.6 billion financial rescue package for Siniora, but that hasn't stemmed the rising sectarian tension in Lebanon between Sunnis who back Siniora and Shiite supporters of Hezbollah.

Critics may see Rice's realignment strategy as another high-risk roll of the dice by the Bush administration in a region that is already polarized by the Iraq war and sectarian conflict. These critics may also question the central role of Saudi Arabia, a conservative Islamic monarchy that many Arabs regard as a bastion of the status quo.

"The reception will be very skeptical" among some Arabs, cautioned one prominent official who is normally among the most pro-American in the region. "Increasing the fault line between Sunnis and Shiites is a mistake," he argued. State Department officials would counter that it was Iran that moved the fault line by encouraging Hezbollah's provocative behavior in Lebanon.

The Bush administration's thinking about realignment helps explain why it has resisted engaging Syria and Iran, as recommended by the Baker-Hamilton report. As Rice put it, "You have a 'pan' movement, across the region. The war in Lebanon crystallized it for everyone. You can't just leave it there. . . . If you concentrate on engaging Syria and Iran, you may lose the chance to do the realignment."

On Syria, Rice said the administration is seeking a change of policy rather than regime change. Asked about an offer made in an interview with me last month by Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem to help the U.S. provide greater security in Iraq, she said: "If the Syrians want to stabilize Iraq, why don't they do it?" As for Israeli interest in exploring the Syrian initiative, she noted recent private peace feelers between Syrians and Israelis and suggested that if the Israelis decide there is something important, they will pursue it.

The administration's tougher stance against Iran arguably has already produced some results. Iran's firebrand president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, appears to be in political trouble with the ruling mullahs, in part because his reckless talk alienated other Muslims. But the strongest leverage against Iran appears to be the West's unified diplomatic coalition. "The Security Council resolution [condemning Iran's nuclear program and mandating mild sanctions] has had more of an effect than I thought it would," Rice said.

The realignment strategy poses as many questions as it answers -- not least the anomaly of supporting Sunni resistance to Iran at the same time the U.S. augments its military support for a Shiite-led government in Iraq. But as with any strategy, Rice's realignment idea has the virtue of offering a basis for discussion and careful thinking about a region perched on the edge of a volcano.

U.N. Agency Defers N. Korea Programs (AP)

By Alexandra Olson

AP, January 26, 2007

The U.N. Development Program agreed Thursday not to approve new projects in North Korea until an external audit addresses U.S. allegations that the agency has funneled millions of dollars to the communist regime in violation of United Nations rules.

U.S. deputy ambassador Mark Wallace alleged Friday that the UNDP's North Korea operation had been run "in blatant violation of U.N. rules" for years. He demanded an outside audit focusing on concerns that development funds had been used by Pyongyang for "its own illicit purposes."

The audit, announced Monday by U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, is expected to last three months.

UNDP assistant administrator Ad Melkert said the agency also agreed to end cash payments to the North Korean government and local suppliers and to stop hiring staff recruited by Pyongyang. The United States had complained about both practices, which Melkert said would stop by March 1.

The UNDP said it will be responsible for implementing all North Korean projects, addressing U.S. complaints that authorities in the North had been responsible for carrying out certain initiatives.

DOJ_NMG_0122594

The U.S. welcomed the new steps.

"We're pleased with the approach that the UNDP administrator has laid out," acting U.S. Permanent Representative Alejandro Wolff told reporters.

North Korea said it would accept the steps, though it condemned them as an attempt to "politicize the system" of the UNDP _ a stance echoed by the representatives of Russia and Cuba.

Japan, however, applauded the agreement and went a step further. It said the U.N. should stop providing aid to North Korea except for humanitarian assistance "directly delivered to the people" because Pyongyang had defied Security Council demands that it end its nuclear program.

Wolff said the Japanese argument was "compelling" and that the U.S. would consider it.

U.S. officials said the United States already withholds its contributions to the UNDP and other U.N. agencies that provide funds to North Korea.

Ban's spokeswoman, Michele Montas, said Monday the audit will initially focus on UNDP spending in North Korea and then be expanded to other U.N. agencies.

The agency said it welcomed the external audit, stressing it was committed to operating in a transparent manner.

U.S. officials said they first received indications there might be irregularities in UNDP's North Korea program last year. They raised concerns the cash might be misused, possibly for Pyongyang's nuclear program.

The U.N. Security Council imposed sanctions on North Korea on Oct. 14 for conducting a nuclear test.

North Korean delegate Jang Chunsik called the U.S. allegations "nonsense," insisting the UNDP's activities in his country had been "conducted in a transparent way."

Wallace has made several allegations in letters to senior UNDP officials, which were first reported by The Wall Street Journal. He has said that UNDP's local staff is dominated by North Korean government employees who managed the agency's programs and finances in violation of UNDP rules.

The U.S. cited three other violations of U.N. rules _ the government's insistence that UNDP pay cash to North Korean government suppliers, and UNDP's failure to oversee projects it funds in the country or to audit its programs.

On Monday, the agency sought to refute the allegations, insisting the North Korean program followed UNDP financial rules. UNDP Administrator Kemal Dervis said there is "no justification for the extreme allegations" made by Wallace, adding that UNDP was "doing its best in very difficult circumstances."

UNDP spokesman David Morrison said the agency has spent about $3 million annually in the last 10 years on programs in impoverished North Korea, in addition to about $600,000 in office costs, which include local salaries and supplies. The programs focus on food production, rural and environmental sector management, economic management and social sector management.

Morrison said UNDP international staff have visited nearly all their project sites in the past two years to ensure funds are being used appropriately.

The UNDP has conducted three internal audits of its North Korean program in the last eight years, the last in 2004. Another internal audit was scheduled for this year, Morrison said.

N Korea Bows To Audit Of UN Agency (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, January 26, 2007

North Korea agreed on Thursday to an external audit and tighter rules for the UN Development Programme's operation in the country, after US allegations that the agency was funnelling hard currency to Pyongyang.

The UNDP's executive board adopted the measures after Washington's concerns were leaked last week to the press and Ban Ki-moon, secretary-general, called for a sweeping investigation into UN agencies.

Approval of a future UNDP programme will be contingent on the audit's findings.

The board agreed to end direct payments in hard currency, to stop the hiring of North Korean government officials, and to cease support to government ministries. Officials said the UN would still need to buy local currency through the central bank.

One diplomat said the decision could herald for the UN a new approach to doing business with autocracies under international scrutiny. It would also inject transparency into UN agencies, which operated under different rules from the secretariat and had refused to make internal audits available, the diplomat said.

Pyongyang, which sits on the 36-member board, went along with the decision and did not force the issue to a vote, even though it dismissed the allegations as politically motivated.

Russia, Cuba, Guatemala and Bangladesh expressed discomfort at the singling out of North Korea and warned that the decision should not set a precedent. Cuba described the decision as an effort to "introduce manipulation" to UN development activities.

DOJ_NMG_0122595

But Japan argued that the UN should not give aid other than humanitarian assistance to a country that has rejected two UN Security Council resolutions – an argument the US found “compelling”.

In a letter sent on January 16, Washington alleged that “at least since 1998 the UNDP [North Korea] programme has been systematically perverted for the benefit of the Kim Jong Il regime – rather than the people of North Korea”.

Some commentators said the situation bore echoes of the UN’s Iraq oil-for-food scandal.

But one UNDP official asked why it had been singled out when other UN agencies and governments operated in a similar way in North Korea.

U.N. Program Facing New Curbs In N. Korea (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, January 26, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 25 -- The U.N. Development Program's executive board decided Thursday to stop paying for its local staff and supplies in foreign currency, and to call for the U.N. General Assembly's board of auditors to determine within three months whether the development agency violated its own guidelines by doing so.

The board also decided to delay approval of the program's 2007-2009 budget until the audit is finished.

The action comes just weeks after the United States charged that the U.N. program had been "systematically perverted" by channeling millions of euros in hard currency to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il's repressive government. Alejandro D. Wolff, the acting U.S. ambassador, expressed concern Thursday that the money could be used to finance North Korea's illicit activities, including a nuclear weapons program.

The debate over the United Nations' oversight of its North Korea operations coincides with renewed calls for the Development Program to pull out of North Korea.

Japan said the United Nations should end its development assistance to North Korea, citing the country's defiance of two U.N. Security Council resolutions calling for an end to its nuclear weapons program. The United States -- which has stepped up efforts to cut off hard currency to Pyongyang after its October test of a nuclear device -- said it is considering supporting Japan's position.

"A member state that does not comply with the obligations of the U.N. Charter should not receive funds from [the] United Nations," said Koji Tsuruoka, director general for global affairs in Japan's Foreign Ministry. "Assistance to such a country should be limited to that of a humanitarian nature directly delivered to the people."

North Korea's delegate, Jang Chun Sik, said that the board's decision was "unfair and unacceptable" and that it was designed to further U.S. and Japanese efforts to "isolate and stifle" North Korea's people.

Russia, China and scores of developing countries voiced concern that the board was responding to political pressure from its most influential powers and they insisted that it should not set the stage for audits of other poor countries.

The Development Program is one of four U.N. agencies, including the World Food Program and UNICEF, that carry out development and relief work in North Korea. They are required to hire government-appointed workers and pay salaries through state-controlled offices.

The program's operations in North Korea, which are managed by eight international workers, cost about $3.7 million, according to its figures. Between $1.5 million and $2.5 million of that is spent each year inside North Korea, including hundreds of thousands of dollars to pay for local staff, supplies and accommodation, according to program officials. Last year, it spent more than $1 million in salaries, rent and travel costs, as much as half of which was distributed through government-controlled agencies, according to a spokesman.

Thursday's action will freeze all development operations managed by the North Korean government, including training programs in trade and international finance. It also calls for more extensive monitoring of assistance programs and bans the recruitment of government-selected workers.

Mark D. Wallace, the U.S. representative for U.N. management, said the United States would press the World Food Program, UNICEF and the U.N. Population Fund to follow suit and stop using foreign currency to pay staff and hiring government-selected employees in North Korea.

U.S. officials have privately pressed the Development Program to ask the auditors to hire a private firm to conduct an independent review of its operations. They expressed concern that the auditing board had previously failed to flag problems in the North Korea program.

"We need a fresh set of eyes," Wallace said.

Less Cash For Kim (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0122596

The case of U.N. hard currency for Kim Jong Il continues to evolve, with the Executive Board of the United Nations Development Fund agreeing yesterday to suspend new operations in North Korea until an audit can be completed and provide better oversight of existing programs.

Most UNDP meetings are snoozefests. But yesterday's got lively, after the U.S., Japan and other countries requested the "deferral" over concerns that tens of millions of dollars in hard currency have been funneled to Kim's dictatorship. A compromise deal requires that projects in progress adhere to UNDP rules regarding hard currency, staff and on-site visits. Projects managed by Pyongyang will be handed over to the UNDP, which will restrict activities to those that directly improve the lives of North Koreans and get out of the business of helping the government.

Dragged along kicking and screaming were the North Koreans, whose delegate condemned "the distorted and fabricated allegations made by the U.S. through its media." This was a tad ungracious, since his business class airfare to New York was paid by the U.N. But no doubt he had orders from Pyongyang, where a Foreign Ministry spokesman asserted that "The U.N. operations in North Korea are conducted in a transparent manner and meet U.N. regulations." Yes, so "transparent" that U.N. officials have been barred from visiting some of the "project" sites.

Meanwhile, U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki Moon issued a statement this week elaborating on the "urgent, system wide and external inquiry" into "all" activities of U.N. funds and programs that he promised last Friday. The good news is that he is moving swiftly on North Korea, ordering a full investigation within three months.

The disappointing news is that Mr. Ban appears to be stepping back from his larger reform promise. It's understandable that he'd want to limit his audit order in some fashion; investigations of every nook and cranny world-wide would take years. But that's no justification for defining "external" audits as those done by the U.N.'s own Panel of Auditors and its subset, the Board of External Auditors. These are the same auditors who found nothing suspicious in the Oil for Food program.

There's nothing to prevent the U.N. from hiring outside audit firms to look at specific problems. Oil for Food was investigated by the Volcker Commission, which devoted half its budget to a forensic audit by Deloitte Touche. An independent task force investigating procurement has also hired AON Corp. for forensic auditing.

Also troubling is that Mr. Ban's elaboration appears to limit the audits to "hard currency transactions, independence of staff hiring, and access to reviewing local projects." Those are key problem areas, to be sure. But the auditors should be free to follow the trail wherever it takes them. We also hope the audit will include other U.N. programs in North Korea that operate under the same rules as UNDP, including Unicef, the Population Fund and the World Food Program.

It's good to see the cash for Kim programs reined in. But to realize his promise of making the U.N. more transparent, the new Secretary-General has to keep pressing and bring in the outside auditors.

New India Accords With Russia Include More Nuclear Power Plants (NYT)

By Amelia Gentleman

New York Times, January 26, 2007

NEW DELHI, Jan. 25 — India sealed a wide-ranging package of agreements with Russia on Thursday, the first day of a summit meeting intended to demonstrate that their longstanding relationship had not deteriorated as a result of India's growing engagement with the United States.

In a joint statement issued after President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia met with Prime Minister Manmohan Singh of India, Russia offered to build four new nuclear power plants in India, in addition to the two reactors it is already building here.

"Energy security is the most important of the emerging dimensions of our strategic partnership," Mr. Singh said. "Russia's position as a global leader on energy issues is widely recognized."

As India's economy booms, the prospect of growing energy shortages has become a major driver of its foreign policy. Describing Russia as a "special friend" of India, Mr. Singh added that despite the "sea change" that had occurred in international affairs over the past decade, "Russia remains indispensable to India's strategic interests."

This was Mr. Putin's first visit to India since the United States agreed to cooperate with India on its civilian nuclear power program last year, and the Indian government was at pains to show that the agreement had done nothing to dilute the warmth of India's affection for its historic partner, Russia.

Mr. Singh went to the airport to meet the Russian leader as he stepped off his plane, a pointed gesture of respect previously extended only to President Bush and King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia.

Mr. Putin will be the guest of honor at India's Republic Day celebrations on Friday. Much of the weaponry on display will be Soviet-made, a testament to the earlier close friendship between the countries in the 1970s and 1980s.

Pentagon Eyes Missile Defenses In Eastern Europe (WT)

By Bill Gertz

DOJ_NMG_0122597

The Washington Times, January 26, 2007

The Pentagon is moving rapidly to build new missile defenses in Poland and the Czech Republic to counter the threat posed by Iranian long-range missiles, the head of the Missile Defense Agency said yesterday.

"The immediate threat in terms of emerging threats that we see is obviously the Iranians, and they're putting a lot of energy into that [long-range missile] program," said Air Force Lt. Gen. Henry "Trey" Obering, the agency's director.

The three-star general said plans call for deploying 10 long-range anti-missile interceptors in Poland along with a tracking radar in the nearby Czech Republic by 2011 or 2012.

"We want to have this in place by the 2011, 2012 time frame because we think the Iranians, for example, shortly thereafter will be able to have a long-range capability," he said.

The Iranian long-range missile threat is emerging, and as a result "it's prudent for us to be thinking about that now and to begin to build toward that so we're in a position that we can do something about it in that time frame," Gen. Obering said.

The Eastern European missile defense site will cost about $3.5 billion and is part of a global integrated missile defense designed to counter "rogue" nations' missiles, including those from Iran and North Korea, he said.

The Polish interceptor base will be the third global long-range missile interceptor base and will be similar to the current base at Fort Greeley, Alaska, where 14 interceptors are deployed. A second U.S. missile defense base at California's Vandenberg Air Force Base now has two interceptors. Both sites will have 24 or 25 by the end of the year.

Gen. Obering sought to calm Russian fears that the European-based interceptors will be capable of shooting down Russian long-range missiles. He said the interceptors pose no threat to Russian intercontinental ballistic missiles because they cannot intercept either the large numbers of Russian ICBMs, nor will they be capable of chasing them successfully from the Polish location.

Russia is opposing the Polish and Czech sites, and Moscow officials have threatened to take unspecified action to counter the interceptors.

Iran has no long-range missiles, but its Shahab-3 medium-range missiles, with ranges of 620 miles, are thought capable of reaching some parts of Europe.

Iran is working on Shahab-4, Shahab-5 and Shahab-6 missiles that have ranges from 1,240 miles to 4,154 miles, which also could be used as nonmilitary space launchers.

"We see what's happening right now in Iran, we know that they have a very aggressive test program that they have demonstrated in public, and they have avowed themselves that they are going to obtain a space launch capability," Gen. Obering said.

The magazine Aviation Week & Space Technology reported on its Web site last night that Iran was poised to take that very step: launching a satellite into space.

A recently assembled 30-ton ballistic missile turned space launcher "will liftoff soon" with an Iranian satellite, the magazine quoted Alaoddin Boroujerdi, chairman of the Iranian parliament's National Security and Foreign Policy Commission, as saying during a speech to religious students and clerics in Qom.

Gen. Obering said that once Iran succeeds in building a space launch vehicle, "you have demonstrated all the basic building blocks for a long-range ICBM capability, in terms of staging, controlling a vehicle through the staging and burns."

"All indications are they are working to be able to achieve that," he said.

On China's recent anti-satellite weapons test, Gen. Obering said it does not pose an immediate threat to the space-based elements of the U.S. missile defense system. But in the long term it could pose a threat, he said.

Iran Set To Try Space Launch (AVWEEK)

By Craig Covault

Aviation Week, January 26, 2007

Iran has converted its most powerful ballistic missile into a satellite launch vehicle. The 30-ton rocket could also be a wolf in sheep's clothing for testing longer-range missile strike technologies, Aviation Week & Space Technology magazine reports in its Jan. 29 issue.

The Iranian space launcher has recently been assembled and "will liftoff soon" with an Iranian satellite, according to Alaoddin Boroujerdi, the chairman of the Iranian parliament's National Security and Foreign Policy Commission.

The move toward an independent space launch capacity is likely to ratchet up concern in the U.S. and Europe about Iran's strategic capabilities and intents. Orbiting its own satellite would send a powerful message throughout the Muslim world about the Shiite regime in Tehran.

U.S. agencies believe the launcher to be a derivation of the 800-1,000-mi. range Shahab 3 missile. A Shahab 3 fired from central Iran could strike anywhere in Israel, Saudi Arabia, the entire Persian Gulf region and as far west as southern Turkey.

DOJ_NMG_0122598

There are concerns in the West that space launch upgrades, however, could eventually create an Iranian intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM) with a range of nearly 2,500 mi., giving Tehran the ability to strike as far as central Europe, well into Russia and even China and India.

The U. S. Defense Intelligence Agency has told the Congress that Iran may be capable of developing a 3,000-mi. range ICBM by 2015.

"But ultimately, their space program aims to orbit reconnaissance satellites like Israel's "Ofek," using an Iranian satellite launcher from Iranian territory, says Uzi Rubin, the former head of the Israel Missile Defense Organization. Rubin made his assessment in a report for The Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs.

"A reconnaissance satellite of reasonable performance should weigh about 300 kg. [660 lb.] Once Iran learns how to put 300 kg. into earth orbit, it could adapt the satellite launcher into an ICBM that could drop more than 300 kg anywhere in the world.

Boroujerdi's made his remarks about the imminent Iranian launch in a speech before a group of religious students and clerics in the city of Qom near where Iran has conducted some of its ballistic missile tests. Iran is now in the midst of military exercises that include a series of shorter-range missile tests, Iranian officials say.

Although designed as a technology demonstrator, the planned satellite launch would be a potent political and emotional weapon in the Middle East.

The new space launcher and ongoing missile development is also significant in that it highlights close technological ties between the Iranian and North Korean missiles programs, intelligence agencies agree.

Analysts at the strategic think tank GlobalSecurity.org believe that the new Iranian modification could be a stepping stone to an Iranian clone of the North Korean Taep'O-Dong 2C/3 ballistic missile that failed in a launch attempt from North Korea last July 4.

A November 2006 Congressional Research Service report reinforced concerns over Iranian and North Korean missile development ties. It notes that Israel's military intelligence chief has information indicating that North Korea has shipped to Iran eighteen 1,500 mi. range BM-25 ballistic missiles capable of carrying a nuclear warhead.

"Largely with foreign help, Iran is becoming self-sufficient in the production of ballistic missiles," says the report's author, Kenneth Katzman. And he reminds that a 2006 U.S. National Security Strategy Document notes, "The United States may face no greater challenge from a single country than Iran."

U.S. Military Rejects Russian Worries (AP)

By George Gedda

AP, January 26, 2007

Proposed U.S. missile defense sites in Poland and the Czech Republic will not affect Russian security but will be designed to intercept missiles planned by Iran that would be capable of reaching Eastern Europe, a senior defense official said Thursday.

Air Force Lt. Gen. Henry A. Obering, director of the Missile Defense Agency, rejected Russian claims that the U.S. plan would upset the security balance. Russian officials have warned of the possibility of countermeasures.

Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov said Wednesday that U.S. systems being considered could not be directed against Iran because that country has no intercontinental ballistic missiles and will not have any in the future.

Obering, speaking to reporters in a telephone briefing, said that while Iran poses no long-range threat to Eastern Europe today, "we have to stay ahead of what we think that threat is."

Beyond that, Obering said, the interceptors the United States plans for Poland and the Czech Republic are insignificant compared with Russian capabilities.

"There is no way, shape or form that 10 interceptors can neutralize the hundreds of missiles in the Russian arsenal," Obering said. "I can't be any more plain than that."

He said U.S. defense officials have traveled to Russia to explain U.S. intentions and plan more such consultations in the future.

Asked if Russia would be allowed to send observers to the sites, Obering said, "We have nothing to hide. But any invitation would be subject to consultations with the host governments."

The $3.5 billion program for Poland will be completed in 2011 or 2012, Obering said.

At one point, he said the program will be designed to deal with "rogue nations," but he mentioned no country in that category besides Iran.

A Polish journalist asked whether any compensation would be paid to the country in exchange for Poland's willingness to serve as a host missile defense country. Obering said no such benefit is planned because the project will enhance Polish security.

He added that the United States has other Eastern European countries in mind if negotiations with Poland and the Czech republic over terms of the deployments are unsuccessful.

China's successful antisatellite-missle test Jan. 11 carries potential implicationsÂ for the international community, which has collectively placed at least 316 satellites within the missile's proven range (528 more orbiters, such as GPS and early-warning satellites, fly even higher). At issue are military surveillance satellites--the very ones that detected Beijing's test--which represent only 6% of the total number but almost all of which fly within reach. Until now, only Russia and the U.S. have downed space objects, and despite Beijing's assurances that the test was not adversarial, the U.S. sees a threat to its spy satellites--and a possible catalyst to a space arms race. Venezuela May Ask U.S. Envoy To Leave (AP)

By Christopher Toothaker

AP, January 26, 2007

President Hugo Chavez warned Thursday that the U.S. ambassador could be asked to leave the country if he continues "meddling in Venezuela's affairs."

The outspoken Venezuelan leader lashed out after William Brownfield said U.S. companies and investors must receive a fair price for their shares of Venezuela's largest telephone company when Chavez's government nationalizes it.

"If you continue meddling in Venezuela's affairs, first of all, you are violating the Geneva agreements and getting yourself involved in a serious violation and could ... be declared a persona non grata and would have to leave the country," Chavez.

The top American envoy to Venezuela told Caracas' Union Radio the planned takeover of CA Nacional de Telefonos, or CANTV, should proceed "in a transparent, legal manner" and that Venezuela's government must offer "fair and quick compensation to the people who are affected or the owners."

"These are the only obligations that a government has when it decides to nationalize an industry," Brownfield added.

U.S. officials have accused Chavez of becoming increasingly authoritarian and of being a destabilizing force in Latin America. The Venezuelan leader has repeatedly accused Washington of scheming against his left-leaning government.

Virginia-based Verizon Communications Inc. holds the largest minority share of CANTV, which was privatized in 1991. The takeover jeopardizes an agreement by Verizon to sell its 28.5 percent stake in CANTV to a joint venture of America Movil and Telefonos de Mexico SA, controlled by Mexican billionaire Carlos Slim.

The sale had been awaiting Venezuelan government regulatory approval.

Chavez, a self-proclaimed "revolutionary" who is steering Venezuela toward socialism, has said he wants an immediate state takeover of the telephone company and will not pay shareholders the market value. The Venezuelan leader has said the price for CANTV would take into account debts to workers, pensions and other obligations to the state.

Brownfield said he was optimistic that shareholders would be fairly compensated.

"I think it can be a process that concludes in a satisfactory manner for all those involved, that's my hope," he said.

Chavez _ a close ally of Cuban leader Fidel Castro _ also has said he plans to nationalize the electricity sector, and take state control of four lucrative oil projects and the natural gas sector.

Relations between Caracas and Washington have been tense since Chavez was briefly ousted in a 2002 coup that he claimed the U.S. played a role in. The Bush administration has repeatedly denied involvement, although it recognized an interim government established by coup leaders.

Brownfield said he wanted to improve relations through "a serious and pragmatic dialogue between the two governments, to identify issues of mutual interest and to look for solutions to those issues."

Legislation Would Relax Cuba Policy (WT)

By Steve Hirsch

The Washington Times, January 26, 2007

Legislation to chip away at the Bush administration's hard-line Cuba policy is in the works in the House, where Republicans and Democrats are planning a variety of measures aimed at easing the U.S. policy on Cuba.

The first bill, which would lift the ban on Americans traveling to Cuba, was introduced yesterday by Rep. Jeff Flake, Arizona Republican.

DOJ_NMG_0122600

The Cuban economic embargo, which dates to the 1960s, allows cash sales only for food, medicine and medical equipment and restricts travel to the island.

U.S. citizens are generally barred from travel to Cuba without a specific license, although there are exceptions for working journalists, researchers and some others. Permits for visits to immediate family members in Cuba may be issued every three years.

The measures to ease the policy will be filed as stand-alone legislation or as amendments to appropriations bills or other legislation.

Mr. Flake, who introduced his bill with House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat, said that nearly 50 years of the current policy have "done little" to bring democracy to Cuba.

Instead of aiding democratic reform, the policy has given Cuban President Fidel Castro "a convenient scapegoat for his own regime's failures," Mr. Flake said.

Rep. Bill Delahunt, Massachusetts Democrat, plans legislation to ease restrictions on Cuban-American family travel.

Other possibilities include legislation to ease payment restrictions for cash sales of food to Cuba.

Rep. Jerry Moran, Kansas Republican, is planning to introduce one such payment-regulation bill next week. He said Wednesday that stand-alone Cuba legislation is more likely to reach the House floor now than under Republican leadership, partly because Republican leaders were adamantly opposed to dealings with Cuba.

President Bush's continuing tough stance toward Havana, however, means that a full-scale lifting of the Cuba embargo could encounter a veto threat.

Rep. Jo Ann Emerson, Missouri Republican, who plans to co-sponsor Mr. Moran's proposal, said that Congress may be able to make some changes in the Cuba policy, but that even with a new Democratic majority, any such changes would be "pretty incremental."

Mr. Rangel criticized Mr. Bush as being "locked into punishing Castro," but suggested that Mr. Bush would not veto bills that have Republican support.

"He's in enough trouble for the war that the best he can look for is trying to be able to accomplish something among Republican members. He owes them big time," Mr. Rangel said.

The White House had no comment on the bills yesterday. National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe only said: "Our Cuba policy is unchanged."

The bills come as the state of Mr. Castro's health remains a mystery.

Mr. Castro, who has not been seen in public since July, has temporarily handed over power to his younger brother, Raul, but it is not clear whether a permanent succession would result in a fundamental change in Cuba's government.

Some observers have suggested recently that Fidel Castro's departure from the scene might not cause any fundamental change in Cuba's political system.

Earlier this month, a senior U.S. intelligence official told congressional intelligence panels, "Raul Castro is firmly in control as Cuba's acting president and will likely maintain power and stability after Fidel Castro dies, at least for the short term."

Army Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, told the committees that the younger Castro "has widespread respect and support among Cuban military leaders who will be crucial in permanent government succession."

Blueprint Sees Kosovo As Ward Of EU (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Mark Turner

Financial Times, January 26, 2007

The special UN envoy charged with negotiating the future status of the Serbian province of Kosovo plans to submit his compromise recommendations on Friday, with Nato peacekeepers braced for a backlash from ethnic Albanians demanding full independence.

Martti Ahtisaari, a former Finnish president, has already disclosed that his proposal “foresees strong international civilian and military presences within a broader future international engagement in Kosovo”.

In effect, Kosovo would be given the attributes of independence but remain under the wing of the international community, diplomats said. Neither “independence” nor Serbia’s continued sovereignty are expected to be mentioned. Ultimate authority will be transferred to a special representative of the European Union from the United Nations, which has administered the province since Nato intervened in 1999 to stop Serbia’s campaign of ethnic cleansing.

Mr Ahtisaari will also set out provisions for the protection of minority rights, in particular for the Serbs living mostly in small enclaves.

DOJ_NMG_0122601

After submitting his report to the six-nation Contact Group in Vienna on Friday, the UN envoy, who was appointed in November 2005, will take the report to Belgrade and Pristina on February 2. Neither side is expected to embrace the plan, but both are under intense pressure not to reject it outright.

The formula of supervised independence is similar to the status given to Bosnia in 1995, except that the concept of sovereignty in Kosovo's case will remain vague.

Analysts said the Bush administration did not appear to have the political will to take on Russia over the issue, perhaps because of other priorities needing Moscow's acquiescence, namely Iran, North Korea and energy security.

"I think there are all sorts of possibilities which can be there, if the parties get into creative discussions," Vitaly Churkin, Russia's envoy to the UN, told the FT, indicating Moscow's willingness to continue along this tack.

Russia has previously said it would block an effort at the UN Security Council to recognise Kosovo as a breakaway sovereign state against the will of Belgrade.

A senior US official said Mr Ahtisaari would propose "a very generous package" to protect the Serb minority and the ancient Orthodox churches that remain a powerful symbol of Serbia's national identity.

The Right Muddle For Kosovo (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2007

HERE'S A PLACE you probably haven't thought about much in the last seven years: Kosovo. But the Balkan province is about to make a comeback bid for your attention, and not necessarily in a good way.

The former Yugoslavia, a steaming kettle of ethnic and religious resentments, has been comparatively peaceful since the wars of the 1990s — not because the region's territorial disputes have been settled but because NATO has kept a close watch on the stove (in the case of Kosovo, with 16,000 troops). But an upcoming United Nations ruling on Kosovo's bid for independence from Serbia stands to set the burner on high.

Kosovo, a province the size of Connecticut, has about 2 million residents, 90% of them ethnic Albanians. It was an autonomous region within the Yugoslav federation until 1989, when Slobodan Milosevic jump-started his career as dictator by asserting Belgrade's authority over what is, for Serbs, a land of nationalist importance. The crackdown led to a Kosovar rebellion nine years later that was ruthlessly suppressed until halted by NATO bombardiers. The region has been under U.N. supervision while the international community fumbles for a more permanent settlement.

That U.N. blueprint will be unveiled privately today in Vienna to the six-nation Contact Group that sets policy for Kosovo — the U.S., Britain, France, Germany, Italy and Russia. Leaked pieces of the plan seem a bit of a mess. It is expected to propose "supervised autonomy," a sort of "independence lite," watched over by an international monitor. Kosovo will reportedly be allowed to join international organizations such as the U.N. and the World Bank and even maintain a tiny army. But the minority Serb population would largely be self-governed, with direct links to Serbia.

The plan isn't going to please many in proindependence Kosovo, and next to no one in pro-federation Serbia. Anticipation of an unfavorable U.N. recommendation probably helped the ultranationalist Radicals — led by a Serb awaiting a war crimes trial in The Hague — win the most votes of any party in Serbia's recent elections.

Yet flawed and temporary as it is, the U.N. compromise is the only practical solution for now. Full independence would mean using the U.N. to dictate and enforce a secession movement. Besides setting bad precedent, it would certainly be vetoed by Russia. And Kosovars would sooner revolt than accept a full reunion with Serbia. The two sides aren't ready to be peaceful neighbors, but taking small steps in that direction, while preserving the peace, would help them get used to the idea as their societies heal from communism and war. Impatient NATO members will just have to get used to sticking around.

First Test For New UN Chief: Darfur (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y.

Putting an end to the violence there, which the United States calls "genocide," is also turning into the UN leader's first major test – of his credibility as a global moral force and of his ability to cajole the international community, and in this case Sudan, beyond words to action.

Mr. Ban is underscoring his commitment to resolving the conflict in Darfur by making the African Union summit, to be held in Ethiopia Monday, the focus of his first international trip. There he plans to meet Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir and to press him to accept deployment of a "hybrid" African Union-UN force of 20,000 peacekeepers for the war-ravaged province.

UN officials say Ban, who has been in his job since Jan. 2, does not want to lose the "momentum" that was thought to have been made at the end of last year, when Mr. Bashir sent a letter to outgoing UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan in which he seemed to accept the idea of a hybrid force.

"The problem is that the Sudanese agree to things, but then they backtrack and dawdle. So the worry here is that they made a gesture but then saw they could use the change from Annan to Ban to stall," says one UN official close to the thinking in the secretary-general's office. "The idea will be to move ahead with what has already been approved," says the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Ban's meeting with Bashir is a good first step, some analysts of conflict diplomacy say, but they add that he can do much more.

"The most important thing is to get countries to make significant pledges of troops for a Darfur force, so that it is something more than an idea approved last year by the Security Council," says Lee Feinstein, an expert in international institutions at the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington. "That's something Ban can do that would send a particularly stern message of determination to the Sudanese."

Mr. Feinstein says that Ban, whose candidacy to the secretary-general's post was backed by both Washington and Beijing, should turn to China now for a troop commitment to a peacekeeping force in Darfur. Given Beijing's significant economic partnership with Khartoum, no other power could equal the message that would send, he adds.

Increasingly sensitive to its international image, China is openly discussing its growing involvement in Africa in general and in Sudan in particular. But it is also emphasizing that its cooperation toward a resolution of the Darfur conflict will be diplomatic and not military in nature.

Chinese President Hu Jintao announced this week his plans to visit Sudan next month for talks that will include the Darfur crisis.

Wang Guangya, the Chinese ambassador to the UN, who met with Ban this week in New York, says he made clear China's support for a diplomatic solution in Darfur.

"I told [Ban] we support him in setting his priority on Darfur, and that we will work with him for progress on that issue," Mr. Wang says. Referring to Sudan's recent hints of openness to outside involvement, he adds, "We have seen some important signals over the past few weeks, and I think we are seeing indications that we can expect more."

Ban also met this week with a Sudanese foreign-ministry official, registering his concern over continued aerial bombardments by the government of Sudan in north Darfur. He also brought up increasing harassment of and attacks on UN staff members in Darfur.

But pressure for more robust international action is mounting in other quarters. Several rights organizations, including Human Rights Watch and the Save Darfur Coalition, are calling on the African Union to reject Sudan's candidacy for the presidency of the 53-member organization. In letters to AU countries, the groups said the AU's effectiveness and role in a Darfur resolution would be undermined with a Sudanese presidency.

At the same time, a bipartisan group of US senators is calling on President Bush to divulge any plans the administration has to strengthen its measures addressing the Darfur conflict. Andrew Natsios, presidential envoy for Darfur, had warned the Sudanese government in a Khartoum meeting last month that the US would move on to a new plan of more aggressive measures if Sudan did not begin opening up to a larger international force than the 7,000 soldiers the AU has in the vast western region.

Feinstein, who has authored a new paper on international responsibilities in internal conflicts like that in Darfur, says Ban must also start looking to changes that can help prevent future Darfurs. "Ban should use the advantage he has of the 'fresh start' to move ahead more long term on developing the means to prevent conflicts from becoming international tragedies, as Darfur has," he says.

Among other things, he says Ban should build on the UN General Assembly's adoption in 2005 of the so-called "responsibility to protect" doctrine, which calls on the international community to protect civilians in countries where the government is unable or unwilling to do so.

Doha Breakthrough Not Far Away (FT)

By Alan Beattie

Financial Times, January 26, 2007

Trade ministers continued to jockey for position ahead of their meeting on Saturday at the World Economic Forum in Davos, with the EU saying a big breakthrough on the Doha round could come within weeks.

Peter Mandelson, EU trade commissioner, told the FT that the broad outlines of a deal in multilateral trade talks, with overall indicators of cuts in farm tariffs and subsidies and goods tariffs, was not far away.

DOJ_NMG_0122603

"I believe we can get a breakthrough on the big numbers in agriculture and industrial goods in the next month or so," he said.

But he continued to argue that the onus was on the US to offer more cuts in farm subsidies. Despite intensive talks between the EU and US negotiators in recent weeks, officials say that gaps remain.

"The agricultural consultations between the EU and the US are through the worst," Mr Mandelson said. "We are approaching the end of the endgame in that regard."

Saturday's meeting will discuss whether to reopen the multilateral talks, which were suspended last July.

The outstanding issue in agriculture was between the US and developing countries, said Mr Mandelson. The US has asked for substantial new access to the consumer markets of big emerging market countries such as India, Indonesia and the Philippines.

Susan Schwab, US trade representative, said that a framework agreement was possible "in a matter of months", but that would require rapid progress in the next few weeks.

She declined to discuss what cuts in farm tariffs and subsidies would be required for agreement. "There are two things I am not going to get into this weekend," she said. "I am not going to point fingers and I am not going to quote top-line numbers."

Detailed discussions with individual countries about the protection they wanted to maintain for various farm commodities was necessary to reach agreement, she said.

Rachid Mohammed Rachid, Egypt's trade minister, said that the EU and US both had to do more, but that the task was harder for the US.

He added that few developing countries, apart from Brazil and India, had been properly consulted. "Africa has been totally neglected," he said. "Africa has been dealt with more by threats than by anything else. They have been told: 'You should not be the ones blocking this deal. You should be supporting it'."

Mr Rachid said there appeared to be a belief that the poorest developing countries could be bought off with a few concessions in the last few hours of a trade deal.

The agricultural talks will focus on the number of so-called sensitive products for rich countries and special products for developing countries which they can shield from across-the-board cuts in farm tariffs.

Rules Dispute Imperils Khmer Rouge Trial (NYT)

By Seth Mydans

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

PHNOM PENH, Cambodia, Jan. 25 — The Cambodian judges were on one side and the foreign judges on the other this week in a dispute that captures a decade of difficulties in bringing to trial the last surviving leaders of the murderous Khmer Rouge.

If they cannot agree on procedural rules soon, analysts and officials at the tribunal say, some foreign judges may walk out. That would cast a deeper shadow over a process that some critics say is already so compromised as to be of doubtful value.

Seventeen Cambodians and 12 foreigners took office as judges and prosecutors in July, inaugurating a United Nations-sponsored process that mixes Cambodian law with international standards of justice. It is an awkward formula made more questionable by the meager qualifications of the Cambodian judges, who are seen as poorly trained and subject to political manipulation.

Pragmatists say that a flawed trial is better than none and that there is no choice but to proceed with the tribunal you have rather than the tribunal you may wish to have.

Almost three decades have passed since the Khmer Rouge ruled Cambodia, from 1975 to 1979, causing 1.7 million deaths through killings, torture, starvation and overwork.

The potential defendants are aging and some have died, notably the Khmer Rouge leader, Pol Pot, in 1998. The targets of the trial are top leaders and "those most responsible" for the crimes and is expected to focus on at most a dozen defendants. Among the handful of names often mentioned, only one is in custody, with the rest living freely in Cambodia.

The foreign co-prosecutor, a Canadian named Robert Petit, has been pursuing the evidence vigorously but has not said where it is leading him. In an interview, he said he was ready to propose his first indictments once the judges formalized the rules at a plenary session tentatively set for March. A trial might then begin by the end of the year.

Cambodia and the United Nations agreed on the structure of the mixed tribunal in 2003 after years of negotiations that involved technical and political differences. Those differences remained at the heart of the disagreements that have stalled the trial since November, say experts on the tribunal.

A rules committee of nine judges is trying to resolve the differences. Sean Visoth, the tribunal's Cambodian coordinator, said, "If there is no compromise and there is no plenary, the international judges will walk away."

DOJ_NMG_0122604

The delay has revived a concern that Prime Minister Hun Sen may not in fact want the trial to proceed and may be throwing up the latest in a long series of roadblocks that have stalled it over the years. Among other things, he is believed to be under pressure from China, which does not want to see a trial that would be likely to demonstrate its close ties to the Khmer Rouge government.

The core disputes appear to involve a long-running issue: the independence of the trial from Cambodian political manipulation.

On the Cambodian side, an important issue is control, said the American ambassador to Cambodia, Joseph A. Mussomeli. "The government in general tries to keep tight control over the judiciary and anything that could have negative consequences," he said.

The first concern is the scope of indictments in a country where the politics of the present remain tangled in the past. Some former middle-ranking Khmer Rouge are prominent in the current government, including Mr. Hun Sen — although experts say he is not culpable. Other potential defendants may have powerful patrons trying to protect them.

One point of contention among the judges, said people close to the negotiations, is a provision that would in effect allow an indictment to proceed without the agreement of the Cambodian side. That provision is one of several balancing acts in the tribunal's super-majority system that at most junctures allows foreign and Cambodian judges to cast what amount to vetoes over one another's decisions.

The Cambodian side is also seeking to limit the right of defendants to be represented in court by foreign lawyers, which it says is a violation of Cambodian legal sovereignty. Foreign analysts say the Cambodian concern is that aggressive foreign lawyers would be independent of any political guidance and could send the case in unpredictable directions.

A British lawyer, Rupert Skilbeck, who will coordinate the lawyers' work, said defendants would be placed at a disadvantage if they could not select their own lawyers.

"It's important that the trials are very fair, because if they're seen as show trials, then there will be no justice," he said in November.

Mr. Mussomeli said the Cambodian government, accustomed to controlling the judiciary, might be reacting defensively to Mr. Petit, who has taken on his job as prosecutor with an energy and independence that is unfamiliar here.

In the interview, Mr. Petit sought to calm these concerns, saying he was aware that the tribunal could be derailed by an overaggressive prosecution. "We have to apply the law in the context of Cambodia," he said. "I'm not stupid. You have to exercise discretion."

Mr. Petit has been involved in tribunals in Rwanda, Sierra Leone, Kosovo and East Timor, and he said he understood that in cases like these it was not possible to follow the law blindly, without reference to its context. "We all have a sense of our responsibilities," he said. "Our primary responsibility is to deliver justice to the victims of these crimes." That will not be possible, he said, if the process is shut down for any reason.

"Having a right and exercising it with good judgment are two different things," he said.

He said he did not know how many cases he would forward to the next level of the tribunal, the investigating judges, who are to issue indictments. "In this particular tribunal there are very specific expectations," he said. "Everyone 'knows' what happened. We've got the evidence there; you just have to pick it up and carry it into court — well, it doesn't work that way."

"We have to grasp events of great magnitude that happened 30 years ago and be legally and morally convinced that we have cases against individual people," he said.

Carter Apologizes For 'Stupid' Book Passage (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, January 26, 2007

Jimmy Carter has apologized for what he called a "stupid" passage in his book that critics say is a de facto endorsement of Palestinian violence against Israelis.

The former president had spent most of the past two months defending his new book, "Palestine: Peace not Apartheid," after 15 board members at his Atlanta-based Carter Center resigned in protest of the book's content.

"I apologize to you personally and to everyone here," Mr. Carter said when asked about the passage by a student during his appearance at Brandeis University on Tuesday. After explaining that the passage was "worded in a completely improper and stupid way," Mr. Carter said he has asked publisher Simon & Schuster Inc. to change the wording in future editions of the book.

The questionable passage, which appears on Page 213 of the book, reads: "It is imperative that the general Arab community and all significant Palestinian groups make it clear that they will end the suicide bombings and other acts of terrorism when international laws and the ultimate goals of the Roadmap for Peace are accepted by Israel."

DOJ_NMG_0122605

Some of Mr. Carter's critics, including the Carter Center board members who resigned, say the text reads as defending terror tactics until a peace accord can be reached between Israel and Palestinians.

"Repeatedly I call on all to terminate the use of violence," Mr. Carter said in response.

He also addressed critics who said the book title unfairly compared Israeli policy to the racial separatist policies of South Africa's government, which ended apartheid in the early 1990s. Mr. Carter said he did not mean to "equate Zionism with racism" when choosing the title.

"I chose that title knowing that it would be provocative, but in the long run it has precipitated discussion and there has been a lot of positive discussion," he said.

Emory University history professor Kenneth W. Stein, who served as the Carter Center's first executive director, was one of the first board members to resign after the book was published in December.

Last week, in a statement released through Emory's Institute for the Study of Modern Israel, Mr. Stein criticized Mr. Carter's book for suggesting that the Palestinian terror group Hamas is "ready for dialogue." Mr. Stein noted that Hamas has never recognized the legitimacy of the Jewish state and that, as recently as October, a Palestinian official said at a Hamas gathering that Israel is "a vile entity."

On Wednesday, Mr. Carter released the transcript of a discussion he held as president with Pope John Paul II. During the Oct. 6, 1979, discussion, Mr. Carter urged the pope to publicly acknowledge Israel during one of his speeches.

"I reported that the Jews in our country at least thought that he was biased against them because he had never yet mentioned Israel in one of his speeches," the transcript reads. "He replied, 'I have mentioned Jerusalem.' I replied, 'This is not adequate for the Jews.' " The transcript was first released to the Associated Press.

Mr. Carter's appearance at the Brandeis campus in Boston was followed by an appearance by Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz, who has been critical of the book. Although Mr. Carter refused to debate him and even to appear with him, Mr. Dershowitz told the students in attendance that he appreciated the former president's apology.

"You heard the Brandeis Jimmy Carter today, and he was terrific," Mr. Dershowitz said. "I support almost everything he said. But if you listen to the Al Jazeera Jimmy Carter, you'll hear a very different perspective."

Judgment Day (WSJ)

By Yossi Klein Halevi

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2007

JERUSALEM -- The Israeli presidency is largely a ceremonial position and has only one real purpose: to uphold the honor of the Jewish state. Yet over the last six months, as accusations of sexual crimes accumulated against him, President Moshe Katsav resisted demands to resign, insisting on his right to remain in office until being formally charged -- even though, by tainting the presidency with scandal, he has betrayed the job's core requirement. Now, with impending charges that include rape, sexual harassment, obstruction of justice and fraud, he is being dragged out of office: Yesterday, the Knesset approved the president's temporary suspension. But not before Mr. Katsav called a hysterical press conference in which he blamed the media, the police and the attorney general for hounding him.

For Israelis, this is a time of near-despair. A former justice minister is on trial for sexual harassment, leading tax authority officials have been arrested for fraud, the finance minister is under investigation, and any of a half-dozen alleged financial scandals could topple Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. "There is no judgment and no judge," Israelis tell each other, quoting a Talmudic phrase. With the looming threat of a nuclear Iran, and jihadist Hamas and Hezbollah pressing against its borders, Israel faces an internal challenge that is no less daunting than the external ones: to recreate a society that is worth fighting for. Never before has Israel faced greater dangers, and never before has it been so bereft of trustworthy leaders.

The roots of Israel's ethical crisis go back, ironically, to the heroic founders of the state. Personally stoic, the leaders of Mapai, the socialist party that led the state in its formative years, created a culture of cronyism. Possession of a "red card," marking Mapai membership, was often a precondition for securing scarce employment. Cronyism was coupled with frontier recklessness: Under constant siege, and overwhelmed with impoverished refugees, Israel created a culture of improvisation, a bending of the rules. With the country's survival constantly in the balance, Israelis indulged the sexual improprieties of their military heroes; Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion defended the philandering general, Moshe Dayan, by noting that King David was also an adulterer. But they knew their leaders were devoted to the nation. The same can hardly be said about today's politicians, who absorbed the wiles of the founders but not their self-sacrifice.

Perhaps the greatest threat to the political system today is a corruption of the spirit of leadership. In refusing to accept responsibility for sullying the presidency, Mr. Katsav represents a new class of Israeli leaders who reject accountability for failure. Though last summer's war didn't achieve any of its objectives, none of the architects of Israel's first military defeat admitted responsibility. Mr. Olmert continues to insist that Israel won, even though Hezbollah has rearmed and Israeli deterrence has been weakened by the very war that was intended to restore it. True, the army chief of staff, Dan Halutz, did resign last week -- but only to pre-empt a call for his dismissal from a commission of inquiry investigating the war, and without any admission of failure on his part.

It used to be different. When Avraham Ofer, housing minister in the first government of Yitzhak Rabin during the mid-1970s, was accused of corruption, he shot himself, leaving behind a note that insisted on his innocence while adding that he couldn't bear the shame. And when the wife of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin was found to have kept a bank account in Washington, in violation of the law at the time forbidding Israelis to hold foreign currency, Rabin took personal responsibility and resigned -- incomprehensible by today's standards.

Corruption among Israel's leadership is arguably no worse than anywhere else. But a nation facing immediate existential threats needs leaders who can inspire. No citizen in the West makes the kind of sacrifices, from compulsory military reserve duty to punishingly high taxes, that Israelis routinely endure. To a large extent, they endure those hardships willingly: Teenagers vie for every slot in elite combat units; at times of national emergency, even reservists who haven't been called up volunteer for service. Israelis deserve a leadership worthy of their sacrifices.

The founders of Zionism hoped to turn the Jews into a "normal" people, a nation like all other nations. They envisioned a country maintaining normal international relations while creating an admirable society -- externally normalized, internally exceptional. Given Israel's precarious status and the current state of its political culture, that vision seems to have been reversed.

But the good news is that change is coming. Mr. Katsav, after all, is being brought to trial. The plethora of sex-related accusations against prominent Israelis is an indication of a maturing society no longer indulging the excesses of its leaders. With Lt. Gen. Halutz gone, Mr. Peretz will almost certainly soon have to follow: He will be forced to resign either by the commission of inquiry into the Lebanon war or by a rebellion within the Labor Party, which he currently heads. Finally, Mr. Olmert's own day before the commission of inquiry is approaching, and so is a decision by the attorney general about whether to pursue criminal charges against him for financial improprieties. There is judgment and judge, after all.

Days Of Decision In Ulster (NYT)

The New York Times, January 26, 2007

The militant Irish republican Gerry Adams and the fire-breathing unionist preacher Ian Paisley have long symbolized the irreconcilable extremes of Ulster politics. But over the next few days, they have the chance to lead the province into a new era of democratic self-rule.

Mr. Adams's opportunity comes this Sunday, when he will ask his party, Sinn Fein, to end its long refusal to cooperate with Northern Ireland's reformed police service. If Sinn Fein accepts his advice, it will be the turn of Mr. Paisley and his Democratic Unionist Party to live up to its end of the bargain and agree to form a power-sharing coalition with Sinn Fein — as the top parties elected by the Protestant and Roman Catholic communities are supposed to do under the Good Friday peace agreement on Northern Ireland.

If both sides come through, elections will be held and a coalition cabinet formed in March. If either falters, there can be no power sharing, and Northern Ireland will remain ruled by appointed British officials for the foreseeable future.

The Good Friday agreement of 1998 all but ended years of sectarian bloodshed in Northern Ireland. In 2005, the Irish Republican Army took the further crucial steps of permanently renouncing political violence and destroying its weapons. But the agreement's full promise has never been met as Sinn Fein and the Unionists have sparred over political power sharing and police reform.

The importance of police reform was clearly demonstrated this week with the release of a devastating ombudsman's report on years of police collaboration with a Protestant paramilitary death squad. Most, but not all, of that collaboration occurred before the present professional police service was created to replace the old Protestant-dominated Royal Ulster Constabulary.

Further reforms put in place by the head of the new force make any repetition of such shocking abuses unlikely. But the best safeguard would be oversight of the police by a democratically chosen executive and legislature. That is the courageous and sensible argument Mr. Adams will make to Sinn Fein this weekend. If his view prevails, Mr. Paisley's time to be courageous and sensible will follow.

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ Seeks Dismissal Of NSA Surveillance Suit. The AP (1/26, Jordan) reports, "The Bush administration sought on Thursday to drop its appeal of a federal court ruling that concluded the government's domestic spying program is unconstitutional, saying the entire issue is moot since the surveillance now is monitored by a secret court." The AP continues, "Responding, lawyers for the American Civil Liberties Union said they would continue to push for their day in court since President Bush retains authority to continue the warrantless spying program. … The Justice Department's request has been expected since last week, when Attorney General Alberto Gonzales disclosed that the secret panel of judges who oversee the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act had begun reviewing and approving applications to spy on people believed to be linked to al-Qaida." The AP adds, "The ACLU's lawsuit against the terrorist surveillance program 'is now moot,' the Justice Department wrote in a 21-page brief, filed Thursday with the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati. 'The surveillance activity they challenge - electronic surveillance not subject to the FISA court - does not exist.' … The Bush administration secretly launched the spy program, run by the National Security Agency, in 2001 to monitor international phone calls and e-mails to or from the United States involving people suspected by the government of having terrorist links. The program, which did not require investigators to seek warrants before conducting surveillance, was revealed in December 2005."

The Washington Post (1/26, A5, Eggen) reports, "The government contends that the new arrangement essentially invalidates an August ruling in the ACLU case by U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor, who declared the surveillance program unconstitutional and ordered it halted. The government appealed to the 6th Circuit court. It wants Taylor's ruling vacated and the lawsuit dismissed. … Crucial to the Justice Department's argument is the contention that the government did not act voluntarily to stop the NSA program. 'This is not an instance of "voluntary cessation" of allegedly unlawful activity,' the government lawyers wrote. 'The government has not ceased surveillance -- instead, the facts and legal authorities have changed.' … But Ann Beeson, the ACLU's associate legal director, said that argument is 'not plausible.' She added that previous court rulings made it clear that the government cannot escape a legal judgment merely by voluntarily halting its illegal activity. … 'The FISA court didn't reach out on its own to do something; the government asked it to do something,' Beeson said. 'And absent a ruling, they are free to return to their illegal conduct again.'"

US Guards Secrecy In Surveillance Suits. The New York Times (1/26, Liptak) reports, "The Bush administration has employed extraordinary secrecy in defending the National Security Agency's highly classified domestic surveillance program from civil lawsuits. Plaintiffs and judges' clerks cannot see its secret filings. Judges have to make appointments to review them and are not allowed to keep copies." The Times continues, "Judges have even been instructed to use computers provided by the Justice Department to compose their decisions. … But now the procedures have started to meet resistance. At a private meeting with the lawyers in one of the cases this month, the judges who will hear the first appeal next week expressed uneasiness about the procedures, said a lawyer who attended, Ann Beeson of the American Civil Liberties Union." The Times adds, "Lawyers suing the government and some legal scholars say the procedures threaten the separation of powers, the adversary system and the lawyer-client privilege. … Justice Department officials say the circumstances of the cases, involving a highly classified program, require extraordinary measures. The officials say they have used similar procedures in other cases involving classified materials. … In ordinary civil suits, the parties' submissions are sent to their adversaries and are available to the public in open court files. But in several cases challenging the eavesdropping, Justice Department lawyers have been submitting legal papers not by filing them in court but by placing them in a room at the department. They have filed papers, in other words, with themselves." The Times notes, "At the meeting this month, judges on the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit asked how the procedures might affect the integrity of the files and the appellate records. … In response, Joan B. Kennedy, a Justice Department official, submitted, in one of the department's unclassified filings, a detailed seven-page sworn statement last Friday defending the practices. … 'The documents reviewed by the court have not been altered and will not be altered,' Ms. Kennedy wrote, and they 'will be preserved securely as part of the record of this case.'"

Hamas-Funding Trial Jurors Cutting Deliberation Hours. The AP (1/26, Robinson) reports, "Jurors in the trial of two men charged with furnishing money and fresh recruits to Hamas terrorists announced Thursday that they are getting tired and are cutting their work hours." The Muhammad Salah and Abdelhaleem Ashqar trial jurors said in a note to US District Judge Amy St. Eve "that they are suffering from 'mental fatigue." The AP notes, "Jurors heard three months of testimony in the case and have deliberated on the evidence for nine days." They "told St. Eve that they had been working diligently to reach a verdict. But they went home Thursday without reaching one. Instead, they said that they would work a half day on Friday and from now on start work at 9 a.m. and normally quit for the day at 4 p.m."

Sting Disrupts Plot To Sell Enriched Uranium To Terrorists. The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 3, 2:20, Orr, 7.66M) reported on a plot by a Russian man to sell enriched uranium, "a real-life thriller, you might say, complete with a CIA sting." Inside "these nondescript pouches is nearly four ounces of weapons-grade uranium. Officials from the former Soviet Republic of Georgia confiscated it from this man, Oleg Khinsagov when he traveled from Russia intending to selling uranium to a radical Islamic terrorist. Instead, says this official, it so happened the potential buyer was our operative. Tests by a US Department of Energy nuclear lab confirmed the material was highly enriched uranium, capable of being used for nuclear weapons. The three ounces confiscated was not enough to make a bomb, but the suspect claimed he had more, four pounds more, and officials say that's reason enough for concern." Sean McCormack, US State Department spokesman: "We all have to be vigilant to make sure there aren't these sort of smuggling attempts. It could lead to real tragedy." Orr: "Billions of dollars have been spent to tighten controls over nuclear inventories, but former Senator Sam Nunn, who now heads the Nuclear Threat Initiative, warns not all weapons and ingredients are locked down." Sam Nunn, former US Senator: "That's raw material of terrorism, and if not properly secured in many cases small amounts but enough to make a crude weapon. A crude weapon could destroy a city and, indeed, shake the confidence of the world."

Editorial Urges Reversal Of Arar Decision. The Miami Herald (1/26) editorializes, "The best thing to do when you make a mistake is to admit the error, apologize for the harm it caused, make amends if possible -- and then move on. Somebody should explain this to Bush administration officials who are stubbornly refusing to acknowledge error or responsibility for the wrongful detention and subsequent torture of Canadian citizen Maher Arar." The Herald continues, "Mr. Arar is the Syrian-born Canadian who was detained by U.S. authorities as a terrorism suspect in 2002 when he was changing planes in New York after a vacation in Tunisia. He was deported to Syria without a hearing or judicial review. There, he was imprisoned for a year in a tiny cell and routinely tortured. … All of this is now known because of findings by a Canadian Commission of Inquiry and an independent investigation by a former McGill University law dean. The commission cleared Mr. Arar of any terrorism ties. The independent investigation documented the torture he suffered in Syria." The Herald adds, "Despite the findings, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff say that Mr. Arar's name will remain on the terrorism watch list. Why? Messrs. Chertoff and Gonzales claim to have secret information to justify his inclusion on the list. This is profoundly disturbing -- not to mention unconscionable, morally repugnant, legally suspect and just plain wrong. … No self-respecting democracy that adheres to the rule of law would allow itself to be party to torture and injustice on the basis of secret information. .. The United States owes Mr. Arar an apology and compensation for the harm he has suffered. That is the least we can do."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Arizona FBI Agents Meet With Local Muslim Leaders. The Kingman (AZ) Daily Miner (1/25, Royster) reported, "Local members of the Muslim community got the opportunity to voice their concerns and have a dialogue with FBI officials at the Kingman mosque Tuesday night. Dr. Farid Farooqi, the imam of Masjid-E-Ibrahim, welcomed the head of all FBI operations in Arizona, John E. Lewis, to help open communication between the two groups. 'We highly appreciate their efforts,' Farooqi said. … Farooqi said he felt the night went well." The Miner added, "Lewis said that he is here to serve the community, but didn't gloss over the actions of the FBI. 'It is a rare event for us to be on the street conducting an investigation between us and a private citizen that would be a positive experience,' Lewis said. 'We're not in business, unfortunately, to deliver good news to you.' Individuals in attendance expressed concerns over the name checklist, profiling at airports and at the borders, and a general poor attitude from law enforcement during all interactions they had. Lewis offered few solutions or answers to the tough questions presented to him, but was attentive and expressed concern to the community leaders."

Lack Of Gulf Coast Mention In State Of The Union Seen As Insensitive. Julianne Malveaux, in a commentary appearing in USA Today (1/26, 11A, 2.27M), writes about President Bush's State of the Union address and asks "how dare he talk of the State of the Union without mentioning the Gulf Coast, and especially New Orleans. Has our president decided that one of our nation's greatest devastations does not merit a mention? … Granted, all of the challenges in New Orleans and along the Gulf Coast can't be solved by federal government action alone. But a more sensitive president might at least acknowledge the slow pace of recovery and pledge to do whatever he can to help its citizens."

Referring to the lack of a Gulf Coast mention, Eugene Robinson, in his column for the Washington Post (1/26, A21, 690K) writes, "How nice that the White House has been able to move beyond the trauma of September 2005 -- wind and water, death and destruction, poverty and race, 'Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job.' Too bad the people of New Orleans, St. Bernard Parish, Pass Christian, Biloxi and the rest of the coast will never have the luxury of forgetting." Robinson states, "What is unconscionable is that a president who fundamentally does not believe in government has allowed market forces to take the lead in the reconstruction effort, which ensures that the New Orleans he promised to rebuild is gone forever. … What kind of president can see one of the nation's greatest, most historic cities ruined and not make its rebirth his highest priority? What kind of president gives a State of the Union and doesn't even mention New Orleans?"

WAR NEWS:

McCain, Cornyn Crafting Iraq Resolutions That Don't Rebuke Bush. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Levey, 850K) reports, "Scrambling to head off a potentially embarrassing congressional rebuke" for President Bush's "troop buildup in Iraq, Senate Republicans are working on alternative legislation that would attach specific

DOJ_NMG_0122613

'benchmarks' to the White House plan." Sen. John McCain, "who has been the leading congressional advocate of deploying additional troops to quell the sectarian violence in Iraq, said Thursday that he was interested in drafting a resolution to ensure that the effectiveness of the troop increase could be gauged." Also, Sen. John Cornyn, "one of the president's most loyal supporters on Capitol Hill, said he might introduce a similar resolution. … If McCain and Cornyn introduce resolutions, they could draw support away from other resolutions that directly oppose the buildup and cast Democrats as impediments to progress in Iraq." Cornyn "said he had talked with the White House about his plans, as well as Senate Republicans and Sen. Joe Lieberman, a Connecticut Democrat who won reelection as an independent in November. Lieberman has been one of the strongest supporters of the president's plan."

McClatchy (1/26) reports "McCain said Thursday that he hadn't yet decided on precise benchmarks. 'They'd have to be specific and they (the Iraqi government) would have to meet them.' Asked what penalty would be imposed if Iraq failed to meet his benchmarks, he said: "I think everybody knows the consequences. Haven't met the benchmarks? Obviously, then, we're not able to complete the mission. Then you have to examine your options.'" McClatchy describes Minority Whip Trent Lott as "a McCain ally," and notes he "said many Republicans might back a resolution of the sort that McCain is suggesting. He noted that Republicans in the House of Representatives earlier this week proposed establishing a set of benchmarks and asking the Bush administration to report monthly on progress."

The Washington Post (1/26, A4, Weisman, 690K) quotes GOP Sen. George Voinovich saying, "What we need is to put together a list of benchmarks that are tough and measurable, with requirements that the administration report back on the progress." Democrats "said the GOP efforts might keep some Republicans from signing a resolution opposing the troop increase, but not all of them. At least half a dozen Republicans have already signed on to one of two nonbinding resolutions, a strongly worded measure that passed out of the Foreign Relations Committee and a more deferential version drafted by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.)."

GOP Sen. David Vitter said on MSNBC (1/25, Jansing), "I think everybody across the country -- myself included -- is worn down and frustrated and really heartbroken by our American losses, particularly loss of life. … The tough question is, at the end of the day, we are where we are. What do we do to go forward? And one of my main disappointments with the resolution that we debated in committee yesterday, and I expressed this, is it's not a plan. Everybody on the committee and the Senate has the right to oppose a plan, to oppose the President's plan if that's what they decide. But I also think everybody has the responsibility to be for some plan."

Local TV coverage of the Senate Foreign Relation Committee's focus on Bush's Iraq troop surge plan dropped considerably from the extensive amount broadcast on Wednesday. KTUL-TV Tulsa (1/25, 5:13 pm), for example, reported that despite the President's "efforts to focus on domestic issues, the Iraq war continues to dominate discussion on Capitol Hill. The Senate Armed Services Committee heard from experts on the President's troop surge plan."

WAKA-TV Montgomery (1/25, 5:02 pm) began its 5 o'clock broadcast covering this story, adding that the President "expected the debate, but he is calling on lawmakers to give his new way forward a chance to work. Alabama Senator Jeff Sessions says he will support the President's plan to increase troop levels. He says that Congress has handled the war on Iraq irresponsibly. He calls a resolution approved by a Senate committee yesterday 'cynical and toothless.'"

Warner Says He Won't Seek Compromise With Biden. The AP (1/26, Flaherty) reports, "The leader of a bipartisan effort to rebuke President Bush's Iraq strategy said Thursday he would not strike a compromise with a harsher Democratic resolution the Senate will debate next week." Sen. John Warner, "former chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said he won't negotiate with Democrats to develop a single proposal on Iraq." Warner's decision is being portrayed as bad news for the President. The AP, for example, adds that Warner's move, "along with the emergence of other resolutions the Senate might consider -- underscored how a Congress largely against Bush's proposal to send more troops to Iraq remained divided over what to do about it." Warner's decision "bolsters chances that his resolution will be the one to win final Senate approval. Democrats are expected to vote for his proposal if their measure fails, and several Republicans said they prefer Warner's approach because it is less divisive."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 7, Williams, 9.87M) a part of a very positive profile of Warner, likewise said there is "more momentum for opponents of…Bush's plan to send more
